NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 1—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, MARCH 1, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,171.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

We have, as it were, by force, made room for one of the many articles of our own manufacture, which have been latterly prepared, and then postponed, or destroyed—being cast out of time, by delay.

If we had sixty instead of sixteen pages, we could fill them all with matter proper to be Registered. The reading of the masses of matter, which we must read to keep ourselves "posted-up" in a knowledge of what is going on, is four or five hours hard work, daily.

The rather new practice, as we esteem it, which is now pursued in both houses of congress on presenting petitions, causes a great overflow of prompt and able speeches, on that subject which swallows up all others. We notice some of them—as well as we can.

Under the proper head we have mentioned a few things to shew the "pressure"—not as alarmists, but in the way of record. There is a great excitement in many parts of the country, and the people are filled with apprehensions. We shall not give the many reports which reach us relating to these apprehensions; for surely, if they have any effect, it must be only to hasten events that are so much dreaded.

Mr. Duane's fourth letter has appeared. These letters are exciting a great deal of attention. We know not what to say about giving them a place in the REGISTER, where they ought to be recorded.

We publish, at length, Mr. Rives's speech in the senate on resigning his seat in that body, in consequence of the receipt of the instructions of the legislature of Virginia—to which also he has assigned his reasons for retiring. It is said that he has been offered, but declines to accept any place under the administration. This course of proceeding must be approved. It would "look bad" if otherwise.

Though we had seen many reports concerning the interviews of the several committees who have visited Washington, and waited on the president, to obtain a relief of the public distress, through a restoration of the public deposits, none of them possessed that formal and decided character which we thought a record in this work ought to have, and were, therefore, laid aside; but in the report of the Philadelphia committee, to a multitude of persons,* convened, in the day-time, at the exchange, on Saturday last, we have what may well be regarded a documentary statement, the verity of which cannot be impeached; and the part which relates to the interview with the president is given at full length—for it belongs to the history of these momentous times.

The "National Intelligencer," which is not oftentimes forward in such things, "ventures to predict" that the house of representatives will show a majority against the removal of the deposits, "when the question shall be fairly and directly presented." This opinion is also entertained by many of the best judging members of the house; and some think that the movements of the people, (and, indeed, the people are moving,) may possibly cause a considerable majority on the main question, even without the happening of certain fearful events which are every day looked for.

Messrs. Gilpin, Sullivan, Wager and McElderry, nominated for re-election as directors of the bank, on the part of "the government," have been rejected by the senate. Mr. J. A. Bayard was approved as the fifth director, some time ago.

*This meeting consisted of more than ten thousand, embracing a very large proportion of the productive labor, wealth and capital of the city—and probably five-sixths of its business-men. Vol. XLVI—810. 1.

By the fast mail, we received, on Monday last, an order for a new subscription, enclosing five dollars, from Brooklyn, Ohio, 358 miles from Washington, and about the same from Baltimore, dated November 28, 1833, in ninety days passage, and which had evidently encountered much rough usage on its voyage. We are thankful for its arrival—at the rate of four miles a day. "Slow and sure." The letter was plainly and correctly addressed. The business of the post office is in a horrible state. We hear of it, and feel it, almost every day.

The last year's permanent loan, in Pennsylvania, was taken at 13 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. premium. There is not one offer to take the present year's. The state requires about \$2,500,000 to complete certain works, and for repairs, &c.

There is a large export of gold and silver from England—and yet money is "plenty" in that country; there is a large import of silver into the United States, and a good deal of gold is gathered in our mines, but money is "scarce" here. Confidence in the one case, and the want of it in the other, causes these strange things.

Richard M. Johnson has been named for the presidency, by a caucus of the "Jackson" members of the legislature of Kentucky—subject, however, to the decision of a national convention.

Mr. Lincoln, late governor of Massachusetts, has been elected a member of the house of representatives of the United States, by a majority of from 6 to 8 for 1, in the place of Mr. Davis, present governor of the state. He arrived at Washington on Thursday last.

The much esteemed Cadwallader D. Colden, esq. died at his seat in Jersey City, opposite New York, on the 7th ult. in the 65th year of his age.

The tide of emigration is setting back to England—171 steerage passengers lately arrived at Liverpool from New York, in one vessel. This is well; we have a great surplus of labor just now—and do not wish new importations to send our own people supperless to bed.

George Kremer has been named, by a meeting held in Union county, as a proper person to supersede Mr. Wolf in the gubernatorial chair of Pennsylvania!

¶ In the absence of statistical facts, we can do but little to obtain correct ideas of practical results, though they belong to the every-day's business of the people—nor do we esteem the importance of many things, on account of our familiarity with them.

We propose to make some remarks, (and they must necessarily be brief, for it is hardly within the power of the human mind to carry them out), on three great subjects—which, not capable of demonstration, may yet be so presented, perhaps, as to give to the reflecting reader some notion of their extent, as astronomers point out the distances of the fixed stars; but when thousands of millions are spoken of, we wonder at, rather than comprehend, the amount.

1. The value of the annual productions of the United States;
  2. The divisibility of matter and principle of aggregation;
  3. The circulation of values.
- These subjects are not merely speculative. Each relates to things which reach the heart and home of every man. And we hope in the progress of the present writing, to bring out certain probabilities and principles which may instruct, as well as amuse, ourselves and others.

1. The value of the annual productions of the people of the United States.

What is value? Civilized communities have, at different times, adopted different things by which they measured value—generally pieces of gold or silver, or of paper, stamped or marked in certain ways; and in Maryland and Virginia, pounds of tobacco were measures of value. The student of political economy is continually presented with new difficulties when the terms value and money are placed in adjusted comparisons—for they have no necessary affinities one to the other, though often rated as the same. The affinity is only conventional or conditional, or rendered absolute by “existing circumstances.” At one time and place, a pound of diamonds might be less valuable than a pound of potatoes—at another time and place, a pound of diamonds will be more valuable than many millions of pounds of potatoes. The quantities have the same denominations, though the comparative values are almost immeasurably changed. Money too, even gold and silver coin, is subject to frequent changes of value—by contractions or expansions of the circulation, supply and demand. But we shall leave these matters on the simple suggestion of them, and consider value as determined by money—which is something, any thing, metal or paper, but with a certain general relation to pennyweights of gold or ounces of silver. Money is, in fact, the circulating medium, and a five dollar note issued by what is called a specie-paying bank, is regarded as five dollars.

After much reflection on the subject, and the use of some data obtained as to the cost of subsistence, clothing and shelter, we have, by several calculations, arrived at the conclusion, that the annually produced values in the United States are certainly not less than fifteen hundred millions of dollars. This is meant to include a supply of all the new wants of twelve millions of persons, extending through every class of society, from the making or repairs of a fence on a farm to the tear and wear and supply of a needle—all sorts of necessary labor by which value is created, and the obtaining of all sorts of implements and tools, animals or buildings, useful in such creations—houses or ships, wagons or wheelbarrows—the making or repairs of roads, canals and bridges, with the cost of education—and in short, all the requirements of civilized life. The sum above stated seems a large one; but when we reflect that it allows only 125 dollars for each individual, the great amount is narrowed down, and the mind can grapple the probability of the fact as suggested. The average annual cost of paupers in our poor houses, without any allowance for the buildings in which they live, would be nearly one-half of the 125 dollars above stated—if the value of the products of their labor was added to the money actually disbursed on account of them. The common laborer who has a family of three other persons, and receives only one dollar a day, or 300 dollars per annum, would not appear to live at the rate of 125 per head—but his wife also produces value in the preparation of his food or the making and washing of his clothes; and these being necessary to his subsistence and shelter, or comfort, should be admitted into such aggregates of values in the full sum that it would have cost, in money, to have had such services performed by another person. The correctness of these principles being admitted, and we do not see how it can be objected to, we think it will appear manifest, that the money value of all the annual products of the United States, (whether natural, such as the yearly growth of trees in the forest, or by labor expended such as in rendering forest trees useful as fire-wood) cannot be less than 1,500,000,000 dollars.

Such are the annual creations of value which seemingly must be made, for the preservation and accommodation of society. A part of the sum suggested may go into accumulating values. Thus—if 100,000 dollars worth of new houses are erected in a year, in any city or town, or a mill worth that sum is built and fitted, the whole of this amount, less the tear and wear and natural decay, with cost of alterations or repairs, is passed into the accumulating value; but if such houses or mill be totally destroyed by fire, or otherwise, the actual money cost is chargeable on the annual production of values.

These things seem very clear to our mind. There does not appear any sort of mystery about them. But to understand them, the reader must think a little for himself.

2. The divisibility of matter and principle of aggregation. Here is, indeed, a wide field for observation, and we should not affect an ability to comprehend the ideas that belong to it, unless in a familiarity with manifest facts which bear upon divisibility and aggregation. By these facts we are enabled, as it were, to measure immeasurable things. Thus we know that the mighty Mississippi, which discharges her thirty-fathom-deep flood into the sea, is made up of particles of moisture, or water, so minute as to be incomprehensible. So is the vast ocean itself formed of inconceivably small atoms of matter. And if we regard animal life, the whale's vast bulk is believed to be made up in the consumption of other animals so minute, that, possibly, his daily supply of food may require a million of millions of them. And with regard to ourselves—in a spoon full of vinegar, used on our cabbage at dinner, perhaps we take in half a million of little snake-like things, whose bitings and scratchings when they reach our palates produce that sensation, or taste, for which vinegar is desired; and if we eat a single fig after dinner, what is the number of crab-like and pugnacious animals that pass into our stomachs? It is so also in the works of man. Instance the divisibility of gold. So in the works of insects—witness the fineness of a spider's web. It is not worth while to dwell on these subjects—for the divisibility of matter and force of aggregation are manifest to our senses, though we cannot count up the power of either—in its minuteness, on the one hand, or magnitude on the other.

The preceding remarks on the two first propositions offered appear necessary to a consideration of the third, which is

The circulation of values; more difficult, perhaps, to reduce into an intelligible statement than either of the others, however important are its operations on the condition of society. But, that the reader may more easily understand what is intended to be said on this subject, we shall premise, that the “circulation of values,” though not in all cases synonymous, is here intended to mean nearly the same thing as exchanges of values, and the effect of the currency on them—and on all persons who buy or sell, or make exchanges of values, whether in labor or in the products of labor. And, with craving the attention of the reader, we shall, at once, proceed to the consideration of certain subjects that we have never seen referred to in a methodical manner, which, however, are so numerous in their mutations that the mind must be exerted to perceive what the pen cannot describe.

The annual productions of the United States may be called the starting point of the exchanges, or circulations of value. It is no matter in what shape they appear. Every grain of corn that enters into the subsistence of a negro employed in the growth of cotton, passes into the circulation of values until the cotton becomes cloth; and then, reduced into rags, is made into paper, and such paper into books, &c. We have shewn what is the divisibility of matter; we have spoken of aggregation; but to begin at the beginning and end at the ending of the circulation of values, would be something like an attempt to calculate the boundaries of space, except in believing that space, (in the human understanding,) cannot have any boundary. To make the compass, for an example, with which the land was surveyed on which the grain of corn above alluded to grew, involved many thousands of exchanges of values, and yet some part of the value of that compass passed into that grain of corn. The survey gave value to the land, and many other values were added before the grain of corn was produced; but that grain partook of them all, and, passing into the subsistence of the laborer, entered into the value of the cotton, and that indescribably small portion of cotton may have existence, after all its mutations, in the value of a volume of the REGISTER. The value of the wear of the knife with which an animal is flayed, enters into the value of a pair of boots; and all values are continually exchanging.

There are many other classes of circulations of values. Thus, after a house worth $1,000 is built, or a value of $1,000 so created, every sale of that house puts 2,000 dollars into the exchanges—for the operation between the buyer and seller is a double one. We once traced the history of a check on a bank for $300, which, having changed hands 11 times on the day of its issue and before it reached the bank, of course caused the payment of 3,300 dollars and the receipt of the same sum, or 6,600 in all. So it is with bank notes, or private bills. Every change that is made in the possession of them, is a "circulation of value," and at every turn must needs yield some portion of profit to the community, if the note is finally paid, and then its value as a circulating medium makes a pause, or altogether ceases, as the case may be.

From these broad and general views we shall retire into a consideration of operations that may be more easily understood, being direct and palpable, in every move.

In the following pro forma statement, exact amounts are not even aimed at—the whole purpose being to note the various chief circulations of values.

- Let us suppose—
1. There is on a certain plantation in the interior of South Carolina, a quantity of cotton in the seed, (that will yield 1,000 lbs. of clean cotton,) which is worth, as it came from the field, $ 80
  2. For costs of transportation to the gin, ginning and packing, transportation to the factor at Charleston, his commissions, charges for store rent, &c. 20
  3. The factor sells the 1,000 lbs. of cotton to the agent of a mill at Lowell, for 100 dollars—the agent's commission on the purchase, and cost of transportation by land and water to Lowell, &c. is 10
  4. This 110 dollars worth of cotton at Lowell is there woven, spun, and printed, and produces 5,000 yards of calico, worth 10 cents per yard, or 500
  5. The goods are sent from Lowell to the agent in Boston, and, with various costs and commissions paid to him, have a value of 515
  6. They are sold to a house in Baltimore, and, with charges for transportation, &c. cost that house 525
  7. To pay house rent, clerk hire, and subsist himself, the Baltimore merchant must have not less than 5 per cent. profit on his sale of this lot of goods to a country merchant, or say 550
  8. To indemnify the country merchant for his expenses variously incurred, charges for transportation, risk and profits, he must gain 20 per cent. on the $550, and his sales amount to 660

Forward circulation $2,885

But with the consumer it may be said that a back circulation commences, and all the exchanges of values are reversed; so that a quantity of cotton which, as it came from the field, was worth only 80 dollars, may, and no doubt oftentimes does, set into motion a circulating medium of 5,770 dollars.* It is on the celerity or slowness of this circulation that the "plentifulness" or "scarcity" of money much depends. If a miser hoards 1,000 silver dollars, they are no more useful than their weight in bricks. But if he takes them out of his chest, and builds a house with them, an active value is spread among the working people, and it goes on to accumulate values, perhaps, in the shape of new houses—or in some other exchangeable commodity, no matter what.

And in the preceding pro forma statement may be seen the effects of the "American System." If the particular lot of cotton, worth 100 dollars at Charleston, was exported, in an English ship, and manufactured in England, the circulation of values in the 4th and 5th items, (making more than one-third of the whole amount), could not happen in the United States. This is manifest, and we shall not dwell upon it.

*The reader will please to recollect that the consumption of cotton in the United States may be placed at about 100,000,000 lbs.—or so it would have been in the present year had the currency not been disturbed. Add up the domestic "CIRCULATIONS OF VALUE," then, which are dependent on the home manufacture of this huge amount of cotton, regarding only the regular mutations which are above described! If 1,000 lbs. give so much, what will 100 millions of pounds give? Work it by the rule of three! The principle will extend to the aggregate produced. We appeal to all business men—to every man who understands the first rules of arithmetic.

But to return to the preceding statement. If money is "plenty," the planter, on depositing his cotton, draws on the factor, the factor has the note of the agent discounted, and the agent realizes his draught on the house at Lowell, and so it goes on through the whole of the primary, or secondary, exchanges, in a week's time for each series, and the money derived from each commences new operations, and proceeds without any definite end, branching out into tens of thousands of divisibilities, and entering into the business of tens of thousands of persons. But how must it be when the factor cannot pay the draught of the planter until the money-worth of the cotton is realized from the consumer—the operation will require from twelve to eighteen months, and the "scarcity" of money be felt by all the parties, as well as by all who are dependent on them respectively.* The general business of the United States is performed on a credit system, except that vital and important part which pertains to first labor, and the money used in the payment of daily or weekly wages, vivifies the whole; and thus it works: the planter draws on his factor, and the latter pays the draught, because the note given to him by the agent has been discounted, or the money is paid, for the reason that the agent has made a draught on the principal at Lowell, for which the bank has given him money, and so on through all the changes: but if the bank declines the exchange of its notes, or money, for the notes of individuals offered, all the operations must await their own time, or a great reduction of prices and profits ensue, in every department of this circulation of values. Certain Cobbeitians talk about the establishment of a specie currency—that would reduce the circulation of values, and reduce wages, perhaps, two-thirds of their present general amount, and what would be gained by this? Price, we admit, is only a comparative term—but a five dollar note of the bank of the United States is worth rather more than five silver dollars, on account of the convenience of its transportation, and why should all the habits of society be unlinged by the extinguishment of such a currency, and labor be reduced from 100 to 33 cents per day? There is a great objection to a paper currency when it does not truly represent money, by being reducible into solid cash; but while it may be, it is the agent of uncounted blessings, and especially to the laboring poor. The only thing to be desired is to keep it in due bounds, by safe checks and wholesome balances; such as we had between the national and state banks, a little while ago.

If we have measurably succeeded in making ourselves understood, the reflecting reader, like ourselves, will be afraid to mention a sum as the probable amount of the circulation of values, for the magnitude of the subject seems to place it without the limits of our comprehension, though, as it is with reference to space, we can comprehend that it is incomprehensible; and that is a great point gained: for in even thus comprehending, we must believe in the incomprehensible. So all believe except the wretched fools who suppose that all things happened "by chance"—without reflecting, that there must have been a pre-existing cause to give the power of action even to "chance." These things are humbly suggested—and for the simple and sole purpose of repeating, that a great point is gained, when, with the evidence of indisputable facts before us, we are able to comprehend that some things are not comprehensible, that we may believe.

And now to the application of the preceding remarks. The mighty aggregations of values, with the swiftness of the circulations, essentially depend on the soundness and uniformity of the currency—which is, let us say 125 millions in bank notes, which bank notes have value on 25 millions in specie, and which specie remains, or is made useful, on confidence. "Caution is the parent of security"—and very wise, and very cool-thinking men, only, should meddle with the currency of a country! The ups and downs of hurrah party-politics should no more be permitted to approach it, than the Caliban, of Shakspeare, (in the play of the "Tempest"), have had an introduction into the nuptial bed of the chaste Miranda, to begin a new begetting of horrid monsters there. The matter that belongs to the application is designed to be the subject of another essay. In the mean time we offer the following extract from the speech of Henry Brougham, now belittled by the title of lord Brougham, in opening a speech in August last on the bill for a recharter of the bank of England:

He "begged to state that he would be the last man to express an approval of any measure, if he thought that its results would be to lead, by however long a process, to a depreciation of the currency of the kingdom. It was absolutely and imperatively necessary for the safety of all interests in this country, mercantile or otherwise—for the stability of trade and agriculture—that there should be no further tampering with the currency, (hear, hear), and that no attempt or proceeding should be sanctioned by parliament, or the executive government, which could by any remote possibility, cause any change in the value of the circulating medium."

It was not easy to decide whether precedence should be given to the insertion of the report of the judiciary committee of the senate, or to the dissent of the minority to the report of the committee of ways and means of the house of representatives concerning the pension fund. We have, however, given a place to the former, for one reason, perhaps, that it was the unanimous act of the committee,* and so stands more fully in opposition to the report made to the other house. And, as the same general argument prevails in both papers, it does not seem necessary to present more than one of them, at a time when room is so much needed by us. The reader, to form the more correct conclusions on this subject, should have before him the report of the committee of ways and means, inserted in the last REGISTER. Perhaps, a better understanding might be obtained if the argument of the attorney general was also given—but we cannot get space for it. The ground taken by him, however, sufficiently appears in the reports alluded to. It seems clearly admitted that pensions must be paid at the bank of the United States, and its offices, or under charge of the bank, in certain other cases prescribed by law; but the right in the secretary of war to remove the deposit of what the bank considers pension money, is in the supposition that certain laws are not pension laws, though so officially called over and over again, as shewn in the report made to the senate; and it is further said, that the law gives to the secretary of war no power over the public deposits—though the secretary of the treasury may exert such power on certain occasions, &c. two instances being given in which the war secretary retraced his steps in this very matter, on the remonstrance of the bank. And it is manifest that the present order must be withdrawn, or that the pensioners will not be paid, unless congress shall pass an act to relieve the bank of its responsibilities in this case, when the bank will gladly relinquish the agency, for it is a very burthensome one, as is shewn in the letter of the president of one the new deposit banks, at N. York, published in the last REGISTER.

Some years ago, a person permitted (for his own purposes), a small sum of money to accumulate and remain in our hands. He suddenly became a bankrupt, and petitioned for relief under the insolvent laws of the state. Whereupon five processes were served upon us about the money due—each individually claiming it. The debt was freely acknowledged to all the parties—and yet we were harassed in attendances at court, time after time, as a witness. Thus worried, it was respectfully asked, and leave obtained of the court, to say, that so many dollars and cents stood on our books to the credit of the bankrupt, which would be paid into court in five minutes, or placed in the hands of either of the parties, as the court should be pleased to decide. The court then released us from further attendance; and when the claim was established by the proper authority, it was instantly satisfied. So stands the bank—the extra clerk hire and labor expended in paying the pensions far exceeds the profits derivable from the use of the pension money—but the law, as the bank believes, has required this duty of them, as one of the onerous conditions of its charter, and simply asks that the law will relieve them of all responsibility on the subject, as is proposed in the bill reported by Mr. Polk, from the committee of ways and means. If it is right that the secretary of war should have the disposition or charge of the money, let Mr. Polk's bill pass, and all the difficulty is over. If it is not right that such disposition or charge should be made—what remedy would remain to the bank, if the court decided, that it had wrongfully parted with money, expressly appropriated, and placed in its possession, for the payment of certain meritorious individuals, for services rendered? In such a case, every one of these might sustain an action against the bank, if, (from any cause), not paid the money respectively due them.

We must confess our surprise, after what has happened, that the secretary of war should have again attempted such a proceeding. We rather expected that he would have followed the course pursued by Mr. Duane; and, as it is morally certain that the bill reported by Mr. Polk will not be passed into a law—perhaps not pass either house of congress, it is certain that the bank will hold on to the money, as it ought, until lawfully relieved of the responsibility of a just distribution of it, by the expiration of the period of its charter, March, 1836. Future deposits for the payment of pensions, may not be made in it—the new deposit banks may be arranged for that duty, in the power assumed; but as this money went into the bank according to law, there is no power to take it out unless in concert with the law; as the fact of the bill reported by Mr. Polk conclusively shews. Why such a law, if lawful power already existed to remove the pension money? And all that can be done in this new war against the bank, is—to suffer the money, at present deposited, to be paid, by it, to those to whom it belongs, and refuse to send other moneys to the bank, on account of pensions. Thus "the government" may take the "responsibility," and relieve the bank of it, hereafter—without the enactment of a new law, though existing laws declare that pensions shall be paid by the bank of the United States; presuming, however that the pension money must first be deposited therein.

A great effort is making in Pennsylvania, by petitioning the legislature, praying for its action that the public deposits may be restored to the bank of the United States. Saturday last, being the time fixed for opening proposals for a permanent loan of $729,354, at Harrisburgh, it was found that not a single offer had been made. Under present prospects, the public works of Pennsylvania must be discontinued, and great public loss, as well as much private distress thereby ensue.

We have been promised a currency, and by high authority too, better than that which the bank of the United States furnished.

On Tuesday last we paid 5 per cent. discount on a note of one of the banks at Hartford, Con. and 3 per cent. discount on one of those issued by a bank at Pittsburgh, Pa. in exchange for Baltimore bank notes. We do not know the present shaving tariff at Hartford and Pittsburgh, but venture nothing in saying that the notes of the banks alluded to, at home, are, together, 3 or 4 per cent. more valuable than any Baltimore bank notes there. And on the same day, a gentleman of Kentucky, paying us a small bill, was careful to select Baltimore paper, which he had bought at 3 per cent. discount. The "safety fund" bank notes are at 2 per cent. discount in the city of New York, and, for one or two days, were at 5! Some arrangements are said to have been made for the relief of these banks, by which the discount receded as stated above. The shaving of bank notes is now a mighty business, and employs hundreds of thousands of dollars. Exchange on England remains below "par." That is, say 9 per cent. below the real par.

The committee on post offices and post roads of the house of representatives, have made a report that it is inexpedient to restore to the post office department the sum of 1,103,927 dollars, which, at different periods, since the establishment of that department, have been paid into the treasury of the United States. But no part of this sum has been paid into the treasury for several years last past.

THE PRESSURE, &c.

Great meetings of the people are holding in many of the states at which memorials to congress are adopted, praying relief from the pressure on the money market, by a restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the United States. The citizens of Virginia are all alive on this subject, but rather more, perhaps, on what they regard a violent seizure of the public purse, than on account of the deranged state of the currency that has followed it. A few meetings of a different character have been "gotten" up in Pennsylvania, and by persons who, before the veto of the bank bill, would have pronounced it treason against the "democracy" of Pennsylvania to suppose that the events which have happened could take place.

We have fresh accounts of the proceedings of, perhaps, one hundred meetings for a restoration of the deposits, in the current week. At some of those held in Virginia, lately, very strong language was used.

We noticed in our last the prospect of things at Lowell. Since then a large number of girls have "turned out" to prevent a reduction of wages, and they committed some things which females ought not have done, such as processions through the streets, "marching ankle-deep in the mud" and "waving their handkerchiefs and scarfs," &c. and one or two of them delivered public speeches. They also made an attempt to break the banks, by demands for specie, in large numbers—but it ended only in their own shame. The chiefs have been dismissed, and new supplies from the country rushed in to take their places; but they generally submitted to the reduction proposed, and which had been proposed in kindness to them; for, if not submitted to, the mills, in the present state of business, would have been, of sheer necessity, closed.

The melancholy truth is—that a large reduction of wages must be submitted to by the working people, generally, or dismissions from employment ensue. The reduced money-value of all sorts of products, and the difficulty of obtaining money, are such, that one or the other must take place. High wages cannot much longer be paid in any branch of business, unless there is a change in the state of the money market. In many branches, mechanics would now gladly obtain even 50 cents per day "funding themselves."

Many of the eastern factories have stopped—and 1,100 persons were discharged from 4 of them only. It is said that most of the iron furnaces in New Jersey are, or soon will be, out of blast. In Philadelphia official permits must be obtained to occupy a part of the street for building purposes—at this time last year, such permits issued were more than six hundred, and at a corresponding date in the present year amounted only to eight. Here is a matter about which there cannot be a mistake. The same operation is going on every where. Many additional failures have happened in the chief cities. The general rate of money is 2½ per cent. a month, and a vast business is doing at that price.

Let the working people look at the following—

The Leeds Intelligencer states that the cotton loom weavers at Oldham have full work, but their wages are most miserable, as the best workmen cannot get more, on an average, than 5s. 6d. per week—that is, at the real par 132 cents. [Will they agree to be reduced to this English paper state?]

The bank of New Brunswick, New Jersey, has suspended payment. The branch of the Susquehanna bank, at Baltimore, has been withdrawn—but it is published that its notes issued will be paid as usual, and all be retired. A draft of the 4th auditor has been dishonored at Cincinnati, by the new deposit bank. The contractors for carrying the mails are very clamorous for the money which they have earned. The working people, at several places, are protesting against the "due bills" issued by their employers, as they ought, if the latter could satisfy them in money. The alternative is, to receive "due bills" or be discharged, and the choice is a sad one.

Wheat, at New York 90 cents. Flour, at Pittsburgh 2 8½ bbl.—at Wheeling 2 50—at Cincinnati 3 a 3 12½. Whiskey at same place, 20 a 24 cents. gal. Nothing doing in bacon, pork or lard, as the prices offered will not pay the cost of the packer. Cincinnati is the greatest pork market in the United States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 7th and Paris to the 8th January, both inclusive.

GRREAT BRITAIN.

Earl Fitzwilliam was determined to persevere with his motion to repeal the corn laws. The misunderstanding existing between the governments of England and Russia, through the intervention of prince Esterhazy, the Austrian ambassador, was in a fair way to be adjusted. Considerable importations of wheat had been made into England from Van Deiman's land; to which latter place 6,000 convicts had been transported during the last year. A dreadful storm had swept over England and the north of Europe, causing great destruction both on land and at sea; many lives were lost and several houses burnt by lightning. There had been a decrease in the revenue for the quarter made up to the 5th of January of £91,547, as compared with the same quarter last year. The Columbine, one of the vessels of Lander's expedition up the Niger, had arrived in England. Mr. Lander and lieutenant Allan, had proceeded in the Alburka steamer up that river, and were sanguine of ultimately establishing a successful system of commercial intercourse between England and Africa.

FRANCE.

The papers contain various speculations touching an anticipated rupture between England and France, on the one side, and Russia on the other; but these are not borne out by the friendly tenor of the congratulatory address of the ambassador of the latter power to the King of France, on new year's day. Considerable naval preparations were being made, which we presume gave birth to the rumors in question. The chambers would, it is thought, vote the necessary appropriations to pay the installment due to the U. States, and thus settle that difference. The departure of the Duke of Orleans, for America was to take place the present month.

SPAIN.

The affairs of the queen were rather more promising; but still without material change. The contest between the contending parties had assumed the character of a guerilla warfare. Morillo's troops had again entered Portugal and captured 40 Carlists; and the insurgents of Navarre, after a severe conflict, had been beaten by general Lorenzo.

STILL LATER.

From London papers to the 18th Jan. inclusive.

It was calculated in England that the present situation of this country would seriously interfere with the manufacturing industry of that country, as all the advices from here admonished the manufacturing and shipping houses not to send out goods as there was no money to pay for them, and the manufacturers were, in many instances, acting upon them.

The affairs of Spain have assumed a new and more important form. A captain general, Llander, who appears to act in concert with the municipality of Barcelona, and to have, among other distinguished adherents, generals Quesado and Moillio, had sent an embassy to the queen intimating to her as the wishes of the province, 1st, that the Spaniards receive a representative government, with the liberties connected with it—2d, the suppression of abbeys and monks—3d, the liberty of the press—4th, the reform of the clergy—5th, the distribution of its property among the people, and 6th, that the tithes and other imposts, injurious to farmers, be suppressed. Llander has 45,000 men at his command; his address to the queen was backed by 50,000 signatures, and the people of Catalonia had risen en masse in support of his demand. The queen is said to have returned Llander's address, without giving any satisfaction as to the course she would pursue. The queen, however, yielding to the pressure of circumstances, it is said, has changed her ministers, and consented to the convocation of the cortes. The president of the new cabinet is said to be the marquis de las Amarillas. Many distinguished constitutionalists have returned to Spain. Advices from Lisbon state that Don Miguel's army had suffered greatly from sickness, and was reduced to 6,000; his fortifications were strong and would require much greater force than Don Pedro's to dislodge him.

The eastern parts of Russia are suffering dreadfully from the effects of famine.

There is a report that earl Grey was about to resign.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

February 21. Mr. Southard presented three petitions from New Jersey, praying for a restoration of the deposits, one of them signed by 2,785 voters of Burlington county. He spoke highly of the character of the memorialists, and, out of these petitions and others, attempted to shew that the legislature of the state did not express the voice of the people on this matter. And these petitions, he also said, were signed by many friends of the administration.

Mr. Wilkins presented resolutions adopted by two of the local banks at Pittsburgh, stating the general distress and praying for relief. He also presented a set of resolutions passed at a large meeting of the people, with the same character and bearing; and he spoke highly of the respectability of the actors in these proceedings.

Mr. Sprague presented a memorial of 626 citizens of Portland, Me. in relation to the distresses of the country, and praying for relief. He spoke of the respectability and business of the signers, and among other things stated that the branch bank in that city had actually sustained the local banks. He spoke at considerable length, and was followed by Mr. Shepley, who read an ANONYMOUS communication from the "National Intelligencer" to shew the intention of the bank. A long and very lively debate ensued; in which Messrs. Sprague Forsyth and Chambers took part. The latter explained the late "run" on the branch at Savannah, and placed that affair in a very ridiculous, but censurable, light. [We must recur to this debate, if we can, for parts of it are uncommonly interesting.] Mr. Webster rose to deliver his sentiments, but on the suggestion that important executive business required attention, gave way, and the senate went into secret session, and so remained until the hour of adjournment.

February 22. [For the first time this session, the senate sat on Saturday.]

Mr. Tyler said he rose to present the resolutions recently adopted by the two houses of assembly of the state of Virginia, expressive of their opinions and views relative to the conduct of the executive with regard to the bank of the United States and the deposits of the public revenue. He proposed to abstain, at this time, from making any remarks on the subjects embraced in the resolutions, other than to say, that, concurring as he did most fully in the views expressed by the legislature of his state, he should use all the means in his power to carry them into effect. He should at another time, more convenient to the senate, make such remarks as the importance of the subject required. He should, for the present, merely move for the printing of the resolutions, and their reference to the committee on finance.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. Rives rose and said:

Mr. President: The senate will indulge me, I hope, standing in the position I do, with a few remarks on the subject of the resolutions just read. It is very far from my intention to attempt to impugn, in any manner, the force of those resolutions, or to derogate, in the slightest degree, from the high respect to which they are entitled here and elsewhere. On the contrary, I recognise them as the legitimate expression of the opinion of my state, conveyed through the only authentic organ known to her constitution and laws.

The senate will have perceived, from the reading of the resolutions, that it is my misfortune to entertain, and to have expressed, on the grave questions now occupying the public mind, opinions very different from those asserted by the resolutions. Notwithstanding this difference of opinion, I should feel it my duty, as one of the representatives of Virginia on this floor, to conform to the views expressed by her legislature, if, in the circumstances in which I am placed, I could do so without dishonor. I hold it, sir, to be a vital principle of our political system, one indispensable to the preservation of our institutions, that the representative, whether a member of this or the other house, is bound to conform to the opinions and wishes of his constituents authentically expressed; or if he be unable to do so, from over-ruling and imperious considerations operating upon his conscience or honor, to surrender his trust into the hands of those from whom he derived it, that they may select an agent who can better carry their views into effect.

On all occasions involving questions of expediency only, it is, I conceive, the bounden duty of the representative to conform implicitly to the instructions of the constituent body, whose those instructions are to be carried into execution by a legislative act, which, as a mandate of the public will, prescribes and directs what shall be done for the public good. But where the instructions contemplate a declaration of principles or opinions, which are contrary to the sincere and honest convictions of the representative, as there is no means of forcing the assent of the understanding to abstract propositions, the only course left to him is by the surrender of his commission, to put it in the power of his constituents to confer it on another whose opinions correspond with their own.

To apply to these principles to my own case, I do not hesitate to say, that if the instructions of the legislature of my state had required me specifically to vote for a law or other legislative act, providing for the restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the United States, however highly inexpedient I deem such a measure to be, I should nevertheless have felt it my duty to give the vote required.

Such it will be recollected, was the precise demand of the memorial of the citizens of Richmond presented a few days ago by my honorable colleague, and which concluded by asking, that congress "would provide by law for the immediate restoration of the public moneys to the bank of the U. States." But, sir, this is not the shape in which the question is presented to me, by the resolutions of the general assembly of my state, or by the proceedings pending in this body. Those resolutions instruct the senators of Virginia, in general terms, "to use their best exertions to procure the adoption by congress of proper measures for restoring the public moneys to the bank of the U. States." Now, sir, I am bound to inquire, what are those proper measures, in the contemplation of the legislature of Virginia.

We all know that the only measures proposed, or contemplated in this body, are the two declaratory resolutions offered by the senator from Kentucky; the first affirming that the conduct of the president with reference to the removal of the public deposits, was a dangerous and unconstitutional assumption of power; the second, declaring the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury for that removal, to be unsatisfactory and insufficient. When the latter of these resolutions, together with the report of the secretary of the treasury, was referred some days ago to the committee of finance, that committee did not report a bill, or joint resolution for the restoration of the deposits, but simply a recommendation, that the senate adopt the declaratory resolution of the senator from Kentucky. In short, it is now avowed and understood on all hands, that all that is deemed necessary, or will be proposed here, to effect a restoration of the public money to the bank of the U. States, is a mere declaration by congress, of the insufficiency of the reasons assigned for their removal.

To the only measures, then, on which I shall be called to carry into effect the instructions of the legislature of my state are, the declaratory resolutions moved by the senator from Kentucky, and now depending before the senate. That these resolutions are, in the estimation of the general assembly of Virginia, proper measures—that the opinions and principles declared by them, are believed by the general assembly to be correct and well founded—it would be unpardonable blindness to the language and tenor of their instructions not to see. At the same time, it is well known to the senate, that on each of the propositions declared in these resolutions, I had (and I will take leave to add, after the most careful and anxious investigation,) come to opposite conclusions, which I had earnestly asserted and maintained on this floor. I am, therefore, placed by the instructions of the legislature of my state, in this dilemma—either to vote for the declaratory resolutions of the senator from Kentucky, and thereby express opinions which I not only do not entertain, but the reverse of which I have sincerely and earnestly maintained on this floor; or, by voting against them, to oppose the only measures which are likely to come before this body, having in view the restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the United States, and thus appear in the attitude of disregarding and thwarting the declared wishes of the general assembly of Virginia. I am sure I but respond to the honorable feelings of all who hear me, in saying, that the first branch of the alternative is impossible, while the latter is no less forbidden by my principles, and a proper sense of my duty to the constituted authorities of my state. The only course left to me then, is one which the senate can be at no loss to anticipate.

Before I close the few remarks with which I have felt myself called on to trouble the senate, I beg leave to say, that while I recognise implicitly the resolutions just read as the legitimate and constitutional expressions of the opinion of my state, I wish not to be understood as saying that they express the real public opinion of the state—that of the PEOPLE. On the contrary, my firm and clear conviction is, that the sentiments of the people in the present instance are not in unison with the proceedings of the legislative authority. The manifestations of popular sentiment already commencing in various quarters of the state—the principles and opinions heretofore steadily cherished by Virginia—multiplied communications received from the most respectable sources; and my own knowledge, I may be permitted to add, of a people with whom I have been connected, in relations of public service, for now near twenty years, assure me that they are not; and the revolution of a few months, will, I confidently believe, render the fact manifest to all the world. But in the regulation of my official conduct here, I am not permitted to look beyond the constitutional expression of the opinion of the state, by its regular and proper organ. If a senator were allowed to set up against the public opinion of his state as officially and solemnly declared by her legislature, a hypothetical public opinion, which may or may not be that of the people of the state, it is obvious that a door would be opened for the total evasion of all effective responsibility of this body to public opinion. It is on the legislatures of the states that the constitution has devolved the choice of members of this body, and the same legislatures must be the interpreters of the public opinion of their respective states to the senators chosen by them, whenever an occasion shall arise which may call for a solemn manifestation of that opinion.

This is indeed the only practicable mode of bringing the opinion of the sovereign communities represented in this body to act, with authoritative influence, on its proceedings; and when it is considered that the senate is, by the greater permanency of its official tenure, further removed from the salutary control of the representative system than any other branch of the government, all will see the necessity of keeping open a clear and designated channel by which public opinion may promptly reach it in an authoritative form, and be made effectual on its deliberations. It is thus, essential to the practical supremacy of the popular will itself, that the state legislatures should be recognised as the authentic and constitutional exponents of the popular opinion of the respective states, in all relations with this body. If, in any instance, the legislatures of the states shall mistake the opinions of the people, it is, as I conceive, for the people themselves, and not for us, to correct the mistake.

These, Mr. President, are very briefly the opinions I entertain on the delicate questions presented for my consideration by the instructions of the legislature of my state just read; and the only alternative they leave me, in the circumstances in which I am placed, is to surrender the trust with which I have been honored as a member of this body into the hands of those from whom I received it. I know well, Mr. President, and I feel how much of honor and of satisfaction I give up in abandoning my seat on this floor. I abandon what I have ever regarded the highest honor of my public life—an honor than which none higher, in my opinion, can be presented to the ambition of an American citizen. I sacrifice social and kindly relations with many members of this body—I would fain hope with all—which have been the source of the highest satisfaction to me here, and the remembrance of which I shall cherish with sincere pleasure in the retirement whither I go. I know and feel the weight of these sacrifices, but great as they are, I make them without a sigh, as the most emphatic homage I can render to a principle I believe vital to the republican system, and indispensable to the safe and salutary action of our political institutions.

The resolutions were then referred to the committee on finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKean rose and said, that he had on hand numerous petitions and memorials, from large numbers of citizens of Pennsylvania, all complaining of deep distress, and protesting against the removal of the public deposits from the United States bank, and praying for their restoration. He said he had, for several days, anxiously sought an opportunity to present them, but could not obtain the floor. True, he said, in accordance with the humor of the times, some of them were expressed in pretty strong terms. He believed, however, they would all come within the parliamentary understanding of respectful language; and to save time, as he now had the floor, he would ask permission to send them to the chair collectively, he said that they had, referred to the committee on finance, and be printed: which was agreed to.

The papers sent to the chair by Mr. McKean, consisted of the proceedings of a meeting of boot and shoe makers and shoe deniers of the city of Philadelphia; a memorial of nearly 700 cittizens of Portsville and vicinity; the memorial of citizens of Schuylkill county, and the memorial of the president and directors of the Western bank of Philadelphia.

The chair also communicated the petition of a number of the inhabitants of the township of Moyamensing, in the state of Pennsylvania, praying for the restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the United States, which was read, referred to the committee on finance, and ordered to be printed.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion to refer the memorials of the citizens of Portland and of Bangor, Maine, on the subject of the deranged currency and distress of the country, consequent upon the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States; and, after a debate, in which Messrs. Webster, Forsyth, Chambers and Kane severally took part, the question was taken, and the motion for a reference carried.

The other business attended to will sufficiently appear in its progress.

February 24. After other business—

Mr. Smith rose and presented several memorials and resolutions from New Haven and Hartford, embracing the proceedings of the Hartford bank, the Phoenix bank, the Connecticut River bank and the Hartford fire insurance company, all praying for the restoration of the deposits.

In presenting these documents, Mr. Smith made some remarks on the character and extent of the existing pressure, its cause, and the remedy which was demanded by public opinion.

The petitions and resolutions were laid on the table, Mr. Smith postponing his motion to read them, in consequence of the arrival of the hour for the special order.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, &c. when

Mr. Tyler rose and addressed the senate in opposition to the removal of the deposits, and in favor of their restoration, until half past 3 o'clock, when, having concluded,

On motion of Mr. Hill, the senate adjourned.

February 25. Mr. Clayton submitted resolutions calling for information concerning the pension agents—and also as to the amount of money that had been received for postages, in a certain period.

Mr. Fretlinghausen presented the petition of 810 of the citizens of Cumberland county, N. J. praying for a restoration of the deposits, and made some remarks on the general subject, as well as with reference to his own position. He was followed by Mr. Clayton, in a very animated speech.

Mr. Wright presented a petition from Troy, N. Y. praying for a restoration of the deposits, and bore a testimony of the respectability of the signers. Mr. Clay said that the vote of Troy was 2,200, and that the petition was signed by 1,730 persons.

These memorials being read were referred and ordered to be printed.

The further consideration of the memorials from North Carolina on the subject of the finances and the distressed state of the country, was called for by Mr. Mangum, and a lively debate followed, in which Messrs. Brown, Forsyth, Chambers and Porter, (the new senator from Louisiana for the first time), took part.

Mr. Webster moved that the senate postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill from the house making an appropriation for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensions for the year 1834, and in the course of his remarks noticed an article in the "Globe" which rudely charged him, and the committee of finance, with withholding the bill, and imputing bad motives; but Mr. Webster shewed, from the journal of the senate, and even the "Globe" itself, that this bill, received from the house on the 6th February, was reported by the committee to the senate on the 10th—and so the committee was relieved of any particular care over the subject. The bill was read a second and third time, and passed, without opposition, as such bills usually are.

February 26. Mr. Chambers, at the request of the committee deputed for the purpose, presented a memorial from Baltimore against the restoration of the deposits, &c. the signers to which were said to amount to 3,558. The memorial was read and ordered to be printed, with the names of the signers appended.

After some other proceedings, Mr. Webster moved that the senate should proceed to the consideration of executive business—which Mr. Chambers opposed, an account of the illness of his colleague, Mr. Kenf. Mr. W. then waived his motion, but would call it up again to-morrow.

Mr. McKean presented a petition from Berks county, Pa. signed by 1,858 persons praying a restoration of the deposits, and referred to a letter addressed to him saying that about one-half of the signers had never been opposed to gen. Jackson; and added he himself knew some of them to be among his warmest friends. Mr. McK. also presented the proceedings of the mechanics, &c. of the Northern Liberties (Phila.) in favor of the bank, and one from 51 persons of Schuylkill county, against the bank.

Mr. Clay made some pointed remarks on the petition from Berks, and, after referring to certain facts shewn at the last presidential election, proceeded to say—

He hoped he might be allowed to state a single fact, which would show the impressions upon the public mind in regard to the present distress. In the town of Reading, in the county of Berks, he understood that five hundred votes were given for the present chief magistrate, at a late election, and only one hundred against him; yet five hundred of the inhabitants of the same town had subscribed the petition setting forth the existing distress, and praying the aid of congress to afford them some effectual relief.

From all quarters from whence memorials had issued, Mr. C. said, we learn a similar state of facts. Gentlemen may be assured that this is no party struggle that now agitates the country. It is a question between the will of one man and that of twelve millions of people. It is a question between power—ruthless, relentless, inexorable power—on the one hand, and the strong, deep-felt sufferings of a vast community, on the other. He trusted that these memorials would be the means of softening his heart, and presenting to him the true condition of our afflicted country, and induce him, to the utmost of his ability, to afford that relief to it which he and his secretary could instantly supply.

Mr. Clayton made a few observations, to show how very far the petitioners for restoring the deposits, &c. in these conflicting petitions, exceeded the number of those who approved of their removal.

Mr. Clay presented a memorial from a large number of citizens of Louisville, Kentucky, on the subject of the pecuniary distresses of the country, ascribing them to the removal of the deposits, and praying for their restoration; and moved to refer them to the committee of finance, and print them.

A debate then ensued, which lasted until a late hour, in which Messrs. Clay, Clayton, Tallmadge, Wright, Ewing, Webster, Chambers and Forsyth took part, when the senate adjourned.

February 27. Mr. Webster presented several petitions for a restoration of the deposits, &c. viz. from the presidents and directors of all the banks in New Bedford; from Warren county, New York, signed by 303 persons; the major part of whom say they have been friendly to the present administration; and from 866 citizens of Northampton county, Pennsylvania. Mr. W. added that the two last petitions had been sent to him, because that his views were supposed to be more in accordance with those of the petitions than were those of the senators from the states named.

Mr. Clay made some remarks on certain observations of Mr. Wright, in relation to the Troy petition recently presented; to which Mr. W. replied. [Mr. C. stated some highly interesting facts, but we cannot get room for them.]

Mr. Webster presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury lay before the senate the monthly returns of the bank of the United States, from August, 1823, to February, 1834, inclusive.

Mr. Poindexter presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate, copies of any order or treasury draught which may have been given by that department for the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Planters' bank at Natchez, specifying the amount of the deposit, the bank or banks to which said money is removed, or intended to be removed; whether the same is required for the public service at the place to which it is so transferred, or intended to be transferred; and, if not, for what other purpose the said deposits are directed to be withdrawn from said banks; and, also, that he transmit copies of any letters which may have passed between any officer of the treasury department and the president of the said bank on the subject.

Mr. Poindexter said he had no remarks to make on presenting this resolution, other than simply to state, that the secretary of the treasury had directed a transfer from the Planters' bank at Natchez, of more than a million of dollars. The information was, that this money was to be transferred to N. York, to aid some of the failing banks of that state. Be this as it may, the transfer will prevent the bank of Natchez from discounting as hitherto, for the money will not be expended in that part of the country. He now moved that the resolution be printed; when it came up, he would make such observations as the occasion called for.

Mr. Webster suggested that Mr. P. should call for the consideration of his resolution at once. Mr. Hill objected to a present consideration of it; on which Mr. Poindexter said—The member from New Hampshire, he said, seemed to be touched, and well he might; for, when facts came to be developed, they would shew that a draught had been made on the Planters' bank, at Natchez, for the purpose of sustaining the failing banks in New York; thereby preventing the Natchez bank from extending the usual accommodations to the people of that section of the country. He must say, however, that the United States branch, at Natchez, had acted most liberally, and, by discounting freely, had done much to prevent the disastrous consequences of the withdrawal of so large an amount from the Planters' bank. He would not now detain the senate with any further remarks, but he would say that these things sufficiently shewed that there was "something rotten in the state of Denmark!"

Mr. Clayton presented a petition from Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying for relief through a restoration of the deposits; and stated the reasons why it was sent to him. On the authority of information received, he stated the condition of the people of this county three months ago and now; then all was cheerful and prosperous, now two thousand persons were suddenly deprived of employment, and wandering about the country, &c.

Mr. Tyler rose to present two memorials on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and deranged currency of the country, praying for relief—one signed by 500 citizens of the town of Wheeling, Virginia, and the other from 500 citizens of the town of Norfolk, in the same state. These memorials came; he said, from the extremes of the state—from the Ohio river to the Atlantic seaboard.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after remaining in secret session some hours, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 21. Mr. J. Q. Adams, on a proposition to amend the journal, took an opportunity to pronounce a beautiful eulogium on the character of Mr. WIRT, which we are compelled to postpone, but, surely, will insert.

After which the bill to compensate Susan Deacatur was taken up and discussed, and supported and opposed at some length—without coming to any decision in the committee of the whole, which had leave to sit again.

Mr. Thomas, of Louisiana, observed, that to-morrow was the 22d, [WASHINGTON'S birth day] a day when it was not usual for public bodies to sit. He therefore wished to move that the house, when it did adjourn, would adjourn to Monday next.

Objection being made, he moved for the suspension of the rule. It was suspended accordingly, yeas 114, noes 7; and thereupon the house adjourned over to Monday.

Monday, Feb. 24. The house was occupied the whole of this day with receiving petitions, and hearing the discussions that grew out of them, though proceeding no further than Pennsylvania in the call for petitions.

Petitions in favor of a restoration of the deposits were presented as follows—

From Bangor, Maine, signed by 238 persons—from six banks in Connecticut—from the people of New Haven; from Troy, signed by 1,730 persons; from Burlington county, N. J. signed by 2,785 persons; two from the interior of Pennsylvania, by Mr. Foltz; from Berks county, Pennsylvania, signed by 1,850 persons. And here the presentation of petitions for the day was arrested by the debate that ensued, of which we cannot make room for a sketch.

Mr. Muhlenberg, on presenting the last mentioned petition, made some remarks to shew that this petition did not represent the wishes of a majority of his constituents, and used some expressions that were deemed offensive, which produced an inquiry from Mr. McKennan, and a desultory debate followed, in which Messrs. Binney, Walmough, and others took part. The petition had been drawn up both in English and German, and Mr. Muhlenberg had detached the latter before its presentation—but it was restored on the suggestion of several members. Then a discussion on printing the names took place, and most of them being in German, it was proposed that they should be printed in that language, and so it was finally agreed by yeas and noes, 112 to 90. In the course of the debate—

Mr. Turrell would oppose, if he stood alone, the printing of all such petitions. It was surprising to him, to hear such an unnecessary expense advocated. There was among others, a petition already printed on this subject with sixty-two pages of names, at a considerable expense. Those petitions, he believed, were got up originally by the bank, and those who procured the signatures were paid for their trouble out of Mr. Biddle's breeches' pocket. He felt that it was time for the house to take a stand, and save the treasury this expense which was sought to be thrown upon it. It was possible that many of those who signed the petitions from the large cities, were stimulated by the assurance that their names would appear in a printed book.

Mr. Crockett said: Sir, as I am the only person from Tennessee in this house who am opposed to the administration, I hope I may get a few words in; that I may say what are my own notions on these matters—sir, I think the member from N. York, (Mr. Turrell), who has just spoke, has been a little testy in his objections; he talks much about this, as if it was a great matter. Sir, are we to stick at such trifles as a few dollars in the printing a matter so important. It seems, sir, to me to be something like loading a twenty-four pounder to shoot a flea. Sir, is it not so. We are spending 3 or 4,000 dollars in discussing the printing of a matter that perhaps after all will not be 20 cost. But, sir, this is retrenchment; but it is the old rule for retrenching.

I love, sir, to see the petitioners come here, and my life on it, sir, they will come; ay, and from Louisiana, for all that we hear to the contrary; and yet from my own state, every day my letters tell me they wish this question settled.

They know very well in my district the character of the man; who when he takes any thing into his head, will carry it into effect. They knew how I should act in this bank business, for I told them, before I was elected, how I should vote—that I would recharter the bank, and restore the deposits. Sir, I get letters every day from all parts, which tell me these acts are disapproved. The question is now whether we shall be under the old and happy state of things, or have a despot. Sir, the people have a right to tell their grievances, and sir, I tell you they must not be refused—I can't stand it longer—I won't.

Tuesday, Feb. 25. After the morning business—

The house resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, the question being on the motion of Mr. McDuffie to commit the bill, that its provisions might be more fully investigated. This was opposed by Mr. Folk, and a debate ensued. At last the bill was recommitted, as it were by consent.

The Indian appropriation bill next came up—the question being on a motion of Mr. H. Everett to recommit it, which he withdrew, because certain information desired had since been obtained. The bill was read a third time, and the question being on its passage a debate arose which lasted until the adjournment of the house.

Wednesday, Feb. 26. The resolution offered by Mr. Mardis was taken up, and discussed by Mr. Clowney, in opposition to its passage, until the arrival of the hour for the orders of the day.

The house then resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian department for the year 1834. The question being on the third reading of the bill,

Mr. McKay moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The reasons assigned for the motion were the necessity of a more deliberate examination of the items, particularly those which related to the expenditures for agents and transportation of presents, for blacksmiths and gunsmiths, which last item, it was contended, was reported in the Indian annuity bill, as well as the present.

It was replied, that this was a regular appropriation bill; that the funds were required to pay expenses incurred and individuals employed in the Indian country; that the agents were appointed by treaty; and that the items in the bill were precisely the same, except that they were diminished in amount, as in former bills.]

The motion was supported by Mr. McKay, Mr. Conter, Mr. Hawes, Mr. H. Everett, Mr. Fillmore, Mr. Mercer, Mr. L. Williams, Mr. Vinton, Mr. Wilde, and opposed by Mr. Polk, Mr. Sevier, Mr. McKimble, Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Beardsey.

The yeas and noes were finally taken on the motion to recommit, and stood as follows: yeas 105, noes 101.

So the motion to recommit the bill was agreed to, and then the house adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 27. The resolution offered by Mr. Mardis was further discussed, and Mr. Clowney, having spoken to the expiration of the hour, the house proceeded to the orders of the day.

Robert H. Campbell, a member elect from South Carolina in the place of Mr. Singleton, deceased, appeared, was sworn, and took his seat.

The remainder of the sitting was spent in considering the bill to authorise the construction of a bridge across the Potomac, and a bill to provide for the settlement of certain revolutionary claims.

REPORT OF THE PHILADELPHIA COMMITTEE, &c.

The very respectable committee appointed to carry to Washington the memorial of 10,259 citizens of Philadelphia, (to whose names were attached their various professions, business, trades, &c.) made a report of their proceedings to a very numerous meeting, convened at the exchange on the 22d ult. for the purpose of receiving it.

The facts stated by the committee are highly important, especially as they occurred in their interview with the president of the United States, and we shall extract that part entire. Much moderation is observed, as it should be, in this statement, and that it is substantially correct, certified as it is by twenty-one gentlemen of exalted character, cannot admit of a doubt. Hence it assumes the shape of an official paper, in relation to a most interesting subject. And it is worthy of remark, that the private statements made by the members, of like committees from the citizens of New York and Baltimore, astonishingly conform with the facts more precisely and publicly stated by the Philadelphia committee, even in the very words and terms used by the president, in particular cases. As an evidence of this, we heard the intelligent and worthy chairman of the Baltimore committee give a full narrative of what passed in the interview with the president, and, the next day, received New York papers with such an account of what happened to the New York committee, that, on meeting with the chairman alluded to, we laughingly charged him with some sort of second-sight knowledge by which he had made his account so nearly correspond with that of the New York gentlemen, before a publication had reached us on the part of the latter, in the "Commercial Advertiser" of Feb. 15.

After giving a narrative of the incipient proceedings at Washington, as to the presentation of the Philadelphia memorial—the report proceeds:

The memorial having been satisfactorily disposed of in both houses of congress, the delegates thought it respectful to call on the president of the United States, and make known to him the condition, the sufferings and opinions of their constituents. This interview took place by appointment at two o'clock on the 11th of February. The delegates having been severally introduced to the president, were received with such politeness and courtesy of manner, as to justify the expectation of a patient and candid hearing. In this, however, they were disappointed. The chairman had hardly announced in one or two sentences the general nature of our mission, when the president interrupted him, and proceeded in a vehement discourse of more than twenty minutes duration, to announce to us, and through us to our constituents, his opinions and his determinations in reference to the restoration of the deposits, the recharter of the bank, and the future disposition of the public revenue. In the course of those remarks (which as they were long, and somewhat desultory, it is deemed unnecessary to present in detail), the following positions were distinctly assumed by the president:

1. That application for relief must be made to the bank of the United States and not to him; that whatever distress existed in the community (and he believed there was some distress) had been caused by the bank, which was hoarding its specie and curtailing its discounts in order to crush the state banks and compel the government to abandon its policy. That the executive had no power to relieve the distresses of the community, but that the stockholders of the bank might effect that object by electing directors who would conduct its affairs honestly and on principles of Christian benevolence.

2. That the present directors of the bank had violated its charter, by giving to the president the whole power of the bank; a power to use its funds without voucher or receipt. That such a power in the hands of one man, was dangerous to the liberties of the country, and had been used to destroy the elective franchise. That the president of the bank, if an honest man, would not have accepted a trust so unlawful. That for these reasons he regarded the bank as a monster of corruption, which he was determined to put down. That a bank so using its powers ought (as he repeatedly expressed it) to be robbed of those powers.

3. That the law creating the bank of the United States, was in his opinion unconstitutional. That no power to create a national bank was conferred, or intended to be conferred by the constitution—that the provision by which congress was authorized to regulate the currency, had reference only to domestic and foreign coin, and not to paper of any description.

4. That having made up his mind irrevocably upon all these points—Andrew Jackson never would restore the deposits to the bank—Andrew Jackson would never recharter that monster of corruption—that neither persuasion nor coercion, nor the opinions of the people, nor the voice of the legislature, could shake his fixed determination—that sooner than consent to restore the deposits, or recharter the bank, he would undergo the tortures of ten Spanish inquisitions; that sooner than live in a country where such a power prevailed, he would seek an asylum in the wilds of Arabia.

5. It was announced by the president that he meant to continue the present system of collecting the revenue by the state banks, until the experiment had been fully tried, and at all events until the expiration of the charter of the United States bank. That he had no doubt of the success of the experiment, nor that the state banks would answer all the purposes of the country. That he would furnish the country with as good, nay, a better and more solvent currency than that of the national bank—that he had early foreseen and provided against the inclination of the bank of the United States to crush the state banks, and that his interposition alone had saved them from ruin—that he would continue to protect the state banks by all the means in his power.

6. The president admitted that considerable distress had followed the action of the government in relation to the deposits. He had never doubted that brokers and stock speculators, and all who were doing business upon borrowed capital, would suffer severely under the effects of the measure, and that all such people ought to break.

The foregoing paragraphs are believed to contain all the important ideas expressed by the president, in the first part of his discourse to the delegates. In some emphatic expressions his language is accurately preserved, while his numerous repetitions of the same idea in different words, which served unnecessarily to prolong the interview, have been avoided. Once or twice the chairman took occasion to explain that he seemed to misapprehend the position of the delegates; that they had not come to represent the bank or promote its interests, but to lay before him the condition and wishes of citizens of Philadelphia, unconnected with that institution, and engaged in the various departments of commerce and industry. Such explanations, however, produced no visible effect on the tenor of the president's discourse, nor did he allow an opportunity to make those statements as to the condition of this community, with which the delegates were especially charged.

In reference to his declaration, that he would continue the present system of collecting the revenue through the state banks, until the experiment had been fairly tried, one of the delegates inquired, whether he had determined upon any plan by which the country might be relieved in case the experiment failed. His answer was, that he was disposed to be candid, and would explain his views on that point. That in order to restore the currency to the condition intended by the constitution, and place the moneyed concerns of the country where the sages of the constitution found and left them, he proposed to put out of circulation all notes of five dollars and under by placing the public money in such state banks, as would issue no notes below ten dollars—and by forbidding the receipt in payment of the revenue of the notes of all banks, which should issue notes under ten dollars.

That the same process would next be pursued in reference to all notes under twenty dollars, and thus a metallic currency be ensured for all the common purposes of life, while the use of bank notes would be confined to those engaged in commerce.

The same delegate having inquired when he proposed to put this plan into execution, the answer was, not immediately—not until the expiration of the charter of the bank of the United States. Go home, gentlemen, (said he) and tell the bank of the United States to relieve the country by increasing its business. Let the United States bank make no run upon the state banks, and I will take care that the state banks make no run upon her. Let the war between the banks cease, and all will be well in forty-eight hours. The bank of the United States is trying to crush the state banks. Tell the state banks that I will protect them, and that the power of the United States bank is nearly gone, and that it will be compelled to cease its present course. Here one of the delegates observed to the president—we are many of us, sir, connected with state banks, and yet we know of no such warfare between them and the bank of the United States, as you speak of. It does not exist in the city of Philadelphia. There is, on the contrary, the utmost good will and harmony between the United States bank and the other banks of our city, and nearly all the latter are in favor of a recharter. To which the president quickly replied—I know all about it, sir; I know that some of your banks have combined in favor of the bank of the United States; I have examined the whole subject, and understand it better than any of you. I have looked impartially at both sides of the question, and have the best information on the subject, from Maine to New Orleans, from the most undoubted sources. I learn this morning, (Feb. 11), from New York, that stocks are rising, and that money is becoming abundant. Let the directors of the bank pursue their business on principles of Christian benevolence, and all will be well. Let them wind up the business of the bank, without attempting to break down the government, and force a recharter, and it will die with the blessings of thousands; otherwise, it will have the curses of millions. I have read the scriptures, gentlemen, and I find that when Moses ascended the mountain, the children of Israel rebelled, and made a golden calf and worshipped it, and it brought a curse upon them. This bank will be a greater curse. I have no hostility to the bank; I am willing it should expire in peace; but if it does persist in its war with the government, I have a measure in contemplation which will destroy it at once, and which I am resolved to apply, be the consequences to individuals what they may. The bank has in circulation ten millions of checks, which I have no doubt are illegal, and which I will direct the state banks to refuse in payment of the public revenue. These checks must then be returned upon the bank, and will drain her of the specie she is hoarding. This measure I will apply, unless the bank desists from its course.

Here the chairman remarked, that the bank was perfectly aware of the design of the executive in reference to the checks, and gave it as a reason for not extending its discounts, and for retaining so large an amount of specie on hand. That daily and hourly applications for relief were made by our citizens to the bank, without effect. That the directors of that institution felt bound to husband their resources and stand on the defensive, while so serious a weapon is in the hands of the executive. Well sir, replied the president, let them do right and I will not injure them, but if they persist in measures which I deem oppressive and unjust, they must expect to feel my power. In the course of these remarks, of which a plain and certainly not an exaggerated sketch has been attempted by your delegates, the president very frequently used the expression that HE was determined to place and to leave HIS government, where the sages who framed the constitution found and left it, and also to place the currency and revenue of the country where the sages found and left it.

It occurred to several of the delegates to ask for an explanation of phrases which conveyed no distinct or tangible meaning to their minds. Their historical reading had taught them, that the framers of the constitution found the government in anarchy and left it in order; that they found the currency and revenue in ruins, and left both in a state of exalted prosperity; and that one of the instruments by which this change had been effected, was a national bank, bearing almost equal date with the constitution itself—a bank of the same kind which the president had stigmatized as a monstrous contrivance above and against both the constitution and the law. Fearing, however, that it might lead to a controversy about facts and history, and unwilling to contend with one whose opportunities at least have been better than their own, they abstained from inquiries which their curiosity strongly urged, but which promised to lead to no useful result.

The interview had now lasted about an hour, and during that period it had been impossible for the delegates, without unparadoxical rudeness towards the chief magistrate of the nation, to explain to him their business and their wishes. It had become obvious, moreover, that his mind was pre-occupied by a view of the subject, which would neutralize the effects of facts or reasoning, that he regarded the whole question as a contest between the bank on the one hand, and him and HIS government on the other; a contest in which the people had no concern, except as they might array themselves as partisans of either, that he considered his own power, and the stability of HIS government staked upon the issue; and consequently that the arguments of those who disclaimed connection with either party, and owed no allegiance but to truth and justice, and the common weal, would either be rejected without a hearing, or if heard, would be utterly disregarded.

The delegates, therefore, as soon as this painful and (as free citizens they must add) humiliating conviction was forced upon their minds, rose to take leave. One of their number seized the opportunity of a parting word to say, with emphasis, that to the president, and to his conduct in removing the public deposits, the citizens of Philadelphia attributed the distress under which they labor. His reply to this remark was but a repetition of assertions previously made, and the delegates retired with no cause of complaint as to their personal treatment, but indignant that the voice of more than ten thousand citizens, could be deemed by the president unworthy his attention, and with a sad conviction that the high places of power, in a land boasting of its freedom, were closed and barred against unpalatable truth.

The committee then proceeded to give an account of the further proceedings, holding out encouraging prospects as to the result, in changes of opinion effected, or expected to be made, in the minds of members of congress; and they exhort the people to perseverance, in a hope that their representatives will finally act to relieve the awful and extensive public distress that prevails. This part is very interesting, but we cannot get room for it, at length. They refer to the fiscal concerns of the state of Pennsylvania, and call upon the people to redeem themselves and their country, &c.

The report concludes as follows:

One word of exhortation to their fellow citizens and the delegates have done. It is no common occasion which has called for this unprecedented assemblage. The evils to be averted are of no common character, and call for the exertion of extraordinary energy. A contest has commenced—the parties to which are the people on the one hand, and the executive on the other—a contest full of difficulty and involving our dearest interests as citizens and as freemen. Let all so regard it, and let all so conduct themselves as to show they understand its nature and its consequences. Let him that hath property, spare of his abundance to secure the remainder; let him that hath talents or affluence expend them freely in the cause of social happiness and of chartered rights—and he that hath neither of these, let him bring a patriot's heart and a patriot's voice as his most acceptable sacrifice on the altar of his country.

Let old and young, rich and poor, the learned and the unlearned join hand in hand, and with one voice and spirit, as they have one interest in the event, unite their efforts to bind up the wounds of their afflicted country and restore her once more to health and prosperity. If the prevalence of such a feeling shall date from this day, the hallowed anniversary of the birth of the father of his country, each succeeding return of the same auspicious day, will carry with it an additional claim to the respect and veneration of the American people.

Caleb Cope, esq. on behalf of the delegation, offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were seconded by Jos. R. Ingersoll, esq. by which gentleman they were most eloquently and ably supported, and were adopted without dissent.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas, it is believed, that a sound currency is essential to national prosperity, and that to the influence of the bank of the United States are to be attributed the advantages of a sound and equal circulating medium, high public credit and low rates of interest, in the enjoyment of which, private enterprise has flourished, and the finances of the state and general government have been successfully managed, and it is evident that the attempts now made to break up a system so fully tested and so admirably adapted to our country, are highly injurious, and if persisted in will be destructive alike to public and private prosperity, Therefore

1. Resolved, That the present crisis, so full of danger to the constitution, and so marked by assaults upon all that is valuable in property and in civil rights, demands our resolute, active and unyielding efforts, to restore the broken faith of the government and to sustain the institutions of our country.

2. Resolved, That the avowed intention of the executive to prosecute an EXPERIMENT on the national currency, by withholding his sole will the entire revenue, is a usurpation incompatible with our system of government, and at utter variance with the duties of a chief magistrate of a republic, who is no more above the law than the humblest citizen of our land.

3. Resolved, That the sentiments of the president of the United States, his manner and tone at the recent interview with the delegates from this community, and his open declarations on that and other occasions, evince a settled purpose to destroy the present currency of the country, by a rash and ruinous experiment: That by his disregard of consequences, resulting from the measures of his administration; by his reluctance to listen to facts or reason, and by substituting the personal feelings and arbitrary will of ANDREW JACKSON, in place of the official dignity and constitutional action of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, he has introduced into the government a feature unknown to the constitution and dangerous to the rights and liberties of the people.

4. Resolved, That the common prosperity of the inhabitants of the United States, and more especially the peculiar interests of the state of Pennsylvania and of the city of Philadelphia, demand an immediate recharter of the bank of the United States, so that confidence may be restored, lost faith be recovered, an impulse to industry be given, and our country be raised from its present despondency, to a state of active and cheerful enterprise.

5. Resolved, That in the present suspension of commerce and the arts; and in the consequent distress spread through society, we see but the beginning of those evils, which if they be not remedied by the action of congress, will eventually produce most extended ruin—that it is the duty of every man, who has anything to lose by a revolution, or any thing to gain by a government of laws, to put forth his strength in behalf of his country, and not to give back until truth shall prevail, and the country be restored to its former prosperity.

6. Resolved, That, in a crisis like this, all minor differences of opinion, all secondary distinctions of section or of party should be cast aside, and the freemen of the country should be urged to rally under the broad banner of the constitution, in defence of their primary and essential rights.

7. Resolved, That the people of Pennsylvania, and of other states, be invited to hold county and town meetings, for the purpose of averting the approaching ruin—and it is recommended that committees of correspondence be organized, and that deputations from each meeting be sent to Washington, to explain to congress the condition of the country, and to enforce the necessity of immediate relief; by a restoration of the currency and public confidence.

8. Resolved, That it be recommended to the freemen of the several counties of Pennsylvania who agree with us in sentiment as to the causes and remedy of the present distress to appoint delegates to a general convention to be held in Harrisburg, for the purpose of devising measures to restore the prosperity of the country.

9. Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting the Girard bank of the city of Philadelphia, ought not to retain the public deposits and thereby countenance and uphold a system which is believed to be unlawful, and which experience has already shown to have a disastrous influence on the prosperity of the city.

10. Resolved, That a committee of thirty be appointed by this meeting with power to convene from time to time, to fill vacancies in their own body or otherwise to enforce the objects of this meeting at Washington, Harrisburg and elsewhere, to correspond with other committees throughout the United States, and to adopt such measures as in their judgment will tend to accomplish the objects of the foregoing resolutions, and to continue the same until their exertions shall be crowned with success.

Some other resolutions of a local nature, or as votes of thanks to the committee, &c, were passed, and the whole are signed by

JOHN A. BROWN, president—Samuel Richards, William Gill, Benjamin Naglee, George Miller, Bela Badger, Israel Roberts, Thomas Fletcher, Robert Burton, John Scholefield, vice presidents, and Jacob M. Thomas, Henry C. Corbit, Richard Morgan, J. C. Wolbert, secretaries.

At the conclusion of the meeting nine hearty cheers were given for the "constitution and the laws,"

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

In the senate of the United States, February 17.

PENSION AGENCY—UNITED STATES BANK.

Mr. Clayton from the committee on the judiciary, to whom have been referred the message of the president of the United States of the 4th February last, and the accompanying documents in relation to the removal of the funds, books and papers connected with the pension agency of the bank of the United States, under the act of June 7th, 1833, have agreed on the following report:

The message and documents referred to the committee show the fact, that the bank of the United States had declined to comply with an order of the department of war, issued on the 2d of January, 1834, demanding a surrender of the funds, books and papers belonging to the pension agency of the bank, under the act of congress approved on the 7th of June, 1832, entitled "an act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution." The orders appear to have been issued by the commissioner of pensions, acting under the direction of the secretary of war, and it announces the appointment, on the same day, of fifteen new pension agents to perform the duties heretofore performed by the bank as pension agents under that law. Those agents are the presidents of certain state banks to which a portion of the public deposits has been removed by the late order of the secretary of the treasury. At the same time, and by the said order, the bank of the United States was commanded to cease paying pensions under the law referred to. The bank in reply to the mandate of the secretary, while it respectfully declines to deliver the funds and papers as directed, without the consent of congress, profess its perfect willingness to surrender its trust as pension agents, if it shall be the pleasure of congress to release it from the charge, but regarding such a surrender, without the permission, to be a violation of its duty to congress and the country, it awaits some decision, either legislative or judicial, to discharge it from the burden of this agency, or to reinstate it in the discharge of its duties. In the mean time, fearing an obstacle in the settlement of its accounts for future disbursements, should it pay any more pensioners under this act, after the prohibition of the secretary, it has obeyed his injunction to cease paying them until further directions.

For the course pursued by the bank, the message, if it does not invoke the vengeance of the public against the institution, certainly denounces it as the cause of all the delay and embarrassment which has occurred since the secretary's order in the payment of the debt which the gratitude of the nation has awarded to the surviving veterans of the revolution. The president considers the conduct of the bank as an usurpation of the functions of the judicial power, and an attempt to prescribe to the executive department the manner in which it shall execute the trust confided to it by law; condemns it as without example in the history of our country, and declares that, if the acts of the executive may be thus checked, and controlled "the whole frame of our government is changed."

The committee have examined the questions growing out of the documents referred to them with all the care required by a matter which, in the opinion of a co-ordinate branch of the government, touches the honor of that government, as well as the just claims of the surviving soldiers of the revolution. They have found no ground for any difference of opinion among themselves, and they now unanimously submit the following view of the whole subject for the consideration of the senate.

The 15th section of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States, approved on the 10th of April, 1816, provides that during the continuance of that act, the corporation shall, among other things, "do and perform the several and respective duties of the commissioners of loans for the several states, or of any one or more of them, whenever required by law." In less than one year after the approval of this act, congress passed "the act transferring the duties of the commissioners of loans to the bank of the United States, and abolishing the office of commissioner of loans," which act was approved on the 3d of March, 1817. Both statutes were passed by the fourteenth congress. The first section of the last act provides, "that the bank of the U. States and its several branches shall be, and they are hereby required to do and perform the several duties of commissioners of loans for the several states; and the bank of the U. States, and its several branches, and such state banks as the bank of the United States may employ in those states where no branch bank shall be established, shall observe and conform to the directions which have been, or may hereafter be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, touching the execution of the duties aforesaid."

This statute in connexion with the 15th section of the charter, imposed a burden on the bank important to the government, and still more important to those who were the most meritorious objects of its bounty. For while that section enjoined it as a duty on the corporation to give the necessary facilities for transferring the public moneys to any part of the country, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions, or claiming allowance on account of the difference of exchange, the same section, in conjunction with the act of the 3d of March, 1817, made it the imperative duty of the bank to assume the agency of paying all pensioners of the government; such being at this time, one of the principal duties of the commissioners of loans. But the agent thus appointed by special act of congress was not vested with a general discretion in the discharge of those duties. It was bound to conform to the directions of the secretary, with the approbation of the president, "touching the execution of the duties aforesaid." The power of the executive over the bank, in this matter, was conferred by congress, and the extent of the power of the former over the latter was clearly defined by the same authority. No right is vested in the executive to annihilate the agency of the bank, or to substitute another at executive discretion. The agency shall exist, says the law—the bank shall pay certain moneys; but as to the time and place of payment, the portions of these pensions to be paid in certain cases: in short, in all things touching the manner of executing its duties, this public servant shall be subject to the control of another who shall, so far exercise a superintendance over the former. The duties enjoined on the bank by this act are ministerial—those of the secretary are supervisory; and the two authorities do no more clash with each other than those of the court and the marshal of the district, each of which is created by law, and liable to all the restraints of a paying agent. Was the bank being subject to the liabilities of a paying agent, was to have the choice of its own branch bank of the United States established; and by a provision of the third section of the same act of the 3d of March, 1817, a saving clause was introduced for its benefit in case no state bank should be established by law in any one of the states, in which case the agency for military pensions in that state was not to be effected by the act.

The committee consider that the attorney general manifestly errs when he represents the "presidents of the bank of the United States and its several branches" as the agents constituted by this act. The only agents known to the law were the bank and its several branches. They, and not their respective presidents, were required to do the several duties of commissioners of loans. They, not their presidents, were to choose sub-agents among the state banks, and the injunction to observe and conform to the directions of the secretary in regard to the execution of their duties operated on them, not on their several presidents merely. The attorney general says, the law of 1817, by which the duties then performed by the commissioners of loans, including the general pension agency, are transferred to the bank of the United States, expressly declares that these powers "shall be performed" by the president of the bank and its branches, and that their acts shall be countersigned by the cashier." It is true, that the second section, to which he probably referred, enacts "that all such duties and acts as are now done and performed by the commissioners of loans, in transferring stock from the books of one loan office to another, or to the books of the treasury, or from the books of the treasury to the books of the loan offices shall be done and performed by the president of the bank of the United States, the presidents of the several branches of the said bank, and by the presidents of such state banks as the bank of the United States may employ, (in states where no branch of the United States' bank shall be established); and the acts of the presidents aforesaid shall be countersigned by the cashiers of those banks respectively." This section is the only one prescribing services to be performed by the presidents of the bank and its branches, unless the third section should be deemed to be of this character, which directs the transfer of the papers to the presidents, while it unequivocally recognizes them only as agents of the bank to receive those papers, by an express direction that the notice of the transfer shall be, "that the duties will be transferred to the bank." Where the attorney general can find that part of the law of 1817, by which the general pension agency is transferred to the presidents or cashiers of the bank and its branches, or which "expressly declares that the powers of the commissioners of loans, including the general pension agency, shall be performed by the presidents of the bank and its branches, with the counter-signature of the cashiers, the committee are at a loss to imagine. It is true, that, as sub-delegates and organs of the bank, they have been sometimes addressed as pension agents in the correspondence with the department which they have always conducted. It is true, that, as the agents of the bank, conducting business by its orders, the pension rolls have been sent to them to be placed in the custody of the bank; and that as the officers of the corporation, they have been directed to inscribe the name of the pensioner on the rolls; and to pay to the time of the semi-annual payment, if the claimant should be still living, and, if not, then up to the day of his death. So the cashiers of the several branches might have performed the same duties with the consent of the bank; and we find that, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, the business of this agency, so far as regards the pension act of the 15th of May, 1828, has been conducted through the cashier of the branch bank of the United States at Washington. The error to which we have referred admits a construction which would deny the liability of the institution whose capital is bound to the safety of the pension fund. It would divide that liability among the presidents of the branches, who never gave bonds for the money, and whose personal responsibility would, if the opinion we controvert were sound, furnish the only security for the safety of the millions which have been entrusted to the bank on the credit of its whole capital. It is the more objectionable as it would strengthen the untenable position that the pension agent of this government, accountable now for the payment of more than twenty-three thousand pensioners, is, and ever has been, a creature of the executive, and not the delegated agent of congress.

In the opinion of the committee there can be no greater error on this subject than to suppose that it is through a mere exercise of executive authority that the banks has become the legal agent for the payment of pension money—"It took," says the attorney general, "the agency from the commissioners of loans by substitution in their stead; and those commissioners derived it from an executive regulation." But the substitution was by an act of congress. In addition to those parts of the act of the 3d of March, 1817, to which we have referred for the purpose of showing this, the third section of the same act directs "that it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to notify the president of the United States that the duty now performed by the commissioners of loans will be transferred to the bank of the United States, and shall so direct the commissioners of loans, and the agents for military pensions where there is no commissioner, respectively, in the several states, to deliver to the president of the United States bank or to the president of a branch thereof, or to the president of such state bank as the bank of the United States may employ on such day or days as he may designate, the register and all the records and papers of the respective officers, and it shall be the duty of said commissioners of loans, and agents for pensioners to comply with the said direction, and also to duplicate receipts for the delivery of the papers and records herein described, one of which shall be transmitted without delay to the secretary of the treasury—Provided, That this act shall not be construed to extend to any agent for military pensions in any state where there is no bank established by law." The fourth section of the act abolishes the offices of commissioners of loans upon the delivery of the said records and papers. The office of commissioner of loans, was created by the act of congress "making provision for the debt of the United States" approved on the 4th of August, 1790. The commissioner of each state was thereby enjoined, among other things, to pay the interest on the loan proposed by that act as the same should become due, and generally to observe and perform such directions and regulations as should be prescribed to him by the secretary of the treasury touching the execution of his office. The twelfth section of the same act compels the commissioners to give bonds, with one or more securities, conditioned for their good behaviour in their offices, respectively. Whether these officers were originally bound by executive regulation only, or by express act of congress, to discharge the duty of agent for the payment of military pensions, is of no consequence, if it be conceded, as it is, that such was a part of their duties. "The president of the bank and the attorney general, in their several communications referred to the committee alike admit the well known fact that these commissioners were employed as agents of the government in the payment of pensions, and that they continued to be so employed until after the organization of the bank of the United States. The act passed on the 24th of April, 1816, authorises the secretary for the department of war, "to appoint some fit and proper person in those states and territories where there is no commissioner of loans, and also in the district of Maine, to perform the duties in those states and territories, and in said district, respectively, relating to pensions and pensioners which are now required by said commissioners in their respective states." This act recognises the duties of pension agents as pertaining to these commissioners before the passage of the act of the 3d of March, 1817, and restricts the secretary's power of appointment to places where there is no commissioner of loans. Since the bank of the United States has been substituted in lieu of these commissioners, by what statute is it that the secretary is authorised to appoint pension agents in any state or territory where the bank, or one of its branches has been established.

The secretary of war, in his correspondence with the president of the bank, (to be found in their reports of committees of the house of representatives at the first session of the 23d congress, No. 460, page 489), so late as the 1st of March, 1832, admits that, "from a careful examination of the laws of congress, he is satisfied that the department of war is not warranted in appointing a pension agent in any state or territory where the United States' bank has established one of its branches." It is not intimated to us that the secretary has ever changed this opinion. It was not hastily formed. It was not given by him without the existence of an important case, requiring him to decide with caution. It was the judgment of the very officer who has, by his order, attempted to remove and to annihilate the pension agency established by congress, and who has constituted fifteen other agencies, entirely independent of each other, to supply its place. No matter who may desire to take the responsibility of the net which the secretary of war has committed, we can look only to him as properly answerable for it; and it is therefore that we refer particularly to his opinion which, under any other circumstances, would have come to us as the conviction of an able expositor of the law, but would have been entitled only to the same weight which we should have accorded to any other man of equal learning and ability. To enable the senate to see under what circumstances this opinion was given, let us recur to a part of the history of the bank. It appears by the document last referred to, that, in the summer of 1829, an attempt was made by the honorable John H. Eaton, then secretary of war, to remove the pension agency from the branch bank of the United States at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, to a state bank at Concord, in that state, and that by the authority of the secretary to effect this was then denied by the bank of the United States. The commissioner of pensions, in his letter to Mr. Mason, the president of the branch bank, in New Hampshire, dated the 25th of August, 1829, says, that, "in changing the agency, the secretary of war conceived himself authorised by law to do so, and was actuated by a regard to the interests of the pensioners, in wishing to have them paid in that part of the state where the greatest facilities are presented." If this were intended as an apology for the act of the then secretary, it cannot avail in the case now before us, because the agent selected by the present secretary is the Commercial bank at Portsmouth, the very place where the branch bank of the United States is established. But whatever may have been the object of this part of the correspondence, the rest of the letter of the commissioner waives all further discussion of the subject, revokes the order for the change of the agency and directs the branch bank of the U. States to resume its duties. Two years afterwards there was a similar attempt "with a view to accommodate the pensioners," again; and a transfer was actually made of a considerable part of the pension list from the office at New York to the Mechanics' and Farmers' bank in the city of Albany. The bank of the United States strongly remonstrated against the measure as illegal and unwarrantable. A change of the heads of departments having occurred after the alteration of the agency, the bank appeared to the present head of the department of war, in a letter dated the 10th of August, 1831, and the subject was held under advisement by that officer until the 1st of March, 1832, a period of more than six months, at the expiration of which the secretary writes to the president of the bank, as before stated, his entire satisfaction, from a careful examination of the laws of congress, that the department is not warranted in appointing a pension agent. "Hence," says the secretary, "the agent at Albany has been notified that his appointment, by this department, has from this day ceased." And so the matter ended.

This opinion of the secretary is approved and adopted by the committee. It was formed in the spirit which should direct all the operations of a government recognising nothing arbitrary or oppressive in its character, and we think that the retraction of error, when thus convinced of it, after taking due deliberation, was honorable as well as just in the officer. To support him in the result at which he had arrived, he saw among the acts of congress, which he professes carefully to have examined, that an act of congress had been at all times held necessary to create a new pension agency; in pursuance of this construction, on the 3d of March, 1819, an act passed by which the secretary of war was authorised to appoint an agent, in addition to one already appointed in the state of Tennessee, for the purpose of paying pensioners of the United States residing in East Tennessee; that, again, on the 20th of May, 1826, the secretary of war was "authorised to establish a pension agency at Pittsburgh, in the state of Pennsylvania, for the payment of pensioners of the United States, resident in that vicinity;" and that the secretary of the treasury was, by the same act authorised to make the necessary arrangement with the bank of the United States for paying the before mentioned pensioners at the office of discount and deposit of said bank at Pittsburgh. He knew that the secretary of war could not exercise the power of appointing such agents as his own deputies; that he was not the paymaster of pensions; and that long before the charter of the bank, while the agency remained in the hands of the commissioners of loans, congress found it necessary, by the act of the 7th January, 1809, to give even him authority to act as agent in a few cases, by enacting "that every pension, or arrearage of pension due to every officer or soldier residing in either of the United States or the territories thereof in which there has not been appointed an agent for the payment of pensions, shall be paid at the seat of the government of the United States by the secretary for the war department, and that the name of the pensioner shall, on his application to the secretary of war, be transferred from the books of the state in which it was originally registered, to a register to be opened for that purpose at the war office of the United States;" the act of congress of the 24th of April, 1816, authorising the secretary of war to appoint pension agents where there was no commissioner of loans, was also before him, to satisfy him that, as well before as after the bank had assumed the agency, no such agent could be created by the head of his department. He took no distinction between the act of the 15th of May, 1828, and any other pension law of this government; but, with a full knowledge of all the views of his predecessors, with all the books and accounts of his office before him, exhibiting the construction which had ever been given to the duties of the bank—with the aid of all the learning of the then attorney general, if he choose to put it in requisition, he concurred in the result at which Mr. Binney, Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Mason, had before arrived—that new pension agents could not be appointed by the department, except in the single class of cases in which such appointments were expressly authorised by the act of 1816.

As to the expediency of the law, which was thus considered settled by the secretary, whether we consider the importance of a permanent establishment of such an agency in reference to the chief object of its creation, which was the payment of pensioners in a sound currency, without charge to the government; or, in reference to the limitation it was supposed to have fixed for the exercise of executive power over this portion of the public treasure, we are convinced that it was such as highly to recommend it in its origin, and that it is yet such as to forbid any change of its provisions. At the time of the passage of the act of the 3d of March, 1817, the government incurred great expense in the payment of salaries and clerk hire, appertaining to the commissioners of loans. The bank having assumed the duties of those officers, without charge on the treasury for their performance, incurred no responsibility, the neglect or refusal to meet which subjected it to all the penal consequences of a violation of its charter. The pension agency is a duty imposed on the institution, onerous and expensive, which the president of the bank now informs us it is willing to be discharged from if congress the creator of that agency, will release it; and that it is a burden, and not a mere benefit to the institution, is satisfactorily established not only by his declarations, but by the concurrent testimony of several of the local banks to which the public deposits have been recently removed. Thus the president of the Mechanics' bank at New York, in his letter to the commissioner of the 27th of January last, complains: "The agency, as I learn, is exceedingly complicated in its details, requires considerable office room, the employment of at least three clerks, which must necessarily involve us in a very considerable extra expense. Why this bank should have been selected to perform this service, whilst the other selected banks here are exempt from the responsibility, labor and expense, is a matter of some surprise, particularly when it is known that we have not hitherto had a due proportion of the public deposits. Having assented, however, in our agreement with the treasury, to preform the duties incidental to the agency, we cannot of course object to the execution of those duties, but must, at the same time, be permitted to say that an agency involving such great responsibility, arduous duties, and heavy expenses, should be borne in common by the three banks; or, if this should be considered impracticable, that the other two should at least bear a pro rata portion of the expenses."

In several instances presented by the correspondence between the commissioner of pensions and the presidents of the state banks, which have been recently selected as banks of deposit, those officers have declined the agency, or refused to give bond for the performance of the duties. In some cases the local banking corporations are themselves made executive agents; the presidents of banks are selected, without any accountability on the part of the banks over which they preside. For the performance of this trust, before the change was made, the whole capital of the bank of the United States was bound to this government. The institution, by long practice, had become expert in the conduct of all the complicated details of the trust confided to it. It had reduced the whole business of the agency to a system which alike secured the interests of the government, and the pensioners, and its own stockholders. "We have no evidence," says the commissioner, in a letter from the pension office to the president of the Girard bank in Philadelphia, of the 24th of February last, "that the United States bank has ever lost a cent by paying pensions, although that institution and its branches have disbursed large sums for this office for seventeen years past." And while the bank was so well managing this interest for its own stockholders, we have never heard that, at any time, the government found fault with its accounts, or that any revolutionary soldier, or other pensioner on the lists, was turned from its doors without receiving in hard dollars, or their full equivalent in value, the whole amount of the intended bounty of his country, unless the executive department had previously interfered to arrest the performance of the duties of the corporation. In the judgment of your committee, this trust, for the performance of which the honor, faith and best feelings of the country are enlisted, cannot be as well discharged by individual agents, or by state institutions, which owe no responsibility to this government, and which, finding no source of profit in the pension fund, already view it, and may soon treat it, as an incumbrance. Should they be all equally faithful with the bank of the United States, can it be expected that fifteen new agents, acting independently of each other, can be equally skillful? Is it to be anticipated that they will all adopt the same guards, both for public and private security? pursue the same mode of accounting and transacting the business which has been perfected by the bank of the United States after seventeen years' experience? or maintain any one general system whatever, to attain the same objects? We think that as, by the new arrangement different agents are selected to pay the pensions under the act of the 7th of June, 1832, and as the bank of the United States is still to pay all pensions allowed by laws anterior to that date, there will be no longer any one system preserved in the pension agency of the government, and that the confusion incident to this state of things will be an evil much to be regretted. We think, too, that should congress sanction the changes which have been made, it is by no means without the range of probability that, at no very distant period, and at some one of the numerous agencies recently created, those gallant defenders of their country, who have attracted the president's sympathies in the message before us, may sometimes receive their allowance in depreciated currency. In the opinion of the committee, therefore, however willing the bank of the United States may be to relinquish this agency by the permission of congress, the object for which the trust was established requires that it should not be permitted to discharge itself from the obligations it incurred by the assumption of that trust. The policy of that limitation of the executive power over this portion of the public treasure, which was acknowledged by the secretary of war, as we have stated it, is to the committee not less apparent. The permanent appointment of an agent, not subject to removal at executive discretion, is important to secure a steady and punctual payment of the money upon which many of the pensioners depend for actual subsistence. To subject them to the inconvenience and loss arising from a change of the agency at every revolution of the political wheel, would be not only to embarrass and distress those who should meet with no obstacles in the receipt of the meed of their patriotism, but to add another stream to the swollen current of power which already threatens to deluge and destroy the best interests of the country.

The committee might here have rested on the secretary's own view of the subject, but for the reasoning of the attorney general, contained in the opinion accompanying the president's message. This opinion appears to have been given, at the request of the president, one month after the order issued from the department of war. Thus called upon either to justify or condemn a measure of the administration which had been previously adopted, the arguments of the attorney general do not seem to us to concur with that view of the powers of the department of war which the secretary himself had formerly taken.

He introduces his principal argument with the assertion that all the pension laws up to the 3d of March, 1817, provided only for invalids; that the act of the 18th March, 1818, which authorized the payment of pensions to certain indigent officers and soldiers of the revolution, declared that they should be paid "in the same manner as pensions to invalids, who had been placed on the pension list, were then paid;" that similar clauses have been inserted in the various pension acts since passed; and he distinctly admits that the payments under all those acts are to be made through the agency of the bank, except so far as congress shall have authorised, by special laws, the employment of other agents. He then denies to the acts of 1823 and 1832, the character of pension laws; on which last position his chief argument is rested. Before we proceed to examine this, we will notice the remarks with which it was thus introduced, and the inferences which the reasoner intended, as we presume, should be drawn from them.

It is not true that all the pension laws up to the 3d of March, 1817, provided only for invalids; because, among other laws which might be mentioned, the first section of the act of the 16th of April, 1816, directing half pay for five years, for the widows and children of officers and soldiers who died in the service during the last war, is not a law providing only for invalids. This act, which, it is to be observed, does not designate the agent to pay the pensions allowed by the section referred to, was extended by the act of the 3d of March, 1817, to the widows and children of the soldiers of the militia, volunteers, rangers and sea-fencibles. The second section of the act of 16th of April, 1816, providing half pay for five years to the children of such as died in service in the last war on the relinquishment of bounty lands, directs "the payment thereof to be made when and where other military pensions are or shall be paid." It will be seen, then, that the argument which would exclude from the agency of the bank all pensioners except invalids, and those who are by express act to be paid in the same manner as invalids, would have excluded pensioners under the first sections of the act of the 16th of April, 1816, and of the act to amend that act, passed on the 3d of March, 1817. But the agency of the bank was always extended to them. They were indisputably entitled to the character of pension laws, the payments under which, by the admissions of the attorney general, must be made through the agency of the bank, except so far as congress shall have authorised, by special laws, the employment of other agents. The committee do not consider the bank as deriving its agency under the pension act of the 18th of March, 1818, or any other act, from the mere direction that payment shall be made "in the same manner as pensions to invalids are now paid." The mode of payment might well be, and, indeed, frequently is, prescribed in an act recognising the existence of an established paymaster. Had there been no other authority from congress than is to be found in this clause, to constitute the agency of the bank, the secretary, so far from admitting, as he did on the first of March, 1832, that the department was not warranted in appointing a pension agent where the bank or one of its branches was established, would probably have informed the president of the bank that different agents could pay the pensioners "in the same manner," and that the new mode of paying invalids could be as strictly observed by the Mechanics' and Farmers' bank at Albany, as by the branch bank of the United States there established.

The committee is now prepared to examine the principal argument advanced by the attorney general, and most relied upon by him to justify the order of the secretary. He maintains that the act of the 15th of May, 1828, "for the relief of certain officers and soldiers of the army of the revolution," and the supplement thereto of the 7th of June, 1832, are not pension laws; that they have no connexion whatever with the general system of pension laws, but are the commencement of another, and an entirely different system. He asserts that these are laws in which the "pay" mentioned is to be understood as contradistinguished from "pensions" and which carefully avoid any such expression as might connect them with the system of pensions.

The committee have investigated this question, and they find that both houses of congress, the president, the secretary himself, the commissioner of pensions, the secretary of the treasury, and indeed every department of the government, having occasion to administer or to refer to these acts, have, from their very origin, invariably treated them as pension laws, until the present controversy arose; while the committee do also find the character of pension acts indelibly impressed on the laws themselves by the hands that framed them.

By reference to the history of the debates at the time of the passage of these laws, it appears that each of them was advocated and opposed in both houses of congress as pension laws. In principle, these pensions are founded on the same revolutionary services with those conferred by the act of 1818, which is admitted to be a pension law. The acts of 1828 and 1832 both contain a perpetual appropriation, but it seems that special appropriations to meet the expenses of the act of 1828, were annually made and continued until the year 1833, and that each of these appropriations is for "revolutionary pensions." By the act of the 12th of February, 1828, there was appropriated "for the revolutionary pensioners of the United States," (meaning those embryonic pensioners of the act of 1818) $564,236. The pension act of 1828 having passed on the 15th of May, a new appropriation to meet the expenses incurred by it was made on the 24th of May, for the pensions to the revolutionary pensioners of the United States, $200,000. The appropriation of the 3d of March, 1833, recognises the claimants, under both the acts of 1828 and 1832, as pensioners, in the following words: "For the Revolutionary pensioners under the several acts prior to that of 7th June, 1832, $624,655." The same appropriation act of 1833, which, it is to be observed, was passed at the second session of the 22d congress, and by the framers of the act of 1832, whose contemporaneous exposition of that law ought to have some weight in deciding on its character, contains another appropriation in the following words: "For additional temporary clerk hire during the years 1832 and 1833, in order to carry into effect the act of 7th June, 1832, granting revolutionary pensions, $24,039."

At the same session, and on the same day, a joint resolution was passed by both houses in relation to the act of the 7th June, 1832, which ordains that, "in the execution of that act, whenever it shall be made to appear that any applicant for a pension under said act entered the army of the revolution in pursuance of a contract with the government made previous to the 11th of April, 1783, and continued in service until after that period, it shall be the duty of the secretary of war to compute the period of any such applicant's service from the time he thus entered the army, and until the date of the definitive treaty of peace, and to allow him a pension accordingly." If it be insisted that the very congress which made the law misunderstood its character, let us next inquire how the president himself has always understood it until his recent message. The act of the 2d March, 1833, provides "that a commissioner of pensions shall be appointed by the president and senate. He shall execute, under the directions of the secretary of war, such duties in relation to the various pension laws as may be prescribed by the president of the United States." It appears by the statement of the attorney general that, immediately after the passage of the law of 1832, the president assigned the execution of it to the commissioner of pensions, to whom the same duty has been ever since prescribed by the president. The president must, therefore, have always regarded this act as a pension law. If it be not of this character the order to the commissioner of the 2d of January, 1834, is illegal, as the president was only authorized by it to prescribe the duties of the commissioner "in relation to pension laws."

The president signed and approved both the act and the joint resolution of the 2d of March, 1833, before referred to, in which this act of June 7, 1832, is over and over again characterized as a pension law in express terms. We know that his message now expresses his entire concurrence in the views of the attorney general, but may he not be understood as referring rather to that officer's general conclusions than to all his particular arguments? We incline to that interpretation of the message in reference to this part of the subject, more especially because we find that nearly all the members of his cabinet, as well as the commissioner of pensions, have always styled and treated this act of the 7th June, 1832, as a pension law. To begin with the secretary of war, under whose direction the commissioner of pensions has always acted in execution of the duties in relation to this law prescribed by the president. In the close of his annual report of the 29th November, 1833, accompanying the president's message, and which we presume must have met the approbation of the president, he states, "there have been presented for allowance under the PENSION ACT of June 7, 1832, thirty thousand six hundred claims. The whole of these have been examined, and either admitted, rejected or returned to the parties for supplementary action." * * * "It is creditable to the industry and efficiency of the pension office that such a mass of business should have been performed within the period which has elapsed since the passage of the above law."

The secretary, in a letter to the commissioner, dated Nov. 2d, 1832, observes, "on consultation with the attorney general, I have decided, that the probate courts of Vermont and courts of record, within the meaning of the regulations prescribed by the department for carrying into effect the act of June 7th, 1832, granting revolutionary pensions." In another letter to the same officer, dated February 21st, 1833, the claim under this act is again characterized as a pension. The present secretary of the treasury, in his report on the finances of the 17th of December last, page 5th, described these claims as "revolutionary pensions under the act of the 7th of June, 1832." In his account of the expenditures for 1833, they are included, with all others of the same character, under the designation of "pensions." The present secretary of state, when secretary of the treasury, in his account of the expenditures for 1832, describes them as "revolutionary pensions per act of seventh of June, 1832." The commissioner of pensions, in his report of the 27th of November last, gives us a "statement showing the number of persons that have been placed on the pension roll of the different states and territories under the act of June 7th, 1832;" also, "a statement showing the number of persons who have died since making application for pensions under the act of June 7th, 1832;" also, "a statement showing the number of persons who have applied for pensions under the act of June 7th, 1832;" also, "a statement showing the number who have relinquished their pensions under the act of March 16th, 1818, and have been placed on the rolls under the act of June 7th, 1832;" and he concludes by informing us, that there have been sent to the pension agents during the year past, "to pay pensioners under the act of June 7th, 1832, $547,170 57." In all the letters of the commissioner to the new pension agents, the law receives the same construction; and in the very order of the 2d of January last which is the subject of examination, he assigns the reason that the selection of the local banks as the future places of deposit, render it necessary that those banks should "discharge the duties of agent for paying pensions, under the act of June 7th, 1832." If therefore directs the bank of the United States to "cease paying said pensioners."

It is relied upon by the executive, that the act of 1828, like that of 1832, uses the word "pay," instead of "pension." So does the first section of the act of April 24th, 1816, the claimants under which are admitted to the benefits of the pension agency, and have been always designated by the name of pensioners. In the opinion of the committee, the use of the word "pension" in a law is not essential to entitle it to the character of a pension law. Whether it be or be not entitled to that character, must depend on the general intent of the legislature, as collected from all its provisions. This like other pension laws, provides that no person receiving any annuity or pension under a former law, shall be entitled to its benefits, "unless he shall first relinquish his further claim to such pension." The construction given to this by the department, may be discovered in the declaration prescribed by it in order to obtain the benefit of the act, in which declaration the applicant is required to say, "he hereby relinquishes every claim whatever to a pension, except the present." Like the other pension laws, it provides that "the pay allowed by it shall not be in any way transferrable, or liable to attachment, levy or seizure, by any legal process whatever, but shall enure wholly to the personal benefit of the officer, non-commissioned officer, musician or soldier, entitled to the same."

If this were regarded by congress as a law for the payment of an actual debt by instalments, and not a pension act, why was the debt secured against creditors? Why should the pay enure wholly to the personal benefit of the claimant, free and discharged from the ordinary operation of the law on other men to whom the public money is paid for a public debt? Was it ever held before—can an instance be adduced from the annals of congress, in which such a provision has been introduced to secure any mere creditor of the government against the just claims of his own creditors? The fact is, that, by our laws, no pension is conferred except for services rendered. Congress does not grant pensions to court favorites, nor mere gratuities under any pretext. We understand the term "pension," as it is commonly defined, "an allowance for services rendered, to be paid at stated intervals." We are compelled to reject any construction of the law which places the services of the six months' militia man, or of the Indian spy, under the act of 1832, above that of the regular soldier who served till the end of the war of the revolution, and is entitled to be paid under the act of 1818. Both are meritorious. But the character of a debt can surely not be conferred upon the claims of the former with more propriety than upon those of the latter.

It is to be observed that the opinion of the attorney general appears to be at variance, on this subject, with that of his immediate predecessor, the hon. R. B. Taney, the present secretary of the treasury. Mr. Taney, in his reply of the 27th of October, 1832, to a question proposed by the present secretary of war, touching the execution of the act of 7th June, 1832, says: "It is not obligatory on the secretary of war to issue a new pension certificate when the party has pledged it for a debt, and the creditor refuses to deliver it without payment. The law does not require the certificate, in such a case, to be renewed, &c. But as the law intended to prevent the pensioner from selling or mortgaging his pension, it would defeat its obvious policy if the creditor, by withholding his certificate, could deprive the party of his pension, and thereby compel him to appropriate a part of it to the payment of his debt. The act of the creditor, therefore, ought not to prevent the payment of the pension; and, if satisfactory proof is offered that the certificate is in the hands of the creditor or any other person, and that it has been demanded by the pensioner, and the delivery refused; and if sufficient evidence is also adduced of the identity of the applicant for the pension, I think he is entitled to payment." In the same letter, he also says: "the act of June 7th, 1832, granting pensions for revolutionary services, is not confined to resident American citizens. The first section gives the pension, &c."

In an opinion given by Mr. Taney to the secretary, dated May 18th, 1833, he observes that, "by a liberal construction of the first section of the act of 1832, every officer who was entitled to a pension under the act of May 15th, 1828, would be excluded from a pension under the act of 1832. And if such a construction were adopted, an officer who had served to the end of the war as ensign, &c. would be excluded from a pension under the last mentioned law. But, looking at the whole act, it appears that those who were on the pension list of 1828 were not excluded, &c. The third section of the law shows that it was not designed to exclude any of those who had pensions under other acts of congress, where the pensions of the act of 1832 were more favorable to their interests. * * * * * If the commissary, therefore, held no rank in the line, he would be entitled to his pension, because he was not provided for by the act of 1828. * * * * * And as, in the case you state, the applicant was not entitled to a pension as commissary under the law of 1828, he is not excluded from a pension on account of services in that character under the act of 1832, and is entitled to the pension as commissary upon relinquishing his claim as ensign."

Among the documents referred to us, are the copies of two bonds, which appear to have been taken from the agents at Cincinnati and Portland, (Me.) the one dated the 13th, and the other the 20th of January last; each of which is expressly conditioned for the performance of the duties of agent for paying pensions under the act of congress of June 7th, 1832. We know not that any others have been received by the department; but in reference to these, independently of the fact that no law exists authorising the commissioner to take such securities, if the attorney general's construction of the law be correct, the utility or value of the instruments may be questioned. We forbear, however, to express any opinion on that subject, or to swell this report with further extracts to prove the executive construction of the law. Suffice it to say, that, although the attorney general so strongly maintains that the acts of 1825 and 1832 are to be distinguished from all pension acts, and that they are not entitled to the name of pension laws, we find that no other officer of this government who has had occasion to consider the subject, has ever adopted his construction. He may, we think, support a claim, as the discoverer of this distinction, without a competitor.

It remains for the committee to examine another argument advanced in defence of the secretary's order, founded on the provision in the acts of the 15th of May, 1825, and the 7th of June, 1832, relative to the manner of paying the pensions they allow. The clause referred to in the first act is in these words—"that the pay allowed by this act shall, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, be paid to the officers or soldiers entitled thereto, or to their authorised attorney, at such places and days as the said secretary may direct." The act of 1832 contains a similar provision; and the resolution of congress of the 28th of June, 1832, transfers to the secretary of war all the duties which devolved upon the secretary of the treasury, by virtue of that act. The money appropriated by the act was, in pursuance of this provision, drawn from the treasury by warrant, and under the direction of the secretary of war, deposited in the bank as the established pension agent of this government. It is now contended that the secretary may of right, without the aid of congress, change the pension agency, so far as regards the pensions under this last act, from the bank which has exercised that agency since the law was passed, or, in other words, that he may appoint fifteen other banks or private individuals to do the same offices which that bank has hitherto performed. The case presented is, that, of two agents, each appointed by congress, the one to act under the direction of the other. But the agent appointed to direct, claims the power to annihilate the other, and to substitute in lieu of it fifteen new agents to do the same duties. The committee propose to inquire from what part of the clause in question such a power is to be derived.

Is it from the words, "the pay allowed shall, under the direction of the secretary, be paid to the person entitled thereto?"

Or is it to be found in the remaining part of the sentence, which orders the payment to be made "at such days and places as the secretary may direct."

It is admitted by both parties, as we have already stated, that the agency of the bank under the laws up to the 3d of March, 1817, inclusive, can be changed only by act of congress. The act of that date commands the bank to observe and conform to the directions which have been, or may thereafter be, prescribed by the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, touching the execution of its duties as commissioner of loans. The clause in question, in the act of June 7th, 1832, is of similar import, though it subjects the agent in the execution of the duties to the direction of a different executive officer. We have not heard that it was ever intended that these words in the act of the 3d of March, 1817, gave the executive such a power as is claimed for a similar provision in the act of 7th June, 1832. The commissioners of loans were bound to pay, under the directions of the secretary, before the bank charter; yet the power to abolish their agency was never claimed by any executive, nor the power to substitute a pension agent to act in conjunction with them. The secretary, by the act of April 24, 1816, was authorised only to appoint pension agents in those states and territories "where there is no commissioner of loans." When this act, and the other acts before referred to, authorising him to appoint pension agents in Pittsburgh and Tennessee, were passed, was it imagined that any executive department had the power now claimed by virtue of the injunction to be found in our laws on all pension agents; compelling them, in the execution of their duties, to act under the direction of an executive officer? If these words give such a power we see not why the agency of the commissioner of pensions, who is, as we have seen, bound to execute his duty under the direction of the secretary of war, might not be abolished by the secretary, and fifteen other commissioners appointed by him to execute the same duties. Scarce two years have elapsed since a bill passed the other house to authorise the secretary to appoint a pension agent in Alabama. This bill, we know, was defeated in the senate because it was thought to be altogether inexpedient to interfere with the duties of the bank. The same bill is now before congress again. Until the order of the secretary of war was issued, its friends as well as its enemies thought the power to change or abolish an agency was not involved in the power to direct the agent, or to check him in the exercise of his duties, but resided only in congress. If we are mistaken in this—if indeed the power to destroy is incident to the power to direct—we do not perceive why so much of this act of the 3d of March, 1817, as abolishes the offices of commissioners of loans was not rejected as useless by the congress and president who chartered the bank; nor why the high executive power now contended for was not exercised in that day by the same summary mode of changing the pension agency.

The concluding part of the clause in question, which orders the payment of these pensions to be made at "such days and places as the secretary may direct," whether considered separately, or in connexion with the preceding part of the section, cannot, in the judgment of the committee, be held as furnishing any authority whatever to abolish the agency of the bank, and substitute other agents in lieu of it. The power conferred by these words is strictly supervisory, and that, too, of a qualified character. The superintending agent derives authority from these words, not appoint the person to pay, but merely to direct the time and place of payment. With an existing pension agent established by congress, and recognised as such by the government for more than forty years, the secretary herein is simply authorised to fix the time and place at which it shall act. In the case of a law ordering money to be levied and collected under the direction of a court, at such times and places as the court shall direct, no one could infer the existence of a power in the court to remove the marshal, or to substitute another person unknown to the laws to execute his duties. The officer of the ministerial agent in that case being created by act of congress, no other office could be created to supersede it, except by the same power. When congress directs money to be paid by the secretary of the treasury, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the treasurer himself, though not mentioned in the act of appropriation, must disburse the money on a proper warrant; because, as in the case under consideration, he is the paying agent of the government, created by act of congress, though bound to pay under the direction of a superintending officer; and in this instance, the power to appoint twenty new treasurers might with as much propriety be claimed for the secretary of the treasury, as the power to make new pension agents is now claimed for the secretary of war.

The distinction between places and persons is essential to a correct understanding of the subject. The right to direct the places where a pension shall be paid, is, as we apprehend, perfectly consistent with the existence of an established agency to perform that duty at that place when directed; and we hold that the mere authority to give or countermand an order to pay, can confer no power to destroy the paymaster, or to make a new one. If the paying agent is, as the adverse argument presupposes, a mere deputy of the secretary, removable at executive pleasure, then the millions which are directed to be disbursed to pay pensions are liable to be placed in the hands of individuals without any security; and we have already seen how the work under this new construction of the law is progressing. We do not believe that congress has so far neglected its duty to the country. We think that the clause reserving to the secretary the right to direct the times and places of payments is the same in substance with that to be found in the act establishing commissioners of loans, and the act transferring their duties to the bank; in both of which it is provided that one of the heads of departments shall direct—not the agent to execute, but merely "touching the execution of his duties."

The attorney general finds in the conduct of the bank, in reference to the order of the secretary to surrender the pension fund, a breach of trust, and a violation of duty to the government. We think, on the contrary, that had it surrendered that fund on such an order, without the consent of congress, it could not have escaped the imputation of having sought a recharter by a dereliction of its trust, and the exhibition of a spirit of insubordination to the executive will. The president, while he concurs in the views of the attorney general, denounces the bank as an "irresponsible money corporation." In what sense is it irresponsible? Its charter provides "that whenever a committee of either house of congress shall find and report, or the president of the United States, shall have reason to believe that the charter has been violated, it may then be lawful for congress to direct, or the president to order, a scire facias to be sued out, calling on the corporation to show cause wherefore the charter shall not be declared forfeited." The responsibility of the bank to the president himself, as well as to congress, in case any provision in the charter has been violated, appears to us to be quite as satisfactory as that of any officer of this government. The 17th section of the charter also provides that the corporation shall not, at any time, refuse payment of any money received upon deposit, and that, if it do neglect or refuse to pay on demand, any money received upon deposit, to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, such person shall be entitled to recover interest on the money until the same shall be fully paid, at the rate of twelve per cent. from the time of the demand. If the president thinks he has reason to believe that this provision has been violated, the remedy is in his own hands, and it appears to us to be ample. If it were not sufficient, congress, on that fact being shown, has the power reserved by the charter to supply any deficiency by farther legislation. We do not understand that the ability of the bank to respond to any pecuniary demand upon it by the government for public dues is questioned; and as an engine of power, with all the guards placed around it by the charter, we think it is far less to be dreaded than twenty state banks, afflicted by their allegiance to a common master, and strengthened not only by the funds of the pensioners, but by all the money in the treasury.

We are also told that the refusal of the bank to deliver over the books and papers belonging to this agency is a still more palpable breach of the duty which results from what the attorney general terms the subordination of the agent to his principal. If the secretary, instead of congress or the government, were the principal, and the bank merely the secretary's deputy, the right of the former to the custody of these books and papers before a final settlement of the accounts, might well be questioned by the latter. But when we repudiate the whole doctrine which subjects the pension fund to be disposed of at the will of the executive, and acknowledge congress as the power which created the agency, this executive pretension become absolutely preposterous. We have shown that the act transferring the duties of the commissioners of loans to the bank of the United States, and abolishing their office, directs them and the agents for military pensions, where there is no such commissioner, to deliver to the bank "the register, and all the records and papers of their respective office," and that, "upon the delivery of the records and papers, the office of the commissioners shall be abolished." The books and papers of the pension agents of that day were, therefore, deposited in the bank by virtue of a positive statute, and neither the congress that passed the bank charter, nor the president who approved it, seems to have supposed that it could obtain them in any other way. What was considered in 1817 as no fit subject for mere executive regulation, does not now appear otherwise to the committee than it did to the framers of the charter. Without legislative interposition, the books and papers necessary for the transaction of the business of the pension agent should remain in the bank; and neither executive denunciation, nor any mere desire of the corporation to get rid of a troublesome and expensive duty should induce it to desert the important trust which has been confided to it by the legislature of the country.

We understand the attorney general as claiming for the department of war the custody of these books and papers during the interval between the semi-annual payments, even though it should be obliged to return them again to the bank when the day of payment shall arrive. The order of the secretary was for a permanent and absolute transfer of the books and papers; and, in justice to the directors of the bank, the committee feel bound to say that the attempt of the attorney general to put them in the wrong, by placing the order of the secretary, which they have refused to obey, on the basis of a mere request for the temporary use of the papers until the day of semi-annual payments should return, is not warranted by the facts, and is so far an abandonment of the real ground of the controversy.

We cannot take leave of the opinion of the attorney general without farther commentary on his concluding observations. He contends not only that the books and papers, but the funds also in the pension agency, may be removed for temporary purposes. "They (the books and papers) are," says he, "exclusively the property of the government." Hence he contends that "the government" is entitled to them during the interval between the semi-annual payments! "The same remark," he adds, "may also be applied to the moneys of the agency, which the government is not bound to leave on deposit in the bank, even if it were admitted that the law has imposed on it the duty of employing the bank to pay them out. The conduct of the bank, regarding it in this light, and independently of every other objection, appears to me to be wholly indefensible."

The president, in the message, says, "I add my entire concurrence in the views he (the attorney general, in this opinion) has taken."

What is meant by "the government?" If this expression here has any meaning, it is confined to the executive department alone. No other branch of the government had any thing to do with the change of the pension agency; and in a spirit of candor towards the officer who made this report at the request of the president, we have combated his argument as we felt bound to consider he intended it should be understood. We have, therefore, answered his reasoning in relation to the books and papers of the agency as if he had said that the executive or the department of war was entitled to their custody. But this is not the "government." Ours is a government of laws. To say that the president and congress can, only by law, reclaim the agency; that none but the government, in the proper signification of the word, is entitled to the books and papers, as well as the funds in the hands of the agent it has created, when it may demand them according to the forms of law, is to say just what we have contended for, and to admit what we understand the attorney general to deny. If the attorney general supposes that the president is the government, or that any executive department is the government of this country, it is time that his reading of the constitution should be examined, especially by congress.

The power to remove the public deposits from the bank has never been confided to the secretary of war. The bank charter enacts that the deposits shall remain in the bank, unless the secretary of the treasury shall otherwise direct. The duties of the latter, under the act of the 7th of June, 1832, which devolved on the former officer by virtue of the joint resolution of the 25th of June, 1833, do not embrace the superintendence of the system of finance, but the direction of the times and places of paying one class of pensioners. When the secretary of the treasury shall direct the surrender of these funds, after his warrant for them has been once issued with all the forms of law; after they have been paid out of the treasury on that warrant into the bank, and there placed to the credit of the pension fund, it will be time to consider whether his direction ought to be obeyed, and whenever it shall be decided by the secretary of the treasury that the pension fund is still in the treasury, and he shall attempt to give the proper attention to the subject. But if the power is now claimed to be in the secretary of war (in virtue of his right to direct the pension agent) to put the pension fund in his pocket when he pleases, or, during the intervals between the semi-annual payments of pensioners, we find in the laws no warrant for such a pretension. The duties of the secretary were to be auxiliary to those of the bank in the duty of paying pensions. Their co-ordinate powers are misunderstood when the former attempts to remove the latter, as his subordinate, at pleasure, or to assume the execution of those duties which congress has confided to the latter alone.

It appears that, in the matter which has been referred to the committee, the bank has acted only on the defensive, and has done no more than is required of every trustee. It has assumed no attitude which ought to be considered as offensive to any department of the government, but it has been faithful to its trust. In this country every man must exercise his own judgment in matters touching his rights and duties. This is incident to his right of self-defence. And the president demanded of the bank their banking house in Washington as a suitable place for the treasury department, after the late conflagration of the treasury buildings, might not the bank have decided against the application without being censured for "sitting in judgment upon the legality of the acts of the constituted authorities?" May not the opinion of the corporation upon the construction of any law differ from that of the executive officers of the United States? The citizens who subscribed for stock in this bank have not thereby lost the right to sit in judgment, in this sense, on the acts and conduct of any man or set of men in this nation, who, in their honest judgment, may invade their privileges, or seek to deprive them of an opportunity of discharging their duties. The case of a corporation is like that of every individual in this respect. The president has no right to take private property for public use from any man without his consent, or the consent of his representatives, and compensation to him. Now, if the president demands the land of a citizen for a light house, or any other public work, may not the owner consider and decide for himself the question of title, without being reproached for a "usurpation of the judicial power?" Must he who says to an executive officer, "I contend for my property, and have decided that, before I surrender to you what I believe to be mine, I will defend myself in the courts of law," be therefore denounced as usurping judicial power? The bank has done no more to occasion such a denunciation. It has respectfully considered, and fully replied to the executive mandate. Its answer is, that it considers itself bound by the laws of congress not to surrender the pension agency without the consent of congress. It professes its perfect willingness to yield the trust if congress will release it. Without that release, it must, in self-defence, abide a suit in the court, if the executive choose to go to law. It has not relied alone on its own judgment. In doubt of its own opinion, it has left the question to eminent counsel, and, in perfect frankness, it has communicated to the executive officer their views and arguments. This is what the president terms "usurping judicial power," and prescribing to the executive department the manner in which it shall execute the trust confided to it by law. This is called "checking and controlling the acts of the public servants by an irresponsible money-corporation;" and we are gravely told that, if this be tolerated, "the whole frame of our government is changed, and we have established a power in the bank above what we derive from the people." It appears to the committee that the executive in this case assumes to itself the judicial power, for the very reason that it denies to the bank the right to inquire into its duties. It sets up a claim which it will not suffer the bank to deny or doubt. It demands an immediate surrender on its own judgment, and necessarily refuses to the agent of the government the right to invoke the decision of the court for its protection. Such pretensions are new in the history of executive power in this nation. They are unsuited to the genius of the government under which we live; and wherever they shall so prevail, that an American citizen shall not dare to dispute with an executive officer upon any question touching his right to either property, character or liberty, then indeed, in the language of the president, "the whole frame of our government will be changed," and, no matter what may be its name, it will be a hateful despotism.

The president complains that the pensioners will suffer by the conduct of the bank. From a part of the correspondence submitted to us, it would appear that the new pension agents have, in some instances at least, been paying their claims. But if they are indeed sufferers, if delays and embarrassments have been incurred by the gallant defenders of their country in the receipt of the debt which the gratitude of the nation has awarded to them, and which, in many instances, is necessary for their subsistence and comfort in their declining years, it is plain that all those delays and embarrassments have been occasioned solely by an illegal order emanating from the executive, and commanding the bank "to cease paying the pensions." The best mode of exhibiting executive sympathy for the soldiers of the revolution is not in publicly deploring their unhappy fate and their distressed condition, but in rescinding the order which prohibits the bank from paying them their dues. Until this be done, the committee is compelled to requit the bank, when thus arraigned before them on a charge of cruelty to the revolutionary soldiers.

In conclusion the committee recommend for the adoption of the senate, the following resolution, and pray to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject:

Resolved, That the department of war is not warranted in appointing pension agents in any state or territory where the bank of the United States or one of its branches has been established.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 2—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, MARCH 8, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,172.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

It is a long time since when we said any thing to our friends about the small money matters between them and us—and we would not now be importunate; but a valuable favor might be conferred, if those to whom the payment of our little demands, now or a short time hence, is unimportant, would promptly recollect and relieve us.

The brief speech of Mr. Heath, our own immediate representative in congress, on presenting the Baltimore memorial praying for a restoration of the public deposits, is inserted in a subsequent page. Mr. H. has fully realized, in all his proceedings, and in this matter especially, the just expectations of those who supported him; and he is, besides, a very industrious and attentive member in the house, and also to the private business and local affairs of his constituents.

The following, from a Philadelphia paper, though not exactly in our way because of its personally political bearing, is such a "good thing" that we give it a place. It is genuinely "salted," as major Downing would say.

"Mr. Heath, of Maryland, made some remarks, in the course of which, he stated that he was a Jackson man; that he had supported the administration, but that he was not a "collar man." The speaker called him to order. Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, who is not only a sensible, but a pleasant, sarcastic man, remarked, in an under tone, that the speaker was determined not to have any stray horses running about here, without collars on, and therefore stopped Mr. Heath."

We give accounts of two meetings about the bank and the deposits, &c. of very different character, which it seemed necessary to make room for in the REGISTER—one held at Tammany hall, New York, and the other in Monument square, Baltimore; and in the proceedings of each there is much matter for reflection.

A retirement from such publications, and pretty full notices of other matters connected with the proceedings had in this season of excitement, cannot be promised, and the report and counter report of the committee of ways and means of the house of representatives of the United States, and such like papers, must obtain room; and other articles will be presented over which we shall not have any sort of discretion; but we are really wearied and worn-out by the pressure of such things, which bears as hard upon our pages, as the pressure caused by the removal of the deposits bears upon our means to print them!—and the misery is, that, in neither case, is there a present prospect of relief to cheer us. But with regard to the REGISTER, itself, we know that its utility is reduced, in the consequent neglect of other important things which ought to be recorded, and which all persons will, hereafter, expect to find preserved in it.

We have a copy of the report of the committee of the mechanics, &c. of New York, giving an account of their visit to Washington and interview with the president, and also of the proceedings of a great meeting of the people held at Philadelphia on Tuesday last, at which earnest resolutions, &c. were passed in support of the president and his measures, in relation to the bank. We cannot give either.

Courage and perseverance have various qualities; and one of the greatest exertions of them is for a member of congress, to rise in his place, and expel the audience, and then whip out the members themselves, in "less than no time," as major Downing says.

THE CURRENCY, &c. BRIEF NOTICES.

The banks of Pittsburgh have resolved not to receive the notes of the Ohio banks.

A bill has passed both houses of the legislature of Kentucky establishing a state bank.

The bank of Louisville, Kentucky, one of the new deposit banks, has refused to receive further deposits on account of the United States, and deposited with the branch of the bank of the United States in that city, all the public money or effects in possession, to be paid over as a "special" concern, when demanded.

The Columbia (Pa.) Spy of Saturday says: "We understand that orders have been received to stop all work on the second track of the railway between this place and Philadelphia."

The "New York Commercial Advertiser" of the 1st inst. had the following bank note table—

A considerable improvement has taken place this day. The Eastern bank notes are redeemed at  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. discount. New York, city notes, par. Long Island, do. Dutchess and Poughkeepsie, do. Hudson River, do. Other River notes, including West Chester,  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Albany, Troy, Lansingburgh and Schenectady,  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. All others, west of Albany,  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. New Jersey,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a 1 per cent. Pennsylvania,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  a 2 per cent. Delaware, 2. Maryland, 1 a  $1\frac{1}{2}$ . District of Columbia,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ . Virginia, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ . North and South Carolina, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Georgia, 3 a 5. Ohio, Cleveland,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ . Georgia, 3; all others 5. Michigan,  $1\frac{1}{2}$ . Canada, 3 a 6 per cent.

[The rates in Baltimore, as to eastern money, are much higher. Bills of the New England banks average 2 per cent. and those of New York, except of the city banks, from 2 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 3 per cent. discount—and so of others. Those of the District, and of Virginia, are at a lower rate.]

By the direction of a majority of the stockholders, the Western bank of Philadelphia, has petitioned congress for a restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the United States.

The price of wheat at Le Roy, N. Y. is "five shillings," or 62 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents. It was recently one dollar. At Genesee wheat is said to have "no price." At Zanesville, O. the price of wheat is reported at 37 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents, and flour at Wheeling \$2 30.

Several new banks have just been incorporated in New Jersey.

The Harrisburgh Chronicle of Monday says, "two bids are now before the governor, for the temporary and permanent state loans, but neither of them will be accepted before the 25th of this month—as the time for receiving proposals is extended to that date.

Since the above was in type, we have understood that one of the bids is for $100,000—the other for $729,000, being the whole of the balance of the permanent loan of 1833."

The money market, we are sorry to say, becomes "harder and harder," though the bank of the U. S. has much extended its line of discounts at several places,* and has a circulation of nearly two millions more than it had at this time last year—the removal of the deposits to the contrary notwithstanding. Why then is not the market made easy? Confidence is wanting; and confidence is the life of a free circulation of money. We shall not re-epitulate the unpleasant things before us. The distress so much spoken of is now reaching the "working men." Due bills are issued at many of our large manufacturing establishments, and the desire to build houses seems almost totally suppressed, in an inability to pay the cost of their erection, in all our chief cities and towns. Thousands of persons are yet at work because of the indisposition of their employers to discharge them, though the latter would be gladly relieved of them, at this time.

ITEMS—OR BRIEF NOTICES.

Gov. Breathitt, of Kentucky, is deceased. Lieutenant gov. Morehead (anti ad.) takes his place.

It will be seen that ex-governor Lincoln has taken his seat in the house, in the place of Mr. Davis, (now gov. of Massachusetts) resigned—and Benjamin Watkins Leigh, his place in the senate, vice Mr. Rives, resigned.

*The Boston Transcript states that the branch bank discounted three hundred thousand dollars on Wednesday last week.

The "Albany Daily Advertiser" gives the unwelcome report, that some of the Ohio banks have stopped specie payments, and that others were "tottering." We would hope it is not true.

But that the distress which has not yet, as we fear, nearly reached its extent on the sea-board, will reach the interior, must be expected. One thing is certain—the present state of things cannot endure much longer. There must be a restoration of confidence—a general ruin of business men, or a "rag currency," with some few exceptions.

Flour at Cincinnati, Feb. 25—3 dollars. Wheat at Syracuse, N. Y. 6½ cents. Cotton at Mobile, from 7½ to 11 cents. Eastern bank notes, at Baltimore, 2 per cent. discount. New York (country) 3 per cent. The bills of several of the southern banks are at 28 per cent. in New-York.

The draughts of the U. States officers at St. Louis, on the treasury at Washington, have been returned protested.

It is broadly insinuated, that the Pennsylvania state loan, has really been offered for ($300,000 in part), by the use of moneys belonging to the U. States, through the Girard bank! We are not prepared to believe this.

The nominations of Mr. Livingston as our minister to France; of Mr. T. P. Barton to be secretary to the same legation; of Mr. A. Middleton, jr. to be secretary of the legation of the United States at Madrid; of J. S. Cabot to be commissioner under the Neapolitan treaty; of R. M. Saunders to be commissioner under the French treaty; of J. W. Overton to be secretary to the commission under the Neapolitan treaty, and of Alexander Hunter, as marshal of the District of Columbia, vice Ashton, deceased, have been lately confirmed by the senate.

We have many other such like items before us—but cannot make room for them.

To the editor of the Baltimore Gazette.

DEAR SIR—A writer in the "Baltimore Gazette" (J. S.) a few days ago, had the following paragraph:

"If there was any thing wanting sir, to show that the opposition to the president in this matter—at least among some of the most prominent leaders of it—was the result of mere party animosity, and a disposition to oppose and embarrass him by every means—it might be found in the speeches and writings of those very men, (who are the most clamorous now), in former times, in relation to a similar institution. In fact you might with some plausibility charge the president and his friends with having borrowed their arguments and views against the present United States bank, from those very documents to which I refer. In proof of what I state, I am sure it is not necessary for me to bring to your view the speeches and votes and writings in former times, of such men as Clay, Webster and H. Niles, on the subject—men who are avowedly among the leaders of the bank party at the present moment."

Similar things, and in a much more exceptionable manner, have oftentimes been said of "H. Niles"—but their source was from a quarter that I could not descend to notice.

It is a most unfortunate event that politics, properly so called, ever entered into so delicate and profound a matter as the currency of the country. Why such "two-penny" considerations as the interest of office-holders, and aspirants for offices of profit and of honor, should have influence over this subject—or by whom they were introduced, it is not important now to examine: but that even personally political considerations have a powerful influence over it, is not to be questioned.* To bring about this state of things I have not, knowingly, had the least concern. But thus it was in relation to internal improvements and the protection of American industry—these, too, were ferociously forced into petty political interests and passions. How do the politics of Pennsylvania, for a remarkable instance, stand with her hitherto nearly unnimous support of internal improvements, a protecting tariff, and the bank of the United States, all which were lately considered, and openly avowed, as "PENNSYLVANIA MEASURES," and by all parties in that state? And how stands the case now? These things are only hinted at. They deserve the presentation of a body of official facts, with remarks, that I have not time to collect and arrange at present. But will simply ask—has not a turn of the party-wheel almost capsize what all men regarded as essential principles in the policy of the great state just named?

*How many members of congress would stand opposed to a restoration of the deposits, should the president retrace his steps? Would there be thirty persons, excluding the members from one particular state? I think not. And are there thirty members, except as excepted, that would now advise a removal of the deposits, was the question submitted to them?

For myself, however, I throw back on the writer of the communication in the "Gazette," the imputation that party, in its present phases, had the shadow of an influence over my conduct, in either of these great points—for I was earnestly the friend of each, (qualified, as I still am, with regard to the last), before the slightest suspicion was entertained that gen. Jackson stood opposed to either; and up to the very hour of his vetoes on two of them, a large majority of his most earnest friends, in the middle and western states, entirely believed that he would respect the "policy of Pennsylvania," which had so faithfully supported him.

Politics, however, had much influence over the minds of the people, as to the old bank of the United States. They were, however, of a more generous and liberal nature, and with a more manifest regard to just principles. And that bank, whether justly or unjustly accused, was certainly believed, (by its opponents), to have lent the whole of its influence to party-politics; and, in those days, I was familiar with many apparently well-attested cases to shew that a man's political principles were weighed by the boards of directors, in granting accommodations; and so, also, with some of the directors of other banks. I do know that the politics of "H. Niles," then an opponent of the administration in 1800, was offered as a reason why a note offered by him should not be discounted—and that that reason was not esteemed a good one; the requisite number of directors believing that the bank had nothing to do with the politics of the party making the note. But as to the present bank of the United States, who ever heard a suspicion breathed, in any manner whatsoever, of its interference with party politics until it was put upon its defence, by a premature attack upon it; premature even if it was proper that its charter should not be renewed? And, while agreeing that it has no claim to a renewal of its charter, as a matter of right, I must say that the uncalled-for attack upon it was, time and circumstances being regarded, one of the most extraordinary proceedings that I have witnessed.† It was doing more than "meeting evil half-way." IT INVITED EVIL; and though not, I would hope, so designed by the president, placed the decision of the question much on party grounds. And I have many reasons to believe that this movement had its origin (not with the president) but in local considerations or personal views.

An examination of these matters would require much room, and a great deal of labor—I think that they are capable of the clearest demonstration; but that would lead to presentations of supposed motives of individuals, and open a field for such discussions as have been seldom indulged in by me. If the doctrines that relate to internal improvements, the tariff, and the bank, have been made party matters, I am guiltless of that sin; but do know that certain principles, as to the second especially, which I held and supported more than thirty-five years ago, have been arrayed against me as party politics of these latter times! The reason is obvious. As persons turn round, they sometimes suppose that a post runs against them. This may easily happen in a state of excitement.

As to the bank—I admit one change of opinion, and one only, except on that great and glorious principle by which the "chief of sinners" is accepted—being sanctified by repentance, evidenced in good works.

The change of opinion is as to the constitutionality of the bank, in which I followed the "father of the constitution," the illustrious MADISON, and other men of the highest grade in the republic—and also fell in with the doctrines of ALWAYS "DEMOCRATIC" PENNSYLVANIA, which, more than once, through her DEMOCRATIC legislature, has passed an unanimous, or nearly unanimous, vote in favor of that institution, and in the most decided terms, though once opposed to such an institution, as unconstitutional, &c.* May not the men alluded to, and the "key-state" the "honest state" the "whole" ever democratic state of Pennsylvania, save so humble an individual as H. Niles from political condemnation on this account! But other instances might be added, and equally remarkable, if necessary. They are not necessary. If so, the decision of the council of Castile, that it was "wrong to make a certain river navigable, because that if God had intended it to be navigated, he would, Himself, have made it navigable," was a just one. Is it blasphemy, as it was once considered, to believe that the earth which we inhabit, is a globe and not a plain? Is it the end of knowledge in agriculture to attach a woman and a cow to the plough—to make horses draw by their tails? or to depend on the stars, and not on the compass, for the correct sailing of ships? Is knowledge to stand still?

† I could mention the names of several of the present most distinguished friends of the administration, who so regarded the first message of the president in relation to it.

The change of opinion alluded to was brought about in a certain belief, gradually and cautiously established, of the NECESSITY of a national bank. The constitutional power did not, and yet does not, clearly appear, except in this—that there must exist a power to regulate the currency and commerce of the country, so as best to "promote the general welfare." And the necessity of a national bank is now so apparent, that many of the old and most able and strict construers of the constitution, are anxious that the power to establish one should be given by an amendment of the constitution. The good conduct of the bank, too, since its reformation, had much influence over my mind. I never heard of it, or saw it, or felt it, (for many years) as an oppressor, unless in solitary cases, perhaps, not fairly represented. On the other hand, I knew and felt that it was rendering most important services in facilitating and equalizing the exchanges of the whole country, and in furnishing a circulating medium which was more nearly at par than coin itself—because of the cost and risk of transportations of the latter, to keep up the exchanges; and soon believed, as I still believe, that these exchanges must be exceedingly embarrassed and greatly diminished, without such circulations of values as the bank of the United States furnished, and would yet supply, if it had only been permitted to wind up its affairs unobstructed by the hostility of "the government." These good opinions of the bank were the result only of considerations of the general benefit, in which I liberally participated—for I never received the slightest matter of favor or accommodation from it, unless of a general nature; and my name, by an act of my own, was never presented to the bank, two instances excepted, to the best of my recollection—unless in the endorsement of checks made payable to me, and remitted from distant places.† Thus seeing and feeling that the bank was rendering most important public services to the government and people, and accomplishing all the good which its most sanguine friends had expected, without iniquitous exertions of its great power, (which I had so much feared, and would not re-grant in a new charter, as shall be stated below), to produce evil, confidence was yielded because it was deserved; and, the constitutional objection waived for the present, if not surrendered, in the seemingly manifest necessity of some such an establishment.

It does not appear required of me to pursue this part of the subject any further. I opposed the bank as unconstitutional, and now believe that it is constitutional—the expediency of renewing the present act of incorporation, however, is another affair. This change of opinion is freely admitted. It is, perhaps, the only material one that I have made, as to any matter of principle, though between 30 or 40 years before the public as a free writer on polity and politics.

But I was opposed—aye, violently opposed, to the bank, on account of what I thought its bad conduct in 1818-19. I truly believed, whether rightly or wrongfully is no matter now, that its management was in the hands of individuals who were improperly using its mighty means to promote their own personal interests,* at the sacrifice of the public interest; and some things were reported, or made known to me, that I thought deserved the severest reprehension, and so did I reprehend them, with a degree of industry and zeal that was never surpassed; and have always believed that I deserved some degree of credit for the courage with which I attacked this bank, and the "rag barons" generally, and the constancy with which I pursued both, until a reformation was effected, through the force of public opinion—for it was freely predicted and generally believed, by many of my best friends, that I would, and must, fall a victim to the power of the paper money makers and lenders of currency. It was not so. When I began the attack, the stock of the bank, being abominably hypotheated, (as I thought), had a selling or a market value of more than 150 dollars a share—when I ceased the attack, because of a reformation effected, the stock was selling at about 85 or 90 dollars. I do not believe, and cannot affect a belief, that this revolution was brought about by myself—but I had, perhaps, rather more to do in it than any other person, and do take some credit to myself for the amendments that were made, whereby the bank was brought back to its original purposes, as I esteemed them; and the reform quieted my opposition to the bank, for then no desire existed in me to embarrass or destroy it.

With these explanations and references to facts, which are accessible to thousands through the preservation of numerous files of the REGISTER, I appeal to the common sense of my fellow citizens, to the good feeling of every fire at Fayetteville, (as president of the Mechanical fire company); and the second in the sale or collection of a check on one of the western offices for a little money deposited to his credit therein. His small account was kept in the Union bank of Maryland, (the present deposit bank), in which he takes much pleasure to say, that every request made by him, being considered moderate, (one excepted, and then only for the moment, as it were), has been complied with—since the present administration of that bank, at least.

* At a meeting held at Tammany Hall, New York, on the 19th Feb. (last) a certain report was presented and adopted, signed by Preserved Fish and James J. Roosevelt, esqs. in which certain extracts were made from my work (the "Register") of 1819, as to the prodigality of some of the speculators in the bank, and the pressure on the people, at that time. There is not one word in these extracts that I will retract. They were true, as were a thousand other things that I said, at the time; and it will be recollected by many that I then prophesied, "palaces would be turned into poor houses" because of such proceedings. Did it not happen? Let the like be avoided, hereafter! But if these matters are brought up in judgment against me,—Peter, the apostle, as is stated below, should always be esteemed a base coward and liar. He was not so—nor do honest men so esteem him. The wrong that he committed was washed away by repentance and good works, and so it was with the reformed bank.

It is proper to add, that the pressure on the people above spoken of was as much caused by the deranged state of the local banks, called upon to make specie payments, as by the acts of the bank of the United States. Jobbers and gamblers and shavers were not confined within the walls of that institution.

For the article above alluded to see page 27.

*The leading "democrats" of Pennsylvania opposed the old bank as being unconstitutional. I cannot just now lay my hand upon the yeas and nays in congress concerning it—but well know that, to put it down, for the reasons assigned above, as well as on constitutional principles, was the "democratic" order of that day.

The Pennsylvania delegation in congress voted against the present bank, on constitutional grounds chiefly—against it 12, for it 7, absent 4.

But the Pennsylvania delegation, with both the senators, (Messrs. Watkins and Dallas), voted for the bill of 1832, which was vetoed by the president—for that bill 24, against it 1, and one absent, in the house. The solitary nay was given by Mr. A. King, the absent member was Mr. Muhlenberg.

And in 1832, the following resolution passed the legislature of Pennsylvania unanimously:

Resolved by the authority aforesaid, That connected as the prosperity of AGRICULTURE and MANUFACTURES are with the successful financial operations and sound currency of the country, we view the speedy rechartering of the bank of the United States as of VITAL IMPORTANCE to the public welfare."

†These things are mentioned because that venal and corrupt men always measure other men's actions by the base motives which influence their own. And I repeat it, that the name of "H. Niles," to the best of his recollection, (except in endorsement of checks payable to him), was never by him, or for his use, presented to the bank of the United States, or any of its offices, but in two instances. The first was for the purpose of remitting 100 dollars for the relief of the sufferers by the great upright man, whether what I said of the bank as it was, in my opinion, should be retorted against me as applicable to the bank as it is, in my opinion. If such a proceeding is right, or honest,—Peter, the “prince of the apostles,” as he is called, should bear rank only with Judas Iscariot. But Peter wept and repented, and reformed—and suffered martyrdom in testimony of the doctrines of his Lord and Master, whom he had, in a season of weakness, three times denied, and just after professions of the most ardent attachment to him! And who shall stand in that great day of condemnation which the Christian public believes in, if repentance and reformation do not relieve the burthen of sin committed? And we are told that there is more rejoicing over one man that repenteth than over ninety and nine who needeth it not. And so it certainly should be, amongst men, else every motive to a reformation of the heart and conduct must expire.

I blame not those who sincerely believe, as I believed in 1818–19, that the bank of the United States has behaved improperly. They have an undoubted right to enjoy their belief and to act upon it; but the same right belongs also to me. Some charges are preferred against the bank, for which it is desirable that no foundation for a suspicion should have been laid—but considering the position in which the bank was placed, by the extraordinary war that was commenced against it, without cause, in the out-set, at least,—these things, if not to be justified, may be excused, in its defence; for it must be recollected that its very solvency was assailed, though its power to maintain itself is now the leading cause of vituperation against it! Does not this show that some grand “mistake” has been made?

Though no man expected that such a war as has prevailed against the bank could be waged,* the ability of the bank to defend itself is conclusive evidence of the existence of a power in that institution which, in 1818–19, I spoke so freely of, and certainly feared; which power, though if admitted to be now exerted only for the noble purpose of preserving a wholesome and sound currency, I would not agree to continue; but, on the other hand, the power of the executive against the bank, should be also restrained. I shall not discuss these matters; but proceed to make some remarks as to a renewal of the charter, on certain conditions, and conclude—just taking leave to say, that my wish for the continuation of a national bank, is not quite the same thing as a continuation of the present charter to the national bank!

1. I prefer a renewal of the charter, to the establishment of a new bank, for the highly important reason, that the latter would open a new and vast field for new speculations (in which the public has no sort of interest, except in public suffering because of them), more pregnant in rascalities [I have written the word and will not blot it], than even were those imputed to the early managers of the present bank, and about which I was so anxious, at the time.

2. Whether the location of a renewed bank shall be at Philadelphia or New York, is of little moment to the people, at large; but a plan could be easily devised (as I think), by which all reasonable cause for local jealousies, or interferences with local concerns, might be relieved. There must, however, be only one head—for the general policy of the bank, to be wholesome, must be a steady one.

3. Reduce the capital of the bank to the 28 millions, as now held by the private stockholders—forbid the bank to issue notes, or any thing in lieu thereof, of a less denomination than 10, 15 or even 20 dollars, and provide that the least denomination of notes shall be paid at any, or either, of the offices, in specie, on demand; and that all other notes shall be received in settlements with banks, as was provided for in the vetoed bill of 1832. Thus the burthen of preserving a sound and equal currency would be laid on the bank, while it would be protected in a considerable degree, as it ought, from unjust “runs” that otherwise might be made upon it, by malicious and irresponsible individuals—for, in this case, the state banks would have a deep interest in the national bank, and the business of the currency proceed, and be respected, as a mutual concern. The people could not suffer by this arrangement, and the well managed state banks would be always safe under it—which is a matter of high consideration with every man. Impose on the bank all its duties, restraints and checks as provided in the present charter, and add others, if necessary; prohibit it from establishing new branches, without the consent of the states in which they are to be located, and provide means by which the states may discontinue branches under certain strictly guarded regulations, to prevent sudden embarrassments of the currency, and let the capital vested in the branches be subject to the state laws which levy taxes on the capital of their own banks, on the same conditions—but with these strong restraints, (the political iniquity of selling acts of incorporation being also regarded) let the recharter be made without demanding a bonus.

4. Vest the power concerning the deposits only in congress—the senate and house of representatives, without resort or reference to the president or secretary of the treasury, when congress is in session; in the recess, let the secretary have power to remove the public moneys only in cases of imminent danger of the insolvency of the bank, (indicated by overt acts) with the approbation of the chief justice of the United States, for the time being—that officer being, as much as is possible, removed from political impulses; which should never prevail in the consideration of a matter so delicate as the state of the currency.

5. But the state banks which issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall not be entitled to press on the bank of the United States or any of its offices, as provided for in No. 3—and all receivers of public money should be forbidden to receive any of the notes of such banks, whether large or small, in the payment of debts due the United States.

6. To provide against the want of a general, convenient and equal currency, (for the state banks cannot furnish it), and to make a further and wholesome advance in the use of coin, and check the shaving of state bank notes without the range of their own approved circulation, let the value of gold, in weight or fineness, be reduced one or two per cent. below that of silver, as such value is generally measured in our exchanges with Great Britain and France, that we may have a free circulation of gold coins—eagles, halves and quarters, made out of our own gold. At the general rate of exchanges, our eagles are worth $10 30 to $10 50 in dollars, and they “flee away;” but make them worth $9 80, and they, and their parts, will remain with us, and the amount allowed for seignorage could not furnish any just cause for complaint, inasmuch as bank notes or silver might still be used, if persons preferred the risk, expense, and labor or loss, of making disbursements with them.

Such are the “checks and balances” that I would propose to restrain the power of the bank of the United States, (and of the state banks, also), to do wrong, and render both more useful and safe than they are. It is no argument in favor of the present power of the bank of the U. States that it has not abused it, as most business men believe that it has not, since its reformation; but it has power, in its ability to regulate the “circulation of values,” as stated in the last REGISTER, to assess, as it were, the money-value of every man’s field or house, which power has been exerted by the president of the U. States in removing the deposits, and I would not grant it to either; for the reason that it may be abused, and is not at all necessary to the public good.

Such is a free outline of my views. Perhaps, they will not please either party to the present controversy, but I think them sound—and, so thinking, present them. It is my opinion, that the provisions suggested would check the power of the bank, without affecting either its usefulness or the profit of its stockholders. The character of its business might be considerably changed, in some places—inland bills taking the place of domestic notes, and for which a national bank is most needed; and the tariff on them would be continually regulated by the good state banks, so far as they should be capable of sustaining a uniform currency. But I cannot go into further details. The article is too long already.

*There is some difficulty in this reference, for the reason that the matter might come into court—but confidence may be safely reposed in the rest of the bench of judges—should it ever so happen.

In speaking above of the currency being a "delicate and profound" subject, I am well aware that some may ask, why I have meddled with it? But the attitude in which I am seemingly placed, whether in relation to past or present things, in relation to the bank, appeared to require such an adventure on my part. In the existing state of parties, I think that a spirit of accommodation ought to prevail. THE NATION STANDS ON THE VERY BRINK OF A HORRIBLE PRECIPICE.

The preceding remarks are not offered in the way of an apology. What I said and did in 1818-19, I would say and do again, under the same impressions of duty—the same offences against the "common welfare," and to relieve the people of a "rag currency" or "rag barons," of all sorts and sizes, from the bank of the United States, to the travelling or "saddle bags bank" of Parkersburg* or equally famous bank of "Owl Creek."

Very respectfully, H. NILES.

Baltimore, March 3, 1834.

AWFUL DISASTER. The splendid steamboat, William Penn, capt. Jefferies, of the Baltimore and Philadelphia Citizens Union Line, when off Gloucester Point House, about three miles below Philadelphia, on her regular trip from New Castle, was discovered to be on fire in the afternoon of the 4th inst. in or near the wheel house. There were from 150 to 200 persons on board, and, as the flames spread with almost inconceivable rapidity, from the lightness of the wood used in her upper deck, &c. the scene that followed may be imagined, but cannot be described. Capt. Jefferies, on this trying occasion, appears to have behaved with great energy and thoughtfulness. He ordered the boat run a-shore, side on, but it seems that the helmsman, in the confusion, run her stem on—thus placing the bow in the mid while the stern was yet in deep water, and the "wall of fire," in the middle of the boat, separated the passengers, and seems chiefly to have caused the loss of life that followed, as well as much increased the difficulty of escaping even from the bow, for the passengers, after letting themselves down, or jumping overboard, had to wade through deep water and soft mud nearly 200 feet, before they reached the firm ground, and two or three are supposed to have been drowned by jumping off the stern. Being in the neighborhood of the city, very prompt and generous assistance was rendered, whereby the amount of suffering was much alleviated—but those who escaped were in a wretched plight from wading to shore.

As we suppose that a particular statement of this melancholy affair will be published, we shall not now attempt a gathering of the facts given in the Philadelphia papers. It is only certainly known that five persons were lost—among them the rev. Mr. Moore, of Lewistown, Del. col Porter, of Philadelphia, and a female unknown, by drowning, and Walter M. Bulkeley, a respectable merchant of Hartford, Con. because of wounds and exposure, being in bad health; what became of the other is not stated. A great deal of the baggage was thrown overboard and saved, and the chief of the mails. But the Baltimore bag, which contained also the letters received by the great western mails, was no doubt, as we think, consumed, for it could not be found; and a mail lock and chain were discovered, partially melted by the fire, on searching the ruins of the boat. Other mails may have shared the same fate.

Soon after the William Penn struck the bottom, she was in one tremendous sheet of flame—but at half past 6 o'clock, floated off with the tide, and went up the river, still burning, until she grounded on the island opposite the city, where she burnt down to the water's-edge.

Besides the loss of life, several were very badly wounded. Mr. Bulkeley had $900 in his stock, which were saved. There were about 12 women, with several children on board—all the latter saved, two of the former lost.

The mayor of Philadelphia, and others, made great exertions to relieve the sufferings, and afford such comfort to the passengers as their several cases required.

*If I have wrongfully located this bank, I beg pardon of the good people of Parkersburg—and it may be that I have, for it is several years since that I lit a segar with one of its ten dollar notes! But there was a "bank" whose notes were carried about the country in saddle bags, to be exchanged with lenders and others for their notes!

The boat was worth 70 or 80,000 dollars—and some very valuable effects are supposed to have been lost, besides the mails. One lot of jewelry, worth $15,000, is mentioned.

Three bags, containing newspapers and pamphlets, were received on the evening of the 4th, from on board the William Penn—one of them partly burnt, some of the packages missing, and a portion of the remainder so wetted and defaced, as to render further transportation useless. One package, marked "Massachusetts state," taken from the Washington city letter mail, the only one saved, and containing letters for parts of New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, was detained, the letters being too damp to be forwarded.

A number of bags, containing newspapers and pamphlets, are missing, some it is supposed were burnt, and others thrown overboard and lost.

Persons finding any loose packages, and detaining or embazzelling them, will be prosecuted under the act of congress, and become liable to fine and imprisonment. If returned immediately to the office, a suitable reward will be given.

Further search has led to the conclusion that two large portmanteaus, containing the letters from Baltimore city and the west—embracing, as is supposed, Cincinnati, and Ohio state; (south) Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, west Tennessee, Western Shore of Maryland, and Washington, Brownsville, Union Town and New Geneva, Pa. and for distribution, have been entirely consumed. Their locks and chains, partly melted, were found in the wreck of the boat, on the falling of the tide, by Mr. Mc Cahen, chief carrier, and the proprietors of the hotel at Kaign's Point. Messrs. Taber and Potter, after a diligent search on the flats, at low water, were unable to discover any of the lost mails. It is impossible to tell the extent of the loss occasioned by the destruction of the portmanteaus.

JAMES PAGE, P. M.

Baltimore post office—8 P. M. 6th March, 1834.

It would appear by a letter just received by me from Col. Page, postmaster of Philadelphia, that all letter mails made up at this office for Philadelphia and for cities east of that office, have been destroyed or lost. The same portmanteau conveyed the letter mail from the west for cities east of this. The letter from the postmaster of Philadelphia, with any other particulars which may be received, will be sent to the Exchange rooms, for the information of merchants and others. J. S. SKINNER, P. #### FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 27th and Havre to the 30th Jan. both inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The king was to open the approaching session of parliament in person. Much speculation exists in the money market in England, as to the probable effect of the crisis in the United States, brought on by the controversy between our government and the United States bank. The general impression was that large importations of specie from that country to this will be rendered necessary to sustain credit here, and that this will produce an influence on the exchanges in England.

SPAIN.

A conspiracy against the life of the queen and her regent mother, had been discovered, and several distinguished persons arrested. The change in the ministry is confirmed, the liberal party having succeeded in obtaining power. The consequence was that the government had issued ordinances for the immediate convocation of the cortes. Don Carlos was still in Portugal. Gen. Llander, who sent so strong a remonstrance to the queen, has issued a proclamation, in which he states that all his hopes have been realized by the late political changes at Madrid.

PORTUGAL.

Gen. Saldanha with a body of Don Pedro's army had captured the town of Leira; the entire garrison, comprising 1,476 men 46 cavalry, with the exception of three officers and six cavalry fell into his hands. Don Pedro's forces had also gained an advantage at Marvao, and it was supposed that the Miguelites could not hold out much longer.

FRANCE.

Rumors were rife of the expected resignation of ministers. There had been a difficulty between the committee of the chambers and the minister of war, with respect to the estimates for the army, which, on conference, had been adjusted. The French ship of the line, La Superbe, had been lost in the Levant. The same letter which announces this fact, also states that the frigate United States, commodore Patterson, lost some of her masts, had her sails torn away and her boats carried off, and after being nearly embayed off the coast of Andros, had been so fortunate as to gain the harbor of Milo. The papers contain the notes which passed between the French minister J. de Lagrene and the Russian minister, Nesselrode, relative to the treaty between the latter power and the porte. The French minister is instructed to declare, that if the stipulations of this act should lead to an armed intervention of Russia in the internal affairs of Turkey, the French government will consider itself at liberty to act as may be suggested by circumstances. The reply of the Russian minister denies the right of a third party to interfere between two independent nations in their treaty arrangements, and that, acting on this principle, the emperor will fulfil all his obligations towards Turkey.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

February 28. Among other morning business attended to, many resolutions that had been laid on the table were taken up and agreed to.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Poindexter was then taken up, and discussed for nearly three hours, in which Messrs. Poindexter, Forsyth, King, Grundy, Clay, Black, Moore, Mangum and White, participated.

The resolution was agreed to. [The discussion was very warm and personal, between Messrs. Poindexter and Forsyth, because of impeachments of the facts suggested by the former—which led to an apprehension that they must result in a personal rencontre. But by the interference of distinguished friends of both parties, the difference was satisfactorily adjusted—as it should have been.]

Many bills were taken up and considered, and referred or passed. After which the senate went into the consideration of executive business, and when the doors were opened, adjourned until Monday.

March 3. Mr. Clayton presented the draught of a memorial, signed by one thousand six hundred and fifty citizens of the county of Newcastle, in the state of Delaware, praying the restoration of the public deposits, to the bank of the United States, and the permanent establishment of a sound and uniform currency. After stating the contents of the memorial, Mr. C. observed, that it had been delivered to him by a delegation composed of gentlemen of the first respectability, appointed at a meeting of the citizens of that county, held at the city of Wilmington, on the 22d ult. and represented to be the largest assemblage at that place within the recollection of those who attended it.

The memorial, said Mr. C. is signed by a majority of all the legal voters of the only county in the state which has ever expressed an opinion, by a plurality of votes at any election, in favor of the present chief magistrate of the United States. Men of all parties, of all trades and professions, of all the grades of life, whether rich or poor, farmers, manufacturers, merchants, mechanics and laborers, have concurred in the expression of that sentiment which is now pervading all the ranks and classes of men in other sections of the union, that the appropriate remedy for the distresses of the country is the restoration of the public treasure to the public agent, primarily appointed by congress to receive it.

Mr. C. proceeded to speak at considerable length on the character of the petition and state of things in Delaware. He first spoke of the farmers, who had sustained a loss in the price of corn of 25 cents a bushel—at the time of the removal of the deposits it was 70 cents, and expected to increase, it is now 45 cents, and dull, and declining. He next referred to the manufacturers, and said many were compelled to receive due bills, called "Jackson money," payable four or five months after date, which they had to get "shaved"—the employer having no other alternative but this from the necessity of turning his workmen out of doors. He also stated the following significant facts:

"The mechanics and merchants, too, have participated fully in the difficulties which embarrass the farmer and manufacturer. The effect is felt of course with most severity by those to whom they have heretofore given employment. To illustrate the real state of things existing among the poor, I will mention a single fact which has been related to me by a friend. In the city [Wilmington] where this memorial originated, there is, as in other large towns throughout the country, a savings' bank, in which the wages of labor have been deposited. Last year at this season the deposits for a month were about $1,200, the amount withdrawn about $400. In the corresponding month of the present year the deposits have been about $400, and the amount withdrawn $3,700. Is the inference fair, that the poor are now living on their former earnings, and that the laborer wants employment?"

He further observed—"No, sir, the hope of the petitioners rests not on such as these, 'regiments of office holders,' &c. which he had just described) but on congress, and on congress alone. They present themselves here, neither as stockholders nor as debtors of the bank of the United States; as men in no manner connected with the institution, or subject to its control. They tell you in their memorial, that there is in their state no branch of the bank of the United States, and that the curtailments which their own state banks have been compelled to resort to, were not caused by any pressure of the bank of the U. States upon them, but by the general distrust which the unexpected removal of the public moneys from an institution where they were advantageously employed, has created in all the state banks, and among the whole commercial community.

Fully convinced that this is the cause of their embarrassments, they earnestly pray that the deposits may be restored; and, without soliciting a recharter of the present bank, or venturing to point out any other course, they ask from congress, in general but expressive language, the adoption of some measure for the permanent establishment of a sound currency.

[Mr. C. pursued the subject much further, with his usual ability, but we cannot follow him]. The memorial was referred.

Mr. Poindexter rose for the purpose of redeeming the pledge which he had given to institute an inquiry into the alleged frauds in the sales of the public lands; and having made a few strong remarks on the matter generally, he submitted the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the circumstances attending the recent sales of the public lands in the state of Mississippi and Alabama; and whether the proclamations of the president of the United States, causing the public lands in the districts of country acquired from the Choctaw tribe of Indians by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, and from the Creek tribe of Indians in Alabama, to be offered at public sale, were issued and promulgated a reasonable length of time prior to the day on which said sales were directed to be commenced in each of said districts, to give proper notice to the people of the United States of the days appointed for said sales.

2. Resolved, That the same committee inquire whether any fraudulent practices, to the injury of the public interests, took place at said sales by reasons of combinations of companies or individuals, interdicting or unfavorable to a fair competition between bidders for the public lands offered for sale in said districts; and, if so, whether the officers superintending said sales had knowledge of, or participated in, such fraudulent practices or combinations.

3. Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire whether the registers of the land offices and the receivers of public moneys at any of the land offices of the United States, or either of them, have, in violation of law and of their official duties, demanded or accepted a bonus or premium from any purchaser or purchasers of the public lands, at public or private sale, for the benefit of such officer or officers, as a condition on which such purchaser or purchasers should be allowed to enter or purchase any tract or tracts of land offered for sale by the United States; and also, whether any register or receiver as aforesaid has been guilty of fraud or partiality in the sales of the public lands, by adopting rules and regulations, in their respective offices, inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

4. Resolved, That the said committee inquire whether the public lands, at any land office in the state of Mississippi, have been sold otherwise than for cash; and whether any register or receiver in said state has, at any time, taken in payment the promissory note of any purchaser or purchasers, bearing an interest to accrue to the benefit of such register or receiver.

5. Resolved, That, in prosecution of said inquiries, the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses before them on oath, touching the matters aforesaid.

Mr. Poindexter also offered the following:

1. Resolved, That the secretary of the war department be directed to communicate to the senate, the name or names of the agent or agents appointed by the president of the United States to locate the reservations granted to individuals of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek; and also, copies of such instructions as may have been given to the agent or agents so appointed; and of any correspondence which may have taken place between any officer in the department of war and said agent or agents, or any other person or persons, whose correspondence may be in the department, touching the location of said reservations, and the manner in which the duties of said agent or agents may have been performed.

2. Resolved, That the said secretary be directed to transmit to the senate, a copy of the register of the names of such Choctaw Indians, as claim reservations of lands, under the 14th and 19th articles of said treaty.

Mr. Grundy expressed his satisfaction that this movement had been made. If any thing wrong had been done, he would be glad to see it exposed. His object in rising, was to ask for the printing of the resolutions, in order that he might be able to ascertain whether it might not be necessary to give some further instruction in the committee.

The resolutions calling for information, were then considered and adopted.

The other resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKean presented the proceedings of a meeting of "the friends of the constitution and laws," comprising the farmers, manufacturers and mechanics, laborers in wood, citizens of the townships of Oxford, Lower Dublin, Eyberry, Moreland, and unincorporated Northern Liberties of the county of Philadelphia, condemning, in strong and emphatic language, the conduct of the president of the United States, in reference to the removal of the public deposits from the United States' bank, as an act unwise, illegal, vindictive, unnecessary and unjust. They suggest various expedients for redress, and intimate the propriety of congress withholding appropriations and supplies for certain portions of the public service, until the executive shall yield his assent to other measures necessary for the public welfare.

Mr. McKean also presented the proceedings of an union meeting (of all political parties) of the city and county of Lancaster opposed to the removal of the deposits, and in favor of rechartering the United States' bank.

Mr. McKean further presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of the township of Roxborough and town of Main-Yunk, in the county of Philadelphia, in favor of restoring the deposits and rechartering the United States' bank; which were read, referred to the committee of finance and ordered to be printed.

The chair having called the special order, &c. Mr. Chambers moved that it might be postponed for the purpose of taking up the French apolition bill. Mr. Clay objected, and hoped that the subject under discussion would not be postponed—he wished it closed, and thought a few days would suffice for that purpose. After some further remarks, Mr. Hill rose and made some observations in favor of the report of the secretary on removing the deposits; and the senate adjourned, (at 4 o'clock) before he had concluded.

March 4. The chair communicated the proceedings of, and resolutions adopted at, a town meeting in Philadelphia, of a large number of its citizens, who describe themselves friendly to the administration, and opposed to the United States bank; but remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits; as impolitic, unjust, and in violation of the public faith; and ascribing the pecuniary embarrassments of the country to that measure.

Mr. McKean moved that it should be referred and printed; but before the question was taken, Mr. Clay made a few, but forcible remarks on the current of public opinion, &c. and concluded with asking—"Would any one say, after what we have witnessed—ruinous scenes of distress, worse than the devastations of an invading army—that we can get on without a national bank? No, after years of suffering, gentlemen would get up and say, that their experiment had not been worked out, and they would propose a bank in a certain street and in a certain city he had before named; and if the statute of limitation, to which he had alluded, as to political opinions, should not be rescinded, such a proposition would no doubt be supported by gentlemen now opposed to a bank. He had made these few observations because the memorial, coming from the source it did, was about to be referred without one single remark, without one single remark, without one word expressive of satisfaction from the friends of the administration."

Mr. McKean spoke of the signers of the petition as gentlemen of the highest respectability, &c. Mr. Grundy then made a few remarks, shewing his preference for Philadelphia, as the seat of the national bank, if such an institution shall be continued. The petition was then referred, &c.

When the chair presented the proceedings of the people of Chester county, Pa. as noticed in the proceedings of the other house—

Mr. McKean said, that, while he did not doubt the existence of pecuniary embarrassments and distress in the country; on the contrary, believing it to exist to some extent—he did not feel himself compelled to express his entire satisfaction in all the sentiments expressed by his friend, from Kentucky. The subject matter of the memorials had been well described by the gentleman, and the senate had, no doubt, been better entertained by hearing them read, than by any remarks he could make. He moved that the memorials be referred to the committee on finance and printed; which motion was carried.

The chair communicated a report from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the information called for by the resolution of the 28th ult. on the subject of the transfer of public deposits from the Planters' bank at Natchez.

Also, a report from the same department, made in compliance with the resolution of the 28th ult. enclosing copies of statements of the affairs of the bank of the United States from August, 1833, to February, 1834, inclusive.

Also, a report from the postmaster general, made in compliance with the resolution of the 19th of December last.

All of which, without reading, were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Poindexter, from the select committee, to whom the subject was referred, made a report on the subject of the election of the hon. A. Robbins, and the memorial of the hon. E. R. Potter.

[The report gives the right of the seat to Mr. Robbins. Mr. Wright, on the part of the minority, said he should present a counter report, when he could obtain possession of the papers, &c. After considerable debate on the order of proceeding, the report was ordered to be printed. It is very long, and occupied about an hour in the reading.]

After some other business, Mr. Hill continued and concluded his remarks, and then the senate, after spending some time in executive business, adjourned.

March 5. Mr. Preston presented the credentials of Benjamin Watkins Leigh, elected a senator by the legislature of the state of Virginia, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of hon. William C. Rives. Mr. Leigh was qualified and took his seat.

After some other proceedings, the senate proceeded to consider the resolutions moved by Mr. Poindexter on Monday last, which after several verbal amendments were severally adopted.

Mr. Morris moved to adopt the following as a sixth resolution, but subsequently withdrew his motion:

Resolved, That the committee, before they proceed to inquire into the conduct of any register or receiver of the public moneys at any land office in the United States, make out a specification of charges and facts which the committee believe to be true, and into which they shall be of opinion an inquiry ought to be made; that they transmit a copy of the same to such register or receiver, who shall have the privilege to produce before the committee such testimony in his favor as he shall think proper. The senate then adjourned.

March 6. Many petitions were presented this day, and one by Mr. Wright, from 316 respectable citizens of Buffalo, praying for a restoration of the deposits.

The senate attended to a good deal of local and private business this day, and spent some time in secret session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 28. This day is given up to the consideration of private business—but among the morning proceedings—

Mr. Hall, of North Carolina, offered the following resolution: Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a plan, accompanied by a bill, to reduce the revenue to the necessary expenses of the government.

Mr. Stewart moved the question of consideration.

Mr. McDuffie requested Mr. S. to withdraw his motion; but he declined doing so.

Mr. Comer then demanded the yeas and nays upon the preliminary question of consideration; which were ordered and taken, as follows:

For the consideration 69—against it 115. [And so the consideration was refused, on the motion of Mr. Stewart, which voted with the majority—his object being to put the matter at rest.]

Other things being attended to, the house proceeded to the order of the day, and ordered a number of private bills to a third reading, &c. that for the relief of Mrs. Decatur remaining as it was, after considerable discussion. Adjourned until Monday.

Monday, March 3. This being petition-day, as soon as the journal was read—

Mr. Heister of Pennsylvania, rose and said, I have had transmitted to me, for presentation to this house, the proceedings of a meeting held on the 23d ult. in the city of Lancaster, Pennsylvania. On the authority of a number of gentlemen of the first respectability, I take occasion to state, that it was a meeting as numerous attended as any ever held in that populous and highly favored agricultural county; that it was principally composed of the bone and sinew, of the yeomanry and business men of the country; and it may be proper to state, further, that the meeting was, as it purports to have been, a "union meeting," composed of a very respectable proportion of the original, and many of the continued friends of the present chief magistrate, down to the time of his unfortunate interference with, and direction of, and removal of the public deposits, which, in one of the resolutions, is so justly characterized "as an act in itself unwise, the effect not having been duly considered, not called for by the exigency of the times, adverse to the real interests of the county, and derogatory to the national character of the United States."

On this all important and interesting subject, I have not, for one moment, doubted what course, not only the interests of my immediate constituents, but the great interests of the whole country, required me, as an humble member of this honorable body, to pursue; and it is no small gratification to me to be so strongly and creditably sustained in what I had conscientiously conceived to be my duty.

Mr. H. made many other remarks, against the "experiment" that was now going on, &c. and stated that the memorials now presented by him were signed by 2,840 citizens of Lancaster county, praying for a restoration of the deposits and a recharter of the bank.

Many petitions praying for a restoration of the deposits, &c. were also presented.

By Mr. Polts, from the people of Chester county, Pa. The number of the names is not given, but Mr. P. said that in some of the townships, they had been signed by every voter, four or five persons excepted, and without regard to party.

By the speaker, from citizens of Philadelphia friendly to the administration, but opposed to the removal of the deposits.

By Mr. Wagener, from 250 citizens of Northampton co. Pa.

By Mr. Binney, from 1,700 citizens of the same county;

By Mr. Harper, from the — bank, Philadelphia;

By Mr. Sutherland, from a great meeting at Roxbury, Pa.

By Mr. Denny, from the bank of Pittsburg;

By the same from the borough of Alleghany;

By Mr. King, from Schuylkill co. Pa.

By Mr. Wabnough, two memorials from the third congressional district (his own) of Pennsylvania—one from the mechanics and working men of the Northern Liberties, the other from the farmers, manufacturers, &c. of several townships in Philadelphia county, &c.

By Mr. Milham, from New Castle county, Delaware, signed by nearly 1,700 citizens, a majority of all the voters in the county.

Mr. Gordon presented the resolutions of the legislature of Virginia.

Petitions against a restoration of the deposits were presented by Mr. King, from Schuylkill co. Pa.

By Mr. Sutherland, signed by 4,000 working men of the 3d congressional district of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. McKim, from 3,624 persons of Baltimore. [On most of the presentations of petitions some remarks were offered—cannot give them at length, unless they were very brief, but shall take a rapid view of the most material things which happened this day.]

Mr. Potts spoke at considerable length of the force and unanimity of the resolutions, &c. adopted in Chester county, by persons of all parties, &c. and said that the time had come when freemen must prove their title to that name, or lose it forever.

Mr. Sutherland as well as Mr. Harper, spoke decidedly in favor of the character of those friends of the administration, in Philadelphia, who petitioned for a restoration of the deposits.

When Mr. Sutherland presented the petition signed by "4,000 working men" of the 3d congressional district of Pennsylvania. Mr. Walmough, (whose district it is) expressed much surprise—seeing that he held other memorials of an opposite nature, &c. It was ordered that the names should be printed with the memorial.

Mr. Milligan on presenting the petition from New Castle county, spoke highly of the signers and of the committee charged with its delivery at Washington, and entered warmly, and at much length, into the general merits of the subject.

Mr. McKim said—I am requested to present two memorials, signed by 3,624 citizens of Baltimore stating that they approve of the course of the administration in relation to the bank of the United States, and praying that the charter of said bank may not be renewed. I shall not, Mr. Speaker, trespass on the time of the house, by detailing the various trades and professions of the signers to this memorial; it is sufficient for my purpose to say, that they are American freemen, and as such, entitled to be heard, and to have equal weight and consideration, in proportion to their numbers, as to any memorial yet presented to this house.

Mr. Gordon when presenting the Virginia resolutions, very earnestly supported the principles stated in them, and warmly reprobated the seizure of the public purse by the president. Mr. Patton, in reply, defended the president, and warmly attacked the governor of Virginia because he had enclosed the resolutions in the following letter, in which he insisted that he (the governor) had travelled out of the line of his duty:

Virginia, executive department, Feb. 13, 1834.

Sir: In compliance with the request of the general assembly of the commonwealth, it gives me great pleasure to transmit to you the accompanying resolutions adopted by that body, disapproving of the recent act of the president, in withdrawing and withholding the public deposits from the bank where they had been placed by law.

This dangerous and alarming assumption of power has already inflicted deep and lasting injury upon the citizens of this commonwealth, which your efforts and exertions in the congress of the United States, it is hoped, will aid in alleviating as far as practicable, and restraining the disposition which the president has manifested to extend his official authority beyond its just and proper limits, which he has so clearly manifested in his recent interference with the treasury department of the federal government.

I am sir, with respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

JOHN FLOYD.

Tuesday, March 4. Mr. Polk, from the committee of ways and means, to which had been referred the letter of the secretary of the treasury, giving his reasons for withdrawing the public deposits from the bank of the United States; the memorial of the bank, and various other papers on the same general subject, made a report: He moved that it be printed, and its consideration postponed to tomorrow week.

Mr. Clay called for the reading of the report.

Mr. McDuffie objected.

The chair decided that it was the right of a member to have any paper read when first presented to the house.

Mr. McDuffie moved that the reading be dispensed with.

The chair pronounced that motion out of order; as the reading was of right.

Mr. Hardin remonstrated against the unnecessary consumption of time in reading a long report, and probably a counter report, both of which would be immediately printed.

Mr. Clay said that he wished the reading, because he meant to follow it by a motion for printing an extra number of copies of the report.

Mr. Hardin said he would vote for the extra number without the reading.

The chair stated, at length, why he had decided that the reading was of right, when called for, and then said

The report must therefore be read, if desired by the member from Alabama.

The house acquiesced in the decision of the speaker, and the paper was ordered to be read.

The reading of the report was then commenced, and had proceeded some time; when

Mr. Clay stating it to be his understanding that no objection would be made to the printing of an extra number of the report, withdrew his call for the reading; and it was thereupon suspended; but, at the request of a member, the resolutions with which the report closed were read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered.

2. Resolved, That the public deposits ought not to be restored to the bank of the United States.

3. Resolved, That the state banks ought to be continued as the places of deposits of the public money, and that it is expedient for congress to make further provision by law, prescribing the mode of selection, the securities to be taken, and the manner and terms on which they are to be employed.

4. Resolved, That, for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as practicable, the cause of the commercial embarrassment and distress complained of by numerous citizens of the U. States, in sundry memorials which have been presented to congress at the present session, and of inquiring whether the charter of the bank of the United States has been violated; and, also, what corruptions and abuses have existed in its management; whether it has used its corporate power or money to control the press, to interfere in politics, or influence elections; and whether it has had any agency, through its management or money, in producing the existing pressure; a select committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the said bank, who shall report whether the provisions of the charter have been violated or not; and, also, what abuses, corruptions or mal-practices have existed in the management of said bank; and that the said committee be authorised to send for persons and papers, and to summon and examine witnesses, on oath, and to examine into the affairs of the said bank and branches, and they are further authorised to visit the principal bank, or any of its branches, for the purpose of inspecting the books, correspondence, accounts and other papers connected with its management or business; and that the said committee be required to report the result of such investigation, together with the evidence they may take, at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. McDuffie asked whether it would be in order, at this time, to move an amendment to these resolutions.

The chair replied in the negative, as the question before the house was on the postponement.

Mr. McDuffie then requested Mr. Polk to withdraw his motion; but he declined.

Mr. Wilde inquired whether it would be in order to move a reference of the report to a committee of the whole on the state of the union?

The chair replied that the question of postponement had precedence.

The question was put on the postponement and carried—and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Binney presented to the house a report from the minority of the committee of ways and means on the same subject, and moved that it receive the same destination with the last paper; which was agreed to.

Mr. Clay moved that 10,000 extra copies of both reports be printed.

Mr. Hawes moved, as an amendment, that there be 50,000; but it was negatived.

Mr. Reed then moved 20,000; but this was also negatived.

Mr. Hall, of Maine, moved 15,000.

Mr. Evans, of Indiana, opposed the printing of so great a number of a report calculated, as this is, to extend the existing panic, by tending to create a wrong belief, that no adequate substitute for the existing United States' bank can be created. He contended that the people would not, as they consulted their own and the general good, place reliance upon a local currency that would eventually operate as a severe tax upon the industry of the country. He thought that the committee should have shown and recommended a suitable and proper substitute for the general good, when it is determined the existing corporation bank shall cease. He would oppose the printing of so many thousands of a report that could not fail to extend the existing want of confidence, and consequently increase the existing embarrassment of the country. He would return it with instructions to the committee, or lay it upon the table.

[The speaker here informed the member from Indiana that it was not in order to debate the merits of the question.]

The motion for printing 15,000 copies was agreed to.

Mr. Wilde wished to move that an amendment be printed, which he desired to offer when the subject came up, (the same in substance as the second resolution of Mr. Clay's motion in the senate, viz: that the reasons of the secretary of the treasury for the removal of the public deposits are unsatisfactory and insufficient), but the house refused to suspend the rule in order to receive Mr. Wilde's motion.

After some other business the house adjourned.

Wednesday, March 5. Levi Lincoln, member elect from Massachusetts, vice John Davis, resigned, appeared, was sworn and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. Vance, the rule of the house was suspended in order to resume the calling of petitions suspended on Monday last.

Memorials in favor of the restoration of the deposits were presented as follows:

From Wheeling, Virginia, signed by 500 citizens—from Fayetteville, North Carolina—from Norfolk, Virginia—from Augusta Georgia, signed by 400 persons—from Salem, Kentucky—from Union, Boone county, Kentucky—two from Louisville, Kentucky; signed by upwards of 1,000 inhabitants—from Madison, Indiana—from New Bedford, Massachusetts, signed by 1,920 persons—from Burlington, Vermont.

Mr. Conner, of North Carolina, presented the proceedings of a meeting in Cabarrus county, North Carolina, of the same tenor as the above memorials.

Memorials approving of the removal of the deposits were presented as follows:

From Zanesville and Norwich, Ohio—from Cbatouque county, New York, signed by 570 inhabitants.

Mr. Pope presented a petition in relation to the Louisville and Portland canal.

Mr. Foster presented certain resolutions of the state of Georgia in relation to the public lands.

Mr. Ellsworth presented a number of memorials on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia. The house then adjourned.

Thursday, March 6. Mr. J. Q. Adams asked leave to offer a resolution, which being objected to, the rule was suspended by the house, and the resolution was offered, as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to this house a statement of all the sums denominated in the treasury accounts unavailable funds; specifically designating the several banks, or individuals, indebted to the treasury therefor; the time when each debt first became due; the time when failure of payment thereof first occurred; the security, if any, which the public have for payment thereof at any time, and the prospect of such eventual payment.

This resolve, according to the rules of the house, lies on the table for one day.

The commutation pension bill was discussed—but nothing important transacted this day.

MR. HEATH'S SPEECH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Heath, in presenting a memorial, from a numerous body of citizens in Baltimore, condemning the removal of the public deposits, said, he should avail himself of the opportunity of addressing a few remarks to the house on this subject.

First, with regard to the memorial which had been entrusted to his care, it was signed by upwards of three thousand individuals of all classes and without distinction of party. It included the whole of the commercial, trading and manufacturing interests of that portion of the community which he had the honor to represent. Among other names of high respectability, were to be found several of the directors of the Union bank of Maryland, a bank which had been selected by the administration as a place of deposit for the public moneys—together with the presidents, cashiers and directors of several other banks in Baltimore. The memorial in fact, contained scarcely a single name that was not well known for integrity and moral worth. He would confidently appeal to his honorable colleague (Mr. McKim) who, he was sure, would at all times be found ready to testify to the high standing, intelligence, enterprise and talents of the citizens of the district which he, (Mr. H.) had the honor to represent. He said it with pride, and yet with confidence, that there was no city in this great union, possessed men more ardent for their country's welfare, more able to sustain her glory and honor, or more free from the trammels of party prejudice, than the city of Baltimore. In commercial enterprise and in the rigid fulfilment of engagements, her citizens yielded to none, and it was a memorial signed by such men, he now presented to the house.

He was well aware of the nature of the oath taken by him as a member of that house, and he was not the less aware that neither that oath, nor the constitution of his country, which he had so solemnly sworn to maintain, recognized any party feeling or party prejudice. But he could not help expressing his astonishment and regret to observe that too many honorable gentlemen who had addressed the house upon this vital question, had manifested a warmth of party feeling little consistent with the character of the deliberative representation of the people. In saying thus much, he wished not to be understood as meaning to reflect personally, upon the line of conduct, any other member might have deemed it his duty to pursue. For himself, he could solemnly and conscientiously aver, that when he first entered the door of that hall, he entered it divested of the remotest principle of party feeling or party prejudice. He entered it as an American freeman, to exercise the right bestowed upon a free representative of a free and enlightened people, resolved to act for his country and his country only. It was these views and these feelings that should alone bias the course he intended to adopt.

It has been said upon that floor that the bank of the United States had been guilty of a violation of its charter. If so, the law had provided an ample remedy, and he thought that remedy should have been first applied. He would not that the writ of scire facias should have been withheld one hour after the delinquency had been proved. We have been told that the bank had made use of their funds for electioneering and other illegal purposes. It might be so, but he would ask, was not the same to be apprehended from the state banks? Had they not the same means, the same ability, the same end to answer, and what proof was there that they would be more immaculate than this chartered institution? He called upon every member of that house to divest himself of party feeling—he called upon them in the name of their constituents and of their country to do so, and he would ask, if they could lay their hands upon their hearts in the presence of their God, and reconcile it to their conscience in considering a question of this important character upon party principles? Had the guilt of the bank been established? Were all the charges brought against that institution made out? He had not seen them. The public, however, did know something about the conduct of the bank, and he would briefly enumerate what that was.

The bank had acted as the faithful agent of the government for a period of seventeen years, during which time it had paid to that government from six to seven per cent. annually. It had disbursed all the draughts made upon it by government, and distributed the deposits of the public money free of charge and free of risk throughout every state and territory of the union. Nor had the country been a loser to the amount of one solitary cent in any of these great transactions. These were facts known to the world, and in the face of them he would ask, if it were good policy to withdraw the funds from an institution like this, and scatter them over the country, scarce any one knew where? To take them out of vaults over which the government had complete control, and place them where it had none. To remove them from a bank in which they appointed directors of their own, and deposit them in others, in not one of which they had the power of appointing a single director, or a prospect of receiving one cent of interest for the public money.

Of one thing the country had hitherto been assured, that whatever might have been the conduct of the United States' bank in regard to other matters, the public money was at least safe in its vaults, which was more than they could assure themselves of at this time. He greatly feared that it would be found in perhaps not a few of them, when the people called for their money, that more than one hole had existed through which the deposits had escaped, never more to be recovered. He should be happy if his fears were groundless, but from what he knew he could augur nothing better.

Mr. H. said he had been sent to that house not as a partisan, nor upon party feelings, but as a free and independent American citizen, who would never bend his neck to the collar nor to the yoke. He stood before that house with the proud consciousness of possessing a character that had never been known to swerve from duty. This was perhaps much to say, but he would appeal to those who had long known him, and there were some within the sound of his voice, for the truth of this declaration. It was the duty he owed his constituents and his country, that impelled him to the course he should pursue on this question. It was with pain that he found himself arrayed against the course of the present executive, for he would say that general Jackson had not a more ardent, zealous or sincere friend on this floor that he had been. The whole of (Mr. H.'s) public life would attest the truth of this. He had uniformly supported all his measures, and had the greatest confidence in his integrity. He would say more, he was still his friend and admirer, and happy should he be if he could add, he was still his advocate. His duty impelled him to an opposite course, and the period had not yet arrived in this country when an American citizen dared not differ from the president of the United States in any matter brought before congress or the public. He was not prepared to receive either the collar or the yoke. He could not help expressing his regret that such terms were drawn from him, but he would appeal to the partisans of the president of the United States on that floor, and ask them if instead of sending a message announcing the withdrawal of the deposits from the United States' bank, he had thought fit to send a message directing them to be restored, whether they would not have lifted their voices high and as loudly in favor of their return as they had done in support of their removal. He was firmly of opinion they would have done so.

The speaker called the honorable member to order. Remarks of that character, impugning the motives of members of the house, could not be allowed.

Mr. Heath hoped he should be excused if he had not confined himself within the strict rules of debate, since it was the first time he had ever addressed that honorable assembly. He admitted he was not yet conversant with the rules of order, as technically understood here; but he had been always taught to believe that TRUTH WAS IN ORDER WHENEVER IT WAS SPOKEN. He said he should not detain the house with any further observations, but would ask for the reading of the memorial.

The clerk read the memorial; and Mr. Heath moved that it be referred to the committee of ways and means and printed; which motion was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF MR. RIVES.

Washington, February 22d, 1834.

To the hon. the speaker of the house of delegates.

SIR—I have the honor to enclose a communication to the general assembly of Virginia, which I pray you to have the goodness to lay before the house of delegates.

I avail myself, with great pleasure, of the occasion to offer you the assurances of the distinguished consideration with which I am your fellow citizen and most obedient servant.

W. C. RIVES.

Washington, 22d February, 1834.

To the speakers and members of both houses of the general assembly of Virginia.

I yesterday had the honor to receive the resolutions of the general assembly of Virginia, adopted on the 11th instant, in relation to the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States; and have considered them with all the respectful attention due to the high source from which they emanate, as well as to the unusual gravity of the matters which they concern. Under a deep sense of the obligation of the representative to conform to the wishes and opinions of his constituents; or otherwise, to surrender the trust committed to him, (which is justly regarded as a fundamental principle of our institutions), I have anxiously sought the line of duty, which the occasion made it incumbent on me to pursue.

A full and unreserved execution of the opinions of the general assembly, if the circumstances of the case permitted it, is the alternative I should greatly have preferred, as more consonant, as well to my own feelings and inclinations, as to the deference entertained for the general assembly itself. Knowing no object more worthy the ambition of her sons than to represent in the congress of the United States the ancient and honorable commonwealth which has given me birth, and to whose favor I am indebted for whatever of consideration I may have acquired amongst my fellow citizens, I have earnestly wished to adopt that alternative, which would have me still, where it has been my pride to be employed—in her service. But the resolutions of the general assembly render this course, however gratifying it would be, impossible. Had those resolutions instructed me to vote for or against a specific legislative act, whatever different opinions I might have formed in my own imperfect judgment of the expediency of the measure, I should have felt no hesitation in executing the instruction, and giving the vote required. But, in the present instance, the instruction requires “the senators to use their best exertions to procure the adoption by congress of proper measures for restoring the public moneys to the bank of the United States,” &c. leaving it to be inferred from the prevailing spirit and tenor of the resolutions only, what measures might be deemed by the general assembly to be proper to that end.

The very general terms thus adopted by the legislature, have made it my duty carefully to examine the whole of the resolutions for the indications they furnish of its views in that respect. The 1st resolution, I find, declares, “the recent act of the president exerting a control, &c. to be a dangerous and alarming usurpation of power, by that officer, which cannot be too strongly condemned.” It would seem, therefore, that a declaration to that effect by congress was among the measures deemed proper by the general assembly, and in which the senators of Virginia were instructed to co-operate in order to effect a restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the U. States. This supposition is confirmed by the fact, that the only measures proposed, or likely to be proposed in the senate, with a view to that object, are two declaratory resolutions, moved by an honorable senator from Kentucky, the first of which contains the declaration of an unconstitutional and dangerous assumption of power by the president, in substantially the same language as that of the 1st resolution of the general assembly; and the other declares the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury, for the removal of the deposits, to be unsatisfactory and insufficient.

The last of these resolutions, together with the report of the secretary of the treasury, assigning his reasons for the removal of the deposits, had been referred to the committee of finance of the senate. That committee after a detailed examination of the reasons of the secretary, and pronouncing them successively to be irrelevant, insufficient and unfounded, conclude their report, not with a bill or joint resolution of the two houses, directing the restoration of the deposits, but simply with a recommendation that the senate adopt the declaratory resolution of the senator from Kentucky. The chairman of the committee, moreover, distinctly stated on the floor of the senate, that a mere declaration by congress of the insufficiency of the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury, was all that was deemed necessary to effect a restoration of the deposits, the act of the secretary on the subject being considered by the committee as provisional only. Similar views had also been intimated by the mover of the resolutions; and that such is now the settled plan of those in congress who advocate a restoration of the deposits, there is not in my mind, judging from the facts I have stated and other concurring circumstances, the slightest room for doubt.

The measures, then, and the only measures on which I should be called to carry into effect the instructions of the general assembly, are the two resolutions referred to and now depending before the senate. These resolutions contain nothing but expressions of opinion; the 1st, as already mentioned, declaring that the act of the president in dismissing one secretary, and appointing another, was, under the circumstances of the case, an unconstitutional and dangerous assumption of power; the 2d, that the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury, for the removal of the deposits, were insufficient and unsatisfactory. On both of these propositions, after the most careful and anxious reflection I was capable of bestowing on the subject, I had formed opposite opinions, which I had already expressed and maintained on the floor of the senate. On the other hand, it is now apparent, and not to be questioned, that the views expressed by the general assembly are in perfect concurrence with the resolutions of the senator from Kentucky pending before the senate. I am placed, therefore, by the instructions of the general assembly in this dilemma—either to vote for the resolutions of the senator from Kentucky, and thereby adopt as my own, opinions which I not only do not entertain, but which had already been repudiated by me in the most solemn form; or, by voting against them, to oppose the only measures likely to come before the senate for a restoration of the deposits, and thus appear in the attitude of disregarding and thwarting the declared wishes of the general assembly. The first branch of the alternative, the just and correct feelings of the general assembly, will, I am persuaded, at once put aside as entirely inadmissible, while the latter is no less repelled on my part by a sense of duty, and an honorable fidelity in the discharge of the trust reposed in me.

The only course, then, left to me, recognizing as I do the fundamental obligations growing out of the relation of representative and constituent, and which constitute the vital principle of the republican system, is, by resigning the trust with which I have been heretofore honored by the confidence of the general assembly, to enable them to confer it on another, who can better carry their views and opinions into effect. I beg leave to repeat, that if I had been called on to vote for a specific legislative act, however it might have been my misfortune to differ in opinion from the general assembly as to the expediency of the act, I should have felt it my duty to give the vote required. But, as under the circumstances in which I am placed, the views of the general assembly can be carried into effect only by my concurring in the declaration of opinions which; as already remarked, I not only do not entertain, but the opposite of which I have earnestly asserted and maintained. I do not deceive myself, I trust, in supposing that there is no principle of obligation or propriety on which I could be expected or required to do an act involving equal violence to character and conscience. I have thought it, on the contrary, more consistent with the wishes and intentions of the general assembly, as well as with my own character, to resign into their hands, as I now respectfully do, the office of senator of Virginia in the congress of the United States, which has been, and would have continued to be, my highest pride to hold, so long as I could do so with honor.

To this communication, I beg leave to add the expression of the dutiful and distinguished consideration with which I am, your fellow citizen and most obedient servant.

W. C. RIVES.

Mr. Rives, on the 21st Feb. addressed a letter to the editor of the “Richmond Enquirer,” from which, in justice to him, we make the following extracts:

“I am sorry that my friends should, for a moment, have given any sort of credit to the rumor that I am going into the cabinet. There is not, my dear sir, the slightest foundation for this rumor and I beg you to be assured, and to assure all my friends, that no earthly considerations would induce me, standing in the position I now do, to take an executive appointment. Whatever other denunciations may be poured out against me, no suspicion shall rest upon the purity of my motives in the course which, from the deepest conviction, I have pursued here. I shall throw myself fearlessly upon the people of Virginia, to sustain and vindicate the principles I have contended for in their name. I go at once into private life, to co-operate, nevertheless, to the best of my ability, in the maintenance of the principles which have heretofore been cherished by Virginia, and with the distinct understanding, that I invoke the judgment of the people in the coming elections. The issue will thus be joined with our adversaries in the most emphatic manner, and in the way best calculated to arouse the vigilance of the people in the selection of their representatives.”

“I shall go upon the republican principle which we have always recognized in Virginia, to obey or resign; and my resignation, under the circumstances of the case, will be the most unequivocal recognition I could make of the authority of the legislature. Be assured, I shall give no countenance to the sophism of Mr. Southard and Mr. Frelinghuysen, that the senator must look to the people and not to the legislature—a principle which opens the widest door for the evasion of all responsibility on the part of the senators of the United States.”

LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Read in the senate and house of representatives, Feb. 26, 1834.
To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

GENTLEMEN: Recent events have produced a change in the pecuniary relations of the commonwealth so sudden and unexpected, and of a character so blighting to the reasonable hopes and expectations which had heretofore been fondly cherished, and which, from the flattering prospects the recent prosperous condition of the commonwealth held out to us, we had every reason to believe would be realized, that I feel it my duty to bring the subject before the representatives of the people, as claiming, in a peculiar manner, their attention, and such prompt legislative action, as will be best calculated to meet the emergency.

Of the loan of three hundred thousand dollars, recently authorized by the general assembly, to meet the demands upon the treasury, arising from the failure on the part of the holders of the principal loan of last year, to comply with their contract, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars still remains undeposited; and for the balance of the last year's loan, amounting to seven hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars, and upwards, which had been thrown into the market, and which it was expected would have been negotiated on the twenty-second instant, I regret to say, not a bid was received. A disappointment so extraordinary, was scarcely to have been expected, even under the present deranged state of the money market; but whilst we may regret that a combination of circumstances, so unpropitious and discouraging in their character, and bearing upon the important interests of the commonwealth, should exist, it is at the same time gratifying to know, that the causes in which they originated are not ascribable to any depression of the credit of the state; to any want of punctuality in meeting its engagements, in the payment of interest upon its debt, or to any mismanagement on the part of those to whom has been entrusted the charge and administration of its fiscal and other concerns. I infer this from the fact, that if such cause had existed, its notoriety would long since have been made manifest. It is said by those conversant with such matters, and whose opportunities of acquiring correct information on the subject, entitles them to belief, that Pennsylvania stocks are in as good credit, and maintain as high prices in foreign markets now, as they have done at any time heretofore. To what cause then are we to look for the difficulties which embarrass us on every side?

It must be owing to extraneous circumstances, unconnected with the commonwealth or its transactions, and over which it has no control. We must be indebted, it is presumed, for this unpropitious state of things, to the existing excitement and alarm, got up in relation to a supposed general state of pressure, distress and embarrassment, said now to be prevalent in the money market, and about which we hear so much. All confidence in the currency of the country is said to be destroyed; that banks as well as individual capitalists, are unwilling to adventure upon speculations or investments of any kind, or to part with their money upon any terms. Various causes have been assigned for this alarming state of things, all more or less plausible. Among others it is said that the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States, by the general government, has been the means of producing all the mischief and pressure under which the country is now laboring; and yet many of the friends of that institution admit, that a restoration of the deposits is not necessary to the relief of the money market. Whatever other causes may exist, it cannot be disguised that we have among us a powerful moneyed institution, which is at this time seeking, by all the means of which it is capable, to accomplish certain objects indispensable to its existence; and having an energetic, a firm and unbending antagonist to contend against, all its energies and all its powers (and they are of no ordinary character) have been put in motion, to defeat his measures and to frustrate his designs in relation to it.

It can scarcely be doubted, from the course of operations that institution has been pursuing for some time past (whether justifiable or not I will not undertake to determine), that the state is indebted in a great measure for its disappointments heretofore, and for the failure to obtain its loan on Saturday last. Whether by bringing indiscriminate ruin and distress upon an offending community by the bank is the most certain mode of obtaining a return of the public deposits, a renewal of its charter, or an extension of time to wind up its business, is a question for those who have the direction and management of its affairs, to determine. A milder and more liberal course might have been attended with more favorable results. The state of Pennsylvania may be crippled and embarrassed in her pecuniary arrangements, and paralysed for a time, in her efforts to complete her great chain of improvements, by the depressing policy of the bank, but that is no reason why we should despair of the commonwealth; our public works may languish for a season, but will not be suffered to languish long; the resources of the state are ample; her credit is unimpaired; her public stocks, although under a momentary depression at home, are highly acceptable abroad, and will before long be as eagerly sought after by the capitalist as ever; the crisis in our pecuniary affairs must soon arrive, if we have not already reached it—the clouds of distress and despondency which have been, in my humble estimation, inconsiderately and needlessly brought upon us, must soon be removed, and a happy change and a more prosperous era must inevitably await us.

In the mean time, the balance of the old loan, for which no offer was obtained on Saturday last, will be again placed in the market, and continued there until it shall have been negotiated. I would take this occasion, respectfully to recommend to the consideration of the general assembly, the propriety of passing a law, forthwith authorising a call upon the several state banks, which by their charters are bound to loan to the commonwealth five per cent. upon their capital actually paid in, for a compliance with that provision; part of this sum to be applied to the payment of debts of the commonwealth due to contractors upon the public works, and the residue thereof to be made applicable to repairs along the lines of the public improvements. The board of canal commissioners will give the necessary information in reference to the sum that ought to be made applicable to each object. An immediate suspension of the work upon the several lines of improvement, until the loan first mentioned shall have been negotiated, will be indispensable. Permit me also respectfully to urge upon the consideration of the general assembly, the propriety of authorising a loan of such a sum as will be sufficient to finish the public works now in progress at least; for although the prospect is gloomy, and the money market may continue to be embarrassed for a time, yet that gloom and that embarrassment may pass away like a mist before the morning sun, and our pecuniary affairs may take a turn so favorable, as to enable us not only to obtain a loan upon advantageous terms, but also to complete the works alluded to, before the end of the coming season. GEO: WOLF.

Harrisburgh, February 26th, 1854.

The Pennsylvania Intelligencer says—It will be seen that the governor recommends to the legislature to pass a law forthwith, obliging the state banks to loan to the commonwealth 5 per cent. on their capital stock, according to a provision in their charters when called upon. The bank of Pennsylvania is exempted, and we know not but some others are. If not, the state can raise the following sum:

5 per cent. on Philadelphia banks	$504,452
do. county banks	223,596
	728,048
State temporary loan from liable banks	225,000
	$503,048

The above sum of $503,048 can be raised from the banks, unless the loans which they have already made will exempt them. If they are exempted, then the sum of $225,000, which has already been borrowed from the county banks, must be deducted, which will reduce the sum to little more than $300,000.

NEW YORK [TAMMANY] REPORT.

It is our desire to present different views of the great subject which now agitates all the classes of the business and producing parts of the American people, and, on that principle, we give the following report.

We rather prefer, and generally do, publish such things without comment, and though there is matter for much discussion in this report, we shall only briefly notice some of the points made in it; while believing that there are parts of the argument that will not stand the test of a careful investigation, by those who have studied the principles of finance and the nature of currency. But let these pass, for the present.

1. The facts stated, as drawn from the "Weekly Register," we then thought and still believe, were strictly true. We will not abate one word of what we then said. And they only show bad management of the early direction of the bank of the U. States, as stated in the leading editorial article* in this sheet, and furnish some of the reasons why we attacked it in 1818-19. They thought that they had "the world in a sling," and seemed to act accordingly; and the many hundred local "rag-shops" assisted to heap up the misery that followed, as was then stated.

2. We deny the great influence which is attributed to the "new system of duties." It may have had some effect at New York, as the chief place of importation. But the effect was local, and, in our opinion, not important. And, what extent has this doctrine? Look at the case of the cargo of tea, as stated. This is an article which our country does not produce—in which we can have no interest, unless as revenue, or in its cheapness. But shall high duties be laid for the sole purpose of giving artificial credits to merchants, which, indeed, have done much to cause the "over-tradings" alluded to, by adding greatly to the "circulation of values," spoken of in the last "Register," as dependent on foreign labor and production for its amount—which is an unsafe one.

3. We accord, generally, with what is said about a "paper foundation," but contend that, as is stated in the article just above referred to, that a sound and wholesome paper currency, (such as we have latterly had), is better and cheaper than the use of coin.† The only thing requisite

*The editorial article was prepared before we saw the report given below, though an after-allusion is made to it.

†A Philadelphia paper has the following—

At such a crisis as this, every patriot should bring his offering to the shrine of the public good; and we rejoice to see professor Hare, losing sight for a moment of the attractions of science, to pay a just tribute to the emergency of the times. Now is the hour, when every man should bring forward his plans for the general welfare, and exert his talents to rescue our beloved country from impending ruin!

These remarks have been elicited, by a pamphlet, entitled "Proofs that credit as money, in a truly free country, is to a great extent preferable to coin. By Robert Hare, M. D. professor, &c. Abstracted from a pamphlet, published in 1810, and revised by the author, 1834.

This is not only an ingenious, but a powerful disquisition on the great advantages, and stupendous agencies of credit, employed as a medium of exchange; and a substitute for money, and we deeply regret that our limits prevent us from making copious quotations from this sound and patriotic essay. Suffice it here to observe, that it is this species of money which the tyrannical usurpation of gen. Jackson has destroyed, by his wicked warfare against the currency, the laws and the constitution.

Some idea of the principles which form the basis of professor Hare's theory, may be obtained from the following fact, that the bank of the United States, by this kind of credit, accomplish domestic exchanges to the immense amount of 240 millions of dollars—which in silver coin, would weigh twelve millions five hundred thousand pounds, a weight which never could be remitted from place to place, without an expense that would destroy all profit.

is to regulate that currency wisely. The operations of this country cannot be performed by coin—unless restricted to an absolutely ruinous extent, and changes in the value of all sorts of property that would unhinge every department of society.

From the New York Standard.

The following interesting document was to have appeared in our paper yesterday, but was delayed for the want of some statistical details. The committee explain in a note why it appears without them.

At a meeting of merchants, traders, mechanics and others, held at Tammany hall on the 19th of February, 1834, of which the honorable Stephen Allen was president, the following persons, namely:

Preserved Fish,	Walter Bowne,
Jacob Lorrillard,	John Bolton,
Morgan Lewis,	Gideon Lee,
Eldad Holmes,	James J. Roosevelt, jr.
Thomas Sniffers,	Reuben Withers,
Abraham Van Ness,	James McBride,
David Bryson,	Thaddeus Phelps,
Abraham Bloodgood,	John Leonard,
John W. Hardenbrook,	George Sharpe,
George Douglas,	Morgan L. Smith,
John Lovett,	John Lozier,
Samuel Thompson,	Stephen Allen,
John R. Marshall,	M. M. Quackenboss,
John H. Howland,	John L. Graham,
Prosper M. Wetmore, were appointed a committee, "with power to confer and advise with other constituted bodies, and to adopt measures necessary to remove existing difficulties, restore public confidence, and thereby avert predicted evils."

The committee having assembled at the city hall on the 21st instant, proceeded to the consideration of the several matters embraced in the resolutions under which they were appointed, and after some time spent thereon, it was referred to a sub-committee, consisting of Messrs. Lorrillard, Allen, Douglas, Wetmore, Withers, Fish and Roosevelt, to prepare a suitable report to be submitted to a subsequent meeting. Accordingly at an adjourned meeting of the committee, held at the same place on the 25th instant, Mr. Roosevelt, from the sub-committee presented the following report, which having been read and discussed was unanimously adopted, and ordered to be signed by the chairman and secretary and published in all the papers of the city.

Having carefully deliberated on the subject, the committee, in part discharge of their duties, would respectfully submit to their fellow citizens, the following

REPORT.

In the performance of a duty of such high importance, as that which has been confided to the committee, they have felt it incumbent on them to enter somewhat at large into the examination of the subject contemplated by their appointment. They have been desirous to demonstrate, to all such at least as do not wilfully close their eyes against the truth, the injuries which may be inflicted upon a people by hasty and imprudent legislation, and by the improper, if not dishonest administration of institutions incorporated ostensibly for the public good.

One of the most common errors in popular reasoning, and of which the artful and designing too often avail themselves, is the habit of regarding whatever goes before as necessarily the cause of whatever immediately follows. A striking illustration of this position is to be found in the opinion now so strongly entertained by some persons, but only used by others, that the present pecuniary embarrassments is the effect of the removal of the public deposits from the national bank to the banks of the states.

To any one who looks into the matter coolly and dispassionately, it must be obvious that so far at least as this city is concerned, the alleged cause of the distress has been a real cause of its partial alleviation; inasmuch as a large portion of the public revenues, under the former arrangement, were collected here to be loaned elsewhere, are now loaned here, where they are collected.

The true causes, in the opinion of this committee of the present derangement of our moneyed affairs, are to be found principally, first, in the unavoidably re action always consequent upon a great and sudden expansion of the circulating medium; and, secondly, in the extensive and fundamental alterations made by the last congress both in the amount of the commercial imports and in the mode of their collection.

In regard to the first of these causes, its discussion, at the present time, is mingled with so many of the elements of party and passion, that the more moderate portion of the community are becoming distrustful of even the soundest arguments, and the most candid statements, in any way connected with it.

The committee have deemed it proper therefore to refer to the history of another period.

In the first eighteen months of its existence, namely, during the year 1817 and part of 1818, the bank of the United States,

Another fact—the bank with 10 millions of specie can circulate credit amounting to 70 millions, or 100 millions, and save the specie from all wear, tare and expense! What a transcendent advantage of sound credit over hard money.

through its numerous branches, had issued according to the report of Mr. Cheves, notes to an enormous amount. Its discounts in this short period, although the specie part of its capital was hardly two millions, exceeded forty-three millions of dollars. Every department of business, and speculation, and living, was as a necessary consequence, stimulated to the utmost—costly mansions were erected, and adorned with the most expensive furniture, sumptuous entertainments were given, and splendid equipages were set up. And every man seemed to imagine that because credits were abundant, riches must equally abound. The prodigality and waste of some of our citizens were almost beyond belief. "We have heard," says the Weekly Register, of 1819, "that the furniture of a single parlor, possessed by, we cannot say, belonging to one individual, (who afterwards became bankrupt), cost forty thousand dollars." In this way, according to the views of those who looked only at the surface, the country enjoyed a state of "unexampled prosperity." And what without any "removal of the deposits" was the sequel of this previously brilliant drama. A rapid curtailment of discounts was commenced. The southern and western offices were directed not to issue their notes; the bank ceased to purchase and collect exchanges on the south and west; and the local institutions were called upon to pay up their balances.

These measures according to the report of its then president, Mr. Cheves, simple and obvious as they are, and some of them so strangely overlooked so long, lifted the bank in the short space of seventy days, from the extreme of prostration to a state of safety, and even, in degree, of power; and enabled it to defy all attacks.

"The bank," observes a judicious commentator on this statement, "was saved, and the people were ruined." For a time the question every morning, was, not who had broken the previous day, but, who yet stood? Suits, warrants and executions took the place of bank credits. "From all parts of the country," says the Weekly Register of April 10, 1819, "we hear of a severe pressure on men in business, a general stagnation of trade, a large reduction in the price of staple articles. Real property is rapidly depreciating in its nominal value and its rents or profits are exceedingly diminishing. Many highly respectable traders have become bankrupts, and it is agreed that many other must go—the banks are refusing their customary accommodations, confidence among merchants is shaken, and 3 per cent. a month is offered for the discount of promissory notes which a little while ago were considered as good as old gold, and whose makers have not since suffered any losses to render their notes less valuable than heretofore." Four months afterwards, August 7th, 1819, the same journal says, "it is estimated that there are 20,000 persons daily seeking work in Philadelphia; in New York 10,000 able bodied men are said to be wandering about the streets looking for it, and if we add to them the women who desire something to do, the amount cannot be less than 20,000." A committee appointed by a meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia on the 21st August, 1819, to inquire into the situation of the manufacturers of the city and its vicinity reported on the 2d of October, that of thirty mechanical and manufacturing branches of trade, which they enumerated, which gave employment to 9,188 persons in 1814, and to 9,672 in 1816, there were but 2,137 persons employed in 1819.

Here then we have a case of former days, precisely so far as the effect of moneyed credits is concerned analogous to the present. As more recently in 1831 so in 1817, the flood gates of circulation had been opened wide, a scene of unexampled prosperity as it seemed, but of delusive intoxication as it really was, ensued.

The day of contraction, however, as we have seen, soon came; the order for that purpose was issued from Philadelphia on the 20th July, 1818, and by the 1st of April following, the curtailments had amounted to the immense sum of $6,530,159. And what then became of the unexampled prosperity, about which, then, as now, so much has been said. Being a mere phantasm, it vanished, as we have seen, in an instant, and universal ruin and dismay followed in its footsteps. The community then saw, and felt, as they now feel, without seeing, and of course, without acknowledging, that paper money, like dram drinking, relieves for the moment by the deceitful sensation it creates; but gradually exhausting the natural heat, leaves the body at length in a worse state than it found it.

We have the authority of the printed statement, laid before the stockholders by their then president, for saying that during all this time (1817, '18 and '19), the bank had the advantage of immense government deposits—that at the very moment when the curtailments were ordered, "the government deposits in the bank and its branches amounted to eight millions of dollars."

If, then, the possession of the deposits did not prevent the contraction and consequent ruin of 1819, why should the removal of the deposits be the cause, under precisely similar circumstances, of the contraction and ruin of 1834.

The truth is, the removal of the deposits, unless it be as furnishing a motive for a course of measures which would not otherwise have been adopted, has, as your committee believe, had no agency whatever in producing the present pecuniary difficulties; but, on the contrary, has prevented their being much greater than they are.

The committee believe that the directors of the United States' bank, in the enormous addition in the years 1830 and '31 of twenty-eight millions to the already adequate quantity of bank facilities, (to say nothing of the very questionable design of the measure), were guilty of a great public injury, and by thus, themselves creating the necessity for the present curtailments, were the real authors of by far the larger portion of the calamities which they now seek to ascribe to the president of the United States.

The second leading cause of the present commercial pressure, will be found in the new system of duties and imports.

The influence of the late tariff acts, in bringing about the state of things so loudly complained of, would seem to be little understood, and still less appreciated.

To say that a partial reduction in some cases or total removal of duties on imports creates commercial distress, would appear, at first blush, a paradox. But let us see its operation.

A merchant under the old system imported, we will suppose, a cargo of tea, costing in China one hundred thousand dollars, the duties on which, we will also suppose, were one hundred thousand more, not payable, however, till the expiration of twelve months. The value here then of the cargo for the purpose of our argument, would be 200,000 dollars, and for that sum he would of course be able to sell it for short notes of individuals, which being discounted, would be immediately turned into so much bank paper, and added to the circulating medium. Now take off the duty, and what was before $200,000 sinks immediately to $100,000, and with it sinks the corresponding amount of circulating medium.

The reduction of duties of the New York custom house within the last — months, and the consequent reduction in the same short period of circulating credit, in this single city, has been estimated at — millions.

The evil, however, does not stop here. Of the remaining duties, about — millions have been made payable in cash, and that, too, before the possession of the goods on which they are laid, and the residue, says — millions in bonds with greatly shortened credits*.

Although this part of the system has not, like the other, effected an absolute destruction of so much of the moneyed capital of the city, yet it is apparent that it must have created a greatly increased demand for the diminished portion which the other had left.

In addition to these effects of the new tariff, which are permanent, there is another, arising merely out of the transition from the former system to the present, which has served greatly for the moment to aggravate the evil. The long bonds of the old system, and the short bonds and cash duties of the new, have fallen due simultaneously; thus concentrating, to a great degree, the burthens of two years upon the shoulders of one.

We have thus briefly adverted to the two leading sources of the present difficulties—the sudden expansion and the sudden contraction of the circulating medium—and the radical changes, now in a course of operation, in the amount and mode of collecting the national revenues.

Overtrading also has contributed its share, not overtrading in stocks and merchandise merely, but overtrading also in real estate. The whole neighbourhood of the city at an exorbitantly enhanced valuation, has been literally covered with contracts, requiring sooner or later the payment of money, and of course augmenting, in a corresponding degree, the demand for its possession.

The overtrading and speculation, however, has rather been an effect than a cause. It resulted, necessarily, like other deceptive appearances of great prosperity, from the enormous expansion of the circulating medium, and has hardly yet had time to subside.

Having thus ascertained, truly as we believe, the nature and origin of the disease under which the community is laboring, we feel the more confident in the suggestions we shall offer as the remedy.

First then, admitting as we do that the bank issues had been unduly expanded, and that a great curtailment was therefore necessary, we insist, that to make it suddenly and rapidly, or even at all, at a period, when other causes, as we have shown, are producing an unwonted demand for business facilities, is inexpedient and unjustifiable, and on the part of the bank, whose own previous acts created the necessity, is obnoxious to the severest censure.

The curtailment, indispensable as it will ultimately be, ought, and in the present state of our foreign exchange, may, with perfect safety, be postponed until the commercial operations of the city shall have had time to accommodate themselves to the new revenue code.

We feel ourselves warranted, therefore, in making an earnest appeal to our local institutions to aid for the present the commercial and business community, by such an extension of discounts as may be consistent with their own safety.

In the second place, we would urge upon congress the adoption of the warehouse system, so that importers may not be compelled to pay their duties, or procure sureties for the purpose, until they are ready to dispose of their goods.

* The committee being desirous of minute accuracy in their statements, delayed the publication of the report with the view of obtaining the materials necessary for filling up these blanks. Not having been able, as yet, to procure them, they have not deemed it necessary to delay the report longer, inasmuch as the defect can be supplied in their future communication.

Thirdly, as panic in times of pecuniary pressure, tends to dry up the sources of credit, and thus to aggravate the mischief which it dreads, we cannot too earnestly recommend to the conductors of the public press, to abstain as far as practicable, from those topics and modes of excitement in which, it is apparent, some of them, of late, have too much indulged.

And lastly, though beyond all comparison first in importance—we would recommend to all classes of our fellow citizens, to dismiss from their minds inflated and delusive ideas of wealth, which never had any other than a paper foundation, and to introduce into their business arrangements a system of economy and retrenchment and diminished credits, adapted to their real, instead of their imaginary means, and the diminished indulgence of the new revenue code. Let them look to industry, sobriety and frugality, and not to speculation and bank favors, as the only safe and permanent sources of riches and prosperity.

The committee, in these suggestions, do not wish to be understood as having ceased their labors. They know, and fully sympathise in the deep anxiety of the public mind. They perceive, and feel no disposition to disguise the truth, that a severe pecuniary pressure, the origin of which they have endeavored to trace and expose, exists; and it will be the object of their further efforts and deliberations to devise some plan, if possible, in addition to the measures already recommended, to allay excitement, restore confidence, and mitigate, if not remove, the evil complained of.

MEETING OF MERCHANTS AND TRADERS.

A very numerous meeting of the merchants and traders of the interior, now in the city of Philadelphia, was held in the spacious dining room of the United States' hotel, in Philadelphia, on Saturday evening, the 1st of March, 1834, at which James Barbour, of Kentucky, presided, and the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That a national bank is essential to the prosperity of the United States; and especially to the interior of the country, to the inhabitants of which, a sound currency, and equal exchanges are of the highest moment.

2. Resolved, That the bank of the United States has furnished a currency always as good, and often more desirable than specie; and has afforded all the benefits which could be desired for trade; and that we apprehend as the greatest of evils, a return to a state bank currency, unchecked by the existence of a national bank—our experience having shown the course of such a system, in a flood of uncurrent and irredeemable paper, and a great degree of relief and stop laws.

3. Resolved, That, as under the present organization of the bank of the United States, portions of its capital are distributed over every section of the union, and in this way the public deposits are rendered beneficial to the whole country, we cannot recognise the justice of the claim of those who demand the exclusive use of this treasure for banking purposes—for how can the importing merchants pay the duties on goods without sending them to us, and how can we pay for goods without vending them again? We contend that it is not the importer or the retailer, but the consumer, who ultimately pays the duties, and therefore we prefer a national bank, with branches, that the whole country may participate in its benefits.

4. Resolved, That the depreciation in the value of property and produce, together with the losses and difficulties now sustained in trade by the interior, are unreasonable and grievous; and such as, if not speedily prevented, will involve the western country in the greatest embarrassments.

5. Resolved, That the senators and representatives from the interior are hereby earnestly requested, as they regard the interests of their constituents, to use their efforts to effect a recharter of the bank of the United States with such modifications as the wisdom of congress may devise.

6. Resolved, That the present condition of the country is alarming in the extreme; that the consequences to the interior, where capital is less accumulated than on the seaboard, must be most severe, and that the state of the nation demands immediate and efficient measures of relief, without which we see nothing but ruin to our country.

7. Resolved, That the present sufferings of the people being entirely the result of human action, the means of relief are altogether within the reach of legislative control, and that congress is bound to consult the public good, and to take immediate steps to secure it.

PHILADELPHIA (JACKSON) MEETING.

A town meeting was held at Philadelphia, on the afternoon of the 26th February, composed of "the citizens of the city and county, friendly to general Jackson, and the general policy of the administration, but who disapprove of the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States." The meeting was large and respectable, and its proceedings orderly and decorous. Among the resolutions adopted on the occasion were the following, which require no explanation:

Resolved, That, in our opinions, the present pecuniary embarrassments of the country have been principally occasioned by the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the U. States.

Resolved, That the removal of the deposits was impolitic, because the public mind is diverted from the only questions that should occupy it, in relation to the bank, its constitutionality and public convenience, to another, and wholly different subject, calculated to enlist the passions of the people, and prevent that cool and dispassionate consideration so important a subject demands.

Resolved, That it was also impolitic, because the public has an interest in the stock of the bank to the amount of $7,000,000, which has much depreciated in value by the ineasures complained of. And, because, by the embarrassment of trade, a great diminution of the public revenue may be expected for the current year.

Resolved, That, in our opinions, the removal of the public deposits was a violation of public faith pledged to the bank; because, by the terms of the charter, the deposits were to be made with it, on certain conditions, which we believe to have been fully complied with by the bank. The last session of congress declared that the deposits might be "safely continued in the bank," and it is not pretended that any circumstance has since arisen to make them less safe in that than in any other institution.

Resolved, That, as yet, the distress and embarrassments produced by the measure, principally affect large cities and inland towns, but must soon be felt by every class of the community. The people of this state have always manifested a willingness to submit to loss and privation for the sake of principle; but we can see no wisdom or propriety in calling suffering from afar, at an unexpected moment, that their virtues and endurance and patience may be unnecessarily tried.

Resolved, That as from the time of removing the deposits until the expiration of the time allowed the bank to settle, and finally close its concerns, a period of four years and a half would elapse, that measure brought on the public suddenly and unguardedly an immediate, unmitigated, and we fear a protracted, instead of a remote and much alleviated evil, against which the community would have gradually and prudently prepared, having been apprised of the improbability of a recharter of the bank.

Resolved, That we believe that the removal of the deposits is part of a great scheme designed by some leading politicians to destroy the present bank for the purpose of erecting upon its ruins another bank to be located in New York for political and speculating purposes.

Resolved, That although we have always given to gen. Jackson our warm and zealous support, we do not think it incompatible with our regard for him, and the general principles of his administration, but the duty and privilege of freemen, to express our opinions that the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States was impolitic, unwise and unnecessary, and has deranged the currency and paralyzed the industry of the country.

A resolution was offered by B. W. Richards, esq. preceded by some explanatory remarks as follows, viz:

Resolved, That as Pennsylvanians, we hail the bright example of our ancient and honorable ally, Virginia; and that we are ready with her to rally again on the doctrines of '98, in a vigorous effort, to restrain the encroachments of executive power, to sustain the rights of the states, and the perpetuity of our union and its happy institutions.

PUBLIC MEETING AT BALTIMORE.

At a very large and highly respectable meeting of the signers of the memorial to congress, and others, favorable to the restoration of the deposits, convened in Monument square on Wednesday afternoon, the 5th of March, at 4 o'clock, to receive the report of the delegation which lately visited Washington with the memorial:

His honor, Judge Brice, president.

William Crawford, jr. William H. Conkling, Joseph K. Stapleton, Samuel D. Walker, William Hubbard, Joseph W. Patterson, vice presidents.

Hugh W. Evans and George Rogers, secretaries.

Judge Brice having opened the meeting with a short address, explanatory of its objects,

William Crawford, jr. esq. chairman of the delegation, on presenting the report, made the following observations:

Fellow citizens: As chairman of your committee I have the honor to present to this meeting a report which I now hold in my hand, and while I ask for your kind attention, permit me to say one word for this my beloved, my adopted country. We have arrived at an awful crisis, but one short year has passed from a state of unprecedented prosperity, to a state of awful distress, unexampled in the history of our country.

I beg you to turn your eyes to the root of this evil; does there exist a shadow of doubt from whence it emanates?

The constitution gives to the president veto powers, which have been carried to great extremes, in his refusal to sign a modified charter, passed last session by both houses of congress by large majorities, asserting amongst other reasons that the public money was not safe in the United States' bank! Is there a man in this country divested of party feelings who believed it—no my countrymen—a national bank properly constituted is as necessary to regulate the exchanges and currency of the country and preserve a sound and healthy circulation, as the sun is to the planetary system.

Our currency ought to be like Cæsar's wife, not only pure but beyond suspicion. We are told that in the early history of our country there was a time that tried men's souls; that time has again arrived; let us meet the crisis like men. I have too much confidence in the virtue and integrity of the people to despair of the republic. It is known to many of you that I have gone for the president through evil and through good report, and part with him now as with my first love. On this stand, where I appear for the first time, I renounce all allegiance with unholty affections. The subject is fruitful, but I cannot longer detain you. One word more, and I have done. Can you my countrymen longer cling to him who is regulated by an under current of bad advisers? Submit to this and be slaves!—Again I answer NO.

After which David Stewart, esq. being called on by the president, read the following report, which was duly accepted by the meeting.

Report of the Baltimore committee.

The delegation appointed by the meeting of the signers of the memorial for the restoration of the government deposits to the bank of the United States, held at the exchange, in the city of Baltimore, on Thursday 6th of February, 1834.

Respectfully beg leave to report:

That in compliance with the duty required of them by the meeting, they proceeded with the memorial to the city of Washington, on Monday the 10th of February, and immediately applied themselves to the accomplishment of the objects of their mission. They visited gen. Chambers, of the senate, and received from him assurances of his warm support; and the memorial being placed in his hands, it was accordingly presented to the senate, on the following Wednesday, with such a notice of it as was calculated to insure it a respectful consideration from that body. The delegation also visited Mr. J. P. Heath, one of the representatives of the city of Baltimore. They found him actively disposed to promote the wishes of the signers of the memorial, and, equally with general Chambers, kind and assiduous in his attentions to the delegation. They had also the good fortune to enlist the regards of many members of both houses of congress, who promised them a ready co-operation and support.

The delegation regret that the same favor was not extended to them by the other representative from the city of Baltimore, Mr. Isaac McKim. From the elevated position which that gentleman held as the representative, in part, of a great trading community, himself extensively engaged in commerce, and supposed to be conversant with the varied interests of the society in which he lived, the delegation were disposed to attach some importance to his efforts in behalf of the objects of the memorial. And they felt the more anxious on this score, as they had understood that Mr. McKim had given the sanction of his name to the opinion that the city of Baltimore had not suffered by the recent derangement of the commerce and industry of the nation—an opinion which they did not doubt they would effectually remove from his mind by the cogency of the evidence which they were enabled to furnish, under the sign manual of so large and respectable a meeting of his constituents. And it is due to Mr. McKim, to say, that in his interview with the delegation—whatever might have been his former opinions—he no longer doubted the reality of the distress in the city of Baltimore. The fact Mr. McKim admitted, and also acknowledged that, in his judgment, the removal of the deposits was a wrong and injurious measure. This conviction, however, he intimated could not change his course in reference to the subject of the removal. His remark was "that the act was done; and that he should therefore, on all hazards vote with the government." The reason assigned by him for this determination was, that he had some influence with the executive which he might turn to the advantage of his constituents, and that he did not wish to lose this by differing with the executive in opinion. Moreover, that he was elected to support gen. Jackson, and would do so at the risk of his life and fortune; that no friend of the administration could differ in opinion with gen. Jackson, and preserve his influence, that any attempt to advise gen. Jackson, by his friends, would be met with an expression of displeasure, and as an instance of this, Mr. Bibb had once attempted it, and was told, in consequence—"when the president wanted him he would send for him."

With these sentiments, Mr. McKim seemed particularly anxious to avoid being asked to present the memorial—intimating, that if he were to present it, it would operate to his disadvantage, and also saying, that he would be expected to present the counter memorial, which was then preparing in Baltimore.

These declarations on the part of Mr. McKim—even if the delegation had designed to request him to present the memorial in the house of representatives,—and many remarks of a similar import, sufficiently indicated to the delegation that they had nothing to hope from his services, and they, accordingly, forbore to hold further intercourse with him on the subject. Indeed, from a gentleman holding a position in society which gave him every privilege of independence, and invested also with a public station as the representative of an intelligent and patriotic community, who have always been accustomed to expect, and ready to applaud the exercise of an upright and independent judgment by their official servants—the delegation were not prepared to hear confessed such complete submission to the views, present and future, of the executive; nor did they believe, until now, that the requisitions made by the executive upon its supporters were of so exacting and rigorous a character, as seemed to be inferred by the objection of Mr. McKim—especially as they had recently seen many evidences, in both houses of congress, in which some of the most devoted followers of the party in power were not afraid to do justice to their own constituents, in the presentation of memorials that certified the public distress even to the ear of him who claims to be the government.

It was therefore with a more satisfied feeling, and with more confident assurance of efficient aid, that the delegation betook themselves to Mr. Heath, whom they now determined to solicit to lay the memorial before the house of representatives. This gentleman presented that document to the house, on Monday the 17th, and recommended it by a speech which has since appeared in the public journals, and which has won him the thanks of his fellow citizens—a speech that glows with the fervor of a manly mind, and evinces a spirit that cannot be warped from its duty either by the fear of executive denunciation, or by the hope of preserving, through blind obedience and servile submission, a share of executive favor.

During their stay at Washington, a part of the delegation took an opportunity to call on Mr. Taney, the secretary of the treasury. They were received with the courtesy natural to that gentleman; and in the course of an audience of half an hour, were enabled to hear his views on the subject of the present difficulties of the country, and the course which the executive branch of the government was likely to pursue. Mr. Taney remarked, that the bank had arrayed itself against the government, and that the government would not yield: that the impression of the government was, that the evil the people complained of, grew out of the great power of the bank: that the government was making an experiment—and, however bold, he would not undertake to advise any change from the position it had assumed against the bank: that he, (the secretary), found no difficulty in transmitting funds from one part of this extensive country to the other. In the course of this conversation one of the delegation remarked to Mr. Taney,—“Sir, if this experiment should be persisted in, and some relief—such as we do not now anticipate—should not be given, a large proportion of the trading community must fail.” The secretary replied—“If all did fail, the policy of the government would not be changed.” He proceeded to say, “that if the commercial classes had properly sustained their state institutions, the present state of things would not have existed,”—adding, “that the government would make no change until the present bank charter expired.” He also expressed his surprise “that, after what had appeared in the newspapers, and the long speeches made in congress, more failures had not taken place.”

By an arrangement procured through the attention of Mr. Heath, the delegation were enabled to visit the president. They thought it a part of their duty to make this visit, and to lay before the chief magistrate such information as might exhibit to him the actual state of affairs in this community. The time appointed for the interview was at eleven o'clock on Wednesday, and, accordingly, at that time, seven of the delegation repaired with Mr. Heath to the residence of the president, where they were severally presented to him; and after a few minutes, during which the president was engaged with other visitors, the chairman of the delegation addressed the president in the following terms:—

“General, you are, no doubt, aware that this committee has the honour to be delegated by the citizens of Baltimore, without regard to party, to come to you, sir,—the fountain head,—to make known the distressing situation of the currency of this country, and respectfully to ask, from you, relief.”

“Relief, sir?”—interrupted the president in a tone of excitement.—“Come not to me, sir!—Go to the monster! Did not Nicholas Biddle come here, sir, and on his oath, swear before a committee, that with six millions in his vaults he could meet the wants of the whole people?—And now,—when he has wrung more than ten millions from the people,—he sends you to me for relief! It is folly, sir, to talk to Andrew Jackson.—The government will not bow to the monster.”

“Sir,” said the chairman,—“the currency of the country is in a dreadful situation. The state banks have not confidence in each other—they cannot give trade the facilities required. I have recently travelled to and from the Falls of Ohio to Baltimore, and can assure you, sir, I have heard but one opinion on this subject. We are your friends—not politicians. I have always been, up to the present moment, a decided friend of your administration.”—Here, the president, in a very angry tone of voice, interrupted the chairman, by saying—

“Sir, you keep one-sided company. Andrew Jackson has fifty letters from persons of all parties, daily on this subject. Sir, he has more and better information than you sir—or any of you. Andrew Jackson published his opinions in September last. I am surprised that you thus talk to me, sir!—It is folly: you would have us like the people of Ireland, paying tribute to London, that already gets a large amount annually from this country; extorted from the laboring part of the community. The failures that are now taking place are amongst the stock-jobbers, brokers, and gamblers, and would to God, they were all swept from the land!—it would be a happy thing for the country.

“Sir,” said the chairman, “all my experience goes to show that there is no money more cheerfully paid by the merchants and people of this country than interest—bank interest—not such interest as they now pay—say two and a half per cent. to collect a right draught drawn in Baltimore on Pittsburgh.”

“Sir,” replied the president, “I had, last night, any amount of money offered me on good security, by a gentleman from New York, at six per cent. They are, sir, men who have over-traded that are now pressed. The real capitalists of the country felt the pressure last September and October, when the monster first put the screw down. Did not the monster draw from the south and west, last fall, thirty-five millions? For what, sir? To oppress the state banks in your city, Philadelphia, New York and Boston. But Andrew Jackson foresaw what they were about, and met them. Sir, I could have destroyed the monster in thirty days—but the president would not do it—not wishing to bring distress upon the people. Andrew Jackson invited a compromise with the mammoth—they would have nothing to do with me, and now, sir, I will have nothing to do with them. The restoration of the deposits is virtually a renewal of the charter, one and the same thing.”

The chairman answered, “The people, sir, have not understood the character of the president, if he is unwilling to hear their calls and demands.”

Here, in a vehement manner, the president exclaimed—“The people! Talk to Andrew Jackson, sir, about the people! The people, sir, are with me. I have undergone much peril for the liberties of this people, and Andrew Jackson yet lives to put his foot upon the head of the monster, and crush him to the dust.” “Sir,” interrupted the chairman again, “the country has tried your measures—they will not do. They will ruin two-thirds of the good trading men of the country. You have bled us—we are sick, fainting and dying, one after another.”

“The mammoth, sir,” replied the president in a violent rage, “has bled you! When I put him down, sir, the other moneyed institutions will meet all the wants of the people. It is folly in the extreme, to talk to me thus, sir. I would rather undergo the tortures of ten Spanish inquisitions than that the deposits should be restored, or the monster be rechartered.”

“Sir,” said the chairman, “as there is no general relief to be had, direct the public money now in the state bank, in our city, back to the branch of the bank of the United States, and they will at once give Baltimore relief.”

“Talk not to me, sir, about your branch!” exclaimed the president, “did they not send in nine thousand dollars of their illegal bills or checks to the bank, the first day! Let them make another move on the board, and Andrew Jackson will checkmate them. Let them turn the screw again, and I will make them feel the power of the executive, by returning on them ten millions of dollars of their illegal checks now in circulation.”

“I hope, sir,” said the chairman, “you will be able to demonstrate how the country is to pay upwards of fifty millions of discounted paper now due to the bank of the United States, with a metallic currency but little over twenty millions.”

The answer was—“Go, go to the monster!—and only the other day, sir, what did the monster do? Disputed with the executive the right to the pension fund?” At this time, the president had grown into such a rage, that no object was to be gained by attempting to prolong the discussion, and as several of the delegation had already manifested their wish and their impatience to close the conference, the members of the delegation withdrew.

The delegation have endeavored to report all that passed at this interview as accurately as possible. They have employed, as far as their memory has allowed them, the exact words, that were used on both sides, and have set nothing down which was not distinctly within the recollection of some of their party; whilst, at the same time, they believe they have omitted nothing of importance to the illustration of the opinions which the president endeavored to express, except one assurance from the president which, upon reviewing what they have detailed above, they now supply. In the course of his remarks on the state of the question before the country, the president declared, that he meant to try the present experiment with the state banks, until the period of the expiration of the charter of the bank of the United States; and that if it then should be found not to answer, some other plan would be resorted to.

This concludes all that the delegation have to report of the sentiments of the president.

Soon after this interview, the delegation returned to the city of Baltimore. They deem it unnecessary to comment upon the incidents of their visit to the city of Washington. The above narrative, faithfully detailing all that passed as nearly as it was possible for the delegation to report the same, will afford every citizen of Baltimore the means of making up his own opinion in regard to the probable duration of the present state of things.

The delegation see no reason to despond. They have confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the nation, and believe that misrule, whether it be produced by passion, or by error of judgment, cannot long go uncorrected amongst an intelligent and patriotic people.

J. W. PATTERSON,
GEO. R. GAITHER,
W. C. SHAW,
WM. GRAHAM,
JNO. BROWN HOWELL,

Thereupon John P. Kennedy, esq. rose and addressed the meeting in an eloquent and appropriate speech, and concluded by offering the following resolutions, which were duly seconded by S. D. Walker, esq.

I. Resolved, as the opinion of this meeting, that the long-avowed hostility of president Andrew Jackson against the bank of the U. States—an hostility which has pursued its object with a bitterness increased by every failure of its purpose—has engendered a temper that wholly incapacitates him for wise counsel in reference to that institution; his course, towards it, has consequently been marked by passion and private resentment, rather than by the sound precepts of public good.

That, having, in a period of profound tranquillity, when the great mass of the community neither saw the abuses alleged against the bank, nor feared its power, brought it within the circle of executive denunciation, and marshaled the forces of party to act against it: And when, nevertheless, it was still so much a favorite with the country as to obtain the vote of congress in favor of the renewal of its charter, his greater anger was kindled against it, and a system of warfare was adopted by him for its overthrow, which has been characterised by an acrimony unknown in the annals of our political history. That, in the course of this warfare, he has resorted to every expedient within his reach, to injure the credit of the bank, and impair its means of fulfilling its engagements to the nation—thereby evincing a reckless spirit of persecution, more resembling personal hatred than official zeal.

That, in the headlong fervor inspired by these feelings, goaded and exasperated by disappointment, he has forgotten the constitutional limits of his own power, and for the purpose of inflicting punishment upon his victim, he has unlawfully seized upon the public treasure deposited in the vaults of the bank, under the obligation of a contract, for which the honor of the nation was pledged, and has distributed this treasure wheresoever, in his judgment, the convenience of the public, as he interprets it, requires.

That in the performance of this act, he has, under the pretext of power, conferred upon him by the constitution, assumed and adopted a principle which involves a dangerous violation of the duties of a good magistrate; a principle that has been developed in the act of discarding a secretary, who held his office at the executive pleasure, because that secretary refused to obey the will of the president in a matter not within the president's supervision, but exclusively confided to the secretary by law; and then substituting in the place of the conscientious, but "refractory subordinate," another, better inclined to obey his behests; thus inculcating the mischievous political doctrine that the public functionaries can only expect to hold office upon the terms of unqualified obedience to his wishes.

That, in the removal of the deposits, he has disregarded the clear, plain and almost prophetic warnings as to the fatal effects of the measure, of the councillors whom the laws had placed around him, and in opposition to their wholesome advice, has rushed, with precipitate and most pernicious haste, to the accomplishment of his will.

That, in the same act, he has endeavored to bring into contempt the authority and reputation of congress, by forestalling the action of that body on the subject, and menacing the exercise of his veto upon any attempt it might make to restore the nation to its former attitude; thus, after many illusory professions of respect for the majority of the nation, actually threatening to shelter himself in the exceptionable powers conferred upon a minority.

That, in like manner, he has derogated from the importance and value of the co-ordinate branches of the government, by the tone with which he claims to consider the government as only existing in himself and the officers of his cabinet.

That, relying upon the great and overwhelming popularity which a past renown has conferred upon him, and which has begotten towards him a man-worship altogether unbecoming the citizens of a free republic, he has been emboldened to pursue his passionate and self-willed career, in the idea that the people will sustain him in whatever he chooses to propose. In this spirit he has declared that "he assumes the responsibility of the removal of the deposits"—aiming, by this declaration, to rally the people around him, and to transfer the question of an indefensible and pernicious measure into one of party and personal attachment.

That the bank of the United States having, by a strict and compulsory compliance with the policy dictated to it by the president, conclusively demonstrated the evil consequences of that policy; and from the constrained position which has been forced upon that institution, severe calamity and untold unforeseen disaster having ensued—the responsibility for these evils must fall upon the head of him who assumed the responsibility; and it is but little compatible with the moral courage, which has been claimed for the president, that he should shrink, in the moment of difficulty, from his accountability for the result, and seek to throw that accountability upon the bank. He has indeed declared that much of the disaster now experienced was not only looked for by him, but that it is also in accordance with his wishes. If, however, more distress than he expected has resulted, that fact alone should admonish him to restore the country to its original happy condition, by a magnanimous retraction of his error. The glory of never retracing a step, is both an obstinate and wicked pride, incompatible with the character of a wise and upright statesman.

That THE EXPERIMENT of creating a sound currency, through the instrumentality of associated state banks—in which experiment the president has announced his determination to persist—is one that has heretofore been fully tried and universally deplored: it is an experiment which was then proved, and will be proved again, to be fatal to the public prosperity, and if persevered in will go on redoubling and perpetuating the calamities of the nation. Political wisdom, even more than private, is best conducted by the experience of history. Not less objectionable is the experiment of banishing a mixed paper and specie circulation, and substituting for it a metallic currency. In such a community as ours, it is a visionary and impracticable expedient; and even if practicable, a mischievous scheme that would be attended with such distress as would speedily cause it to be exploded as a gross absurdity. Whichever, therefore, of these two opposite and incongruous experiments the executive designs eventually to rest upon—whether that of a state bank currency, which must be depreciated by expansion, or that of the precious metals, which must do its mischief by contraction—they are both equally unworthy of a wise government.

That the hitherto prosperous and eminently happy condition of the country rendered all such experiments not only unwise, but unjust; and the attempting them argues a disposition in the executive to trifle with the best and dearest interests of the community. The effect of all measures which tend to embarrass the currency, inasmuch as they operate upon the relations of debtor and creditor, and produce frequent changes in money values, is peculiarly afflictive to the poor and laboring classes. These disorders, by the destruction of credit and confidence that inevitably attends them, deprive labor of its proper reward, drive it from its lawful employments and make sad inroads upon the welfare of every man who subsists by his daily toil; whilst at the same time they prepare a bountiful harvest of profit for those who, free from the cares of earning their subsistence, have capital at hand to take advantage of the wants of the needy. They emphatically make "the rich richer, and poor poorer." The system, therefore, proposed by the president, is conspicuously entitled to be called "the industrious and the laboring man's curse."

II. Therefore resolved, For all these reasons, this meeting utterly reprobate the policy lately adopted by the president of the United States, in regard to the removal of the deposits; and they solemnly PROTEST against the exercise of the powers by which he has attempted to effectuate his purpose. And the members of this meeting pledge themselves to use all lawful means within their command to rescue the country from the consequence of this misrule.

III. Resolved, That this meeting have full confidence in the good sense, virtue and love of country of their fellow citizens throughout the union, and trust securely in the belief that, as the eyes of the people are opened to the true character of the measures of their public servants, the nation will effectually vindicate the integrity of the constitution in the enforcement of a strict account and due responsibility from those who administer the government.

IV. Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be accorded to ex. Chambers, of the senate, and James P. Heath, of the house of representatives, for their prompt and zealous co-operation in the views of the signers of the memorial, lately presented by them to congress; and that the grateful acknowledgments of this meeting are due to the delegation whose report has been read this day, for their able and efficient services in the discharge of the duty assigned to them.

V. Resolved, That this meeting entirely and unhesitatingly disapprove of the conduct of Isaac McKim, esq. one of the representatives from this city; and that they perceive, in his course, a subserviency to the views of the executive, altogether irreconcilable to the exercise of a manly freedom, and incompatible with the duties of the representative of an enlightened and free community—A subserviency that is calculated to surrender the independence of congress at the footstool of executive power—as degrading in the one, as it is dangerous in the other.

VI. Resolved, That a committee of thirty-one citizens be appointed by the chairman of this meeting, (of which committee the president of this meeting be chairman), to act as a committee of safety, and that they be authorised to take such measures as they may deem necessary to promote the objects of this meeting.

VII. Resolved, That these resolutions be printed in the public newspapers, and that a copy be sent by the secretary to each of the senators and representatives of the state of Maryland in congress.

The question being propounded by the president to the meeting on the adoption of the resolutions, they were carried by an almost unanimous vote, some two or three voices only dissenting.

After this, the meeting adjourned about sundown with three hearty cheers. The chairman then appointed the following gentlemen as the committee of safety of thirty-one, in pursuance to the foregoing resolutions:

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 3—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, MARCH 15, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,173.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

We have, by a moderate computation, about five hundred articles and items of information, remaining on the table, which ought to be inserted or noticed!

The occasional debates which take place in congress on the presentation of petitions, are very interesting, much more so than the regular debates usually are; but we cannot pretend to keep pace with them. We have, however, made some extracts from certain remarks of Messrs. Webster and Clay, when the memorial of the builders of Philadelphia was offered in the senate.

We publish, at full length, the report of the committee of ways and means of the house of representatives, sustaining the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury for removing the public deposits, and intend, in our next, in like manner to offer the dissent of the minority of that committee. Perhaps, these are the only long papers that we shall be required to publish on this subject for some time—but these are of a character which demands a place.

To record the various proceedings had in consequence of the derangement of the currency, &c. is impossible; and even to mention the whole, is impracticable. A large part of the people of the U. States is much agitated, and an extraordinary excitement prevails—and meetings for and against a restoration of the public deposits are yet being held in many places. The latter, we regret to observe, are called with entire reference to party politics, in many cases. Those in favor of the restoration do not make such a discrimination, and are attended by many strong friends of the executive, at different places.

The report of the Pittsburgh committee who visited Washington, and waited on the president, has been some time before us. It very closely corroborates the reports of other like committees, and, indeed, goes beyond them in some important respects. It is laid aside for preservation.

A great movement is making in Massachusetts. A petition for the restoration of the deposits had been signed by 6,700 citizens of Boston,* and it was thought the number would be much increased; and one of the largest meetings ever held at Faneuil Hall was assembled, at which many resolutions of a decided character were passed, one of which appointed a "committee of safety" of thirty. Another appointed a delegation to bear the petition to Washington, the chairman of which is Mr. Appleton, late the member of congress from that city.

But neither the excitement, nor the pressure, has yet nearly reached the extent to which both will proceed. Every day adds failure to failure, misery to misery, and reduces the means of the most solvent persons. Many men, as yet, pay their debts by exhausting their fortunes, in sacrifices to preserve their credit! A member of the legislature of Massachusetts lately said in his place that \$2,500,000 had been paid, in that state, for extra interests since the removal of the deposits. We think that this is less than the truth, in a community so eminently commercial as the state named. It is our opinion, derived from several conversations with persons who ought to know, that the daily amount of shavings in Baltimore amounts to 100,000 dollars. It is, of all sorts, more than less that sum. The average is not less than 3 per cent. a month, including brokerage, and other charges, such as in the borrowing of incurrent money, &c. and the shaving of payable post checks. The legal rate of interest is the half of one cent. on the dollar, per day—the present rate three cents: 100,000 dollars, at a  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per dollar, is 500 dollars, at 3 per cent. 3,000—difference in a month of 30 days, \$75,000, or, for four months, 300,000 dollars. But the dealings in Baltimore are not a tenth part of those of Massachusetts; and besides, Baltimore seems as yet to have suffered less from the pressure than any other place of business east or northward of this city, for our people had been taught caution in the school of adversity, and not yet forgotten their lessons. We then easily believe in the fact stated by the gentleman of Massachusetts; and yet there is no dealing people on the face of the earth better able to pay their debts, in ordinary times, than the inhabitants of that industrious and thrifty and economical commonwealth. The scarcity of money, or want of confidence in Baltimore, may be gathered from the rates of exchanges. The bills of as good banks, at home, to say the least of them as our own, have these rates—New England bank notes 3 per cent. discount, New York, (country and safety fund) 5, unless of Albany which are at 3. Pennsylvania, even if payable at, or received by the banks of Philadelphia, (but not depositable in our own banks), 1 to 2; others, (good banks) 3 @ 5 per cent. District of Columbia  $\frac{1}{2}$  to 1; Virginia 2 per cent. South Carolina 3, North Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, Alabama, and other states south and west, "no sales," or at from  $7\frac{1}{2}$  to 10 per cent. discount. But the "safety fund" banks, at New York, have a rate of discount that does not exceed  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. if the average amounts to so much—and a good many of them are really at par, in that city, at this time.

The preceding facts are not stated to injure the credit of the banks alluded to, for most of them may be as sound as other banks are; but for the simple purpose of shewing the pressure for present means, with the want of confidence, that prevails in this city.

It is with much regret, and only in a sense of duty, we must add—that on the 8th inst. we sold a note of the Susquehanna bridge and bank company, issued by the office in this city, at 10 per cent. discount, and that, on the 13th, we saw them refused by a broker at that rate, when present and getting other notes shaved. They were altogether rejected. But the failure of this institution, though distressing some individuals, cannot have any sensible effect on the Baltimore banks, generally, and their credit ought not to be in the least impaired, from the circumstances mentioned.

[It is said that the redemption of the bills of this bank will soon be commenced, and that the whole issue will be paid. We shall derive much pleasure in stating the fact to the public.]

We have an official statement, and intended to publish it this week, shewing the condition of the bank of the U. States on the 1st October, 1833, and 1st March, 1834, from which we can only give the following summary statement, at present.

	Loans.	Deposites.
October 1, 1833,	60,094,202 93	17,877,298 36
March 1, 1834,	56,157,829 86	9,947,363 54
	3,926,373 07	7,929,934 82
	Circulation.	Specie.
October 1, 1833,	19,128,189 57	10,663,441 51
March 1, 1834,	18,523,189 00	10,385,439 15
	605,000 57	278,002 36

This shows that the reduction of the loans has not been, by upwards of four millions of dollars, as great as the reduction of the deposits, and yet the bank is blamed for reducing the pressure. Money was yet plenty in October last—why then is it scarce now?

Mr. Chambers in reply to Mr. King of Geo. in the senate of the United States on the 10th inst. (the latter having said that he had heard nothing of distress among the people, or violation of the law by the president, until he heard of them on that floor, &c.) made a reference to

Mr. Duane's letters to the people now publishing, and said that on the 10th of July last, Messrs. Duane and McLane "sounded in the president's ear the warning voice of caution, and foretold, with prophetic accuracy, the results of his mischievous experiment."

Mr. Duane's letter to the president of the 10th of July, (very recently published), plainly says that the removal of the deposits would be regarded as an "extreme and arbitrary measure,"—and he also, with wonderful certainty, foretold the deranged state of the currency and pressure on the people, that would follow it. No man now could describe the existing state of things more clearly than Mr. Duane predicted them, in his formal letter to the president of July 10, 1833.

The "Globe" of Monday last asserted, as on the authority of Mr. Taney, that the statement made by the Baltimore committee of the conversation of a part of that committee with him was misrepresented; on which Messrs. William Crawford, jr. George Brown and Joseph W. Patterson (the other gentleman who waited on Mr. Taney, Mr. Gaither, being absent) addressed a note to Mr. T. asking whether the editor of the "Globe" had his (Mr. T.'s) authority for the assertion that he had made; and, receiving no answer, they published their note to Mr. T. on Thursday last, affirming, over their own proper signatures, the accuracy of their statement. And yesterday morning there was published a long private letter of Mr. Taney to a gentleman of Baltimore, dated on the 10th, in which he observes, "I cannot undertake to say whether I did or did not use the words imputed to me. But if they were used they were applied to the general ruin which the mercantile community should willingly bring on itself by creating a panic for party purposes." This is sufficient for a general view of the state of this matter. We cannot go into particulars.

It is probable that the most animated political contest which has happened in the state for many years will take place in Virginia, in the ensuing month, when the members of the legislature are to be chosen. The strongest men, on both sides, are being brought out, and each party will exert itself to the utmost. It is said that both of the great parties in the legislature will publish an address to the people. Parties in this state seem to have nearly settled down into a Jackson and Van Buren party, and an anti-Jackson and anti-Van Buren party; all minor questions being merged in the success or defeat of the individuals named.

In the city of New York, the election of charter or corporation officers, takes place on the second Tuesday of next month. These are very important, because of the disbursements and patronage of the government of that great city. The "independent republicans," are making much preparation to encounter the "Tammanies"—and, warmed with the hope of success, though the odds have been so much in favor of the latter, the former are rallying their strength and organizing themselves with all diligence. While the Evening Post charges it upon the "independent republicans" that some individuals are giving from 100 to 1,000 dollars to carry on the business of the election, the Evening Star asserts that all persons in public office have been ordered to pay up an assessment, at a rate equal to the highest that has ever been imposed upon them; which we have heretofore heard was ten per cent. on the whole amount of a year's salary or fees!

At a meeting in favor of the bank, held in Vermont, Mr. Meech, late "Jackson" candidate for governor, presided—and at another held at Princeton, N. J. John C. Schenck, esq. recently one of the most distinguished friends of the administration in that state, took a leading part. Such things are of frequent occurrence—and so they should be. It is an act of great violence to force a consideration of the state of the currency, into the transient and turbulent ups and downs of political parties.

Hundreds of new meetings of the people have just been held or called to be held, in different parts of the union, but most numerously in New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Virginia, on account of the distressed state of the country. On the 20th inst. there is to be a grand meeting of the people of the city and county of Philadelphia, at which it is recommended that the different trades shall appear with their banners and badges—and that the store-keepers close their stores, for the afternoon.

Gov. Wolf's very sudden change of opinion, causes much speculation in Pennsylvania. The Pittsburgh committee, who called at Harrisburgh, on their way to Washington, a short time ago, reported that his former good opinion of the bank was unchanged.

On the 8th inst. Baltimore bank notes were at  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. discount at Pittsburgh—and on the same day Pittsburgh bank notes were at 3 per cent. discount at Baltimore—both being equally good, at home! The time between these cities is less than 3 days, or, going and returning, with one day to make the exchange, say seven days, or exactly a half per cent. per day on money between the two places—or 182 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum! This is a pretty state of things—but it prevails in all parts of the union. There was, and, perhaps, yet is, a tariff of exchange even between Albany and Troy, five miles apart, the banks in each being equally good! But the condition of things within the state of New-York seems to be generally improved.

We observe that the somniferous paper read by the honorable* and "honest" Isaac Hill in the senate chamber, (but not to the senate, for friends and enemies "cleared out" to avoid the punishment of hearing it), has been published in the "Globe" as Mr. Hill's speech, into which the writer or reader has introduced some extracts from the REGISTER of 1820, in relation to the bank. "Hezekiah Niles" sees not one word in the honorable and "honest" gentleman's quotation that he will retract—for every word had respect to then existing facts, and what seemed to be the manifest intentions of those who then had charge over the affairs of the bank. We just take the liberty, however, to say, that in his comments on the extract presented, the honorable and "honest" gentleman says some things that are not true. But "that's nothen," as major Downing would say—and "some things are so despicable," as Mr. Senator Clayton said, that we must pass them over.

As the honorable and "honest" senator is pleased with "extracts," we shall give one or two out of many in our possession, which we find marked as from the N. Hampshire Patriot of 1824—and we guess that they are "genuwine"—for they have been repeatedly published as such, and we never heard their verity denied:

"General Jackson, in the state of Pennsylvania, now finds those only opposed to his election, who defended his honest but indiscreet zeal, when he trampled on the civil authority, by arresting the United States' judge, and other citizens at New Orleans, and when he seized and executed Arbuthnot and Ambrister, in Florida; he has there changed friends, combining what with the honest portion of the community who gaze with admiration at his military prowess, what with a portion of men ambitious for place and preferment, and what with THAT PARTY who care not who they support, so that they make mischief, AND BREAK UP THE REPUBLICAN PARTY, a host in that state, which will probably outnumber the friends of any other presidential candidate."

"We love our civil rights and privileges too well to place Jackson in the presidential chair. We do not like to be hanged without 'rhyme or reason.'"

Now, will the honorable and "honest" senator, who has "waxed fat" on mail contracts and heavy feedings at the public crib, stand by what he said, as we are ready to stand by what we said? The administration of the bank when placed in new hands, relieved it from those causes for censure which we thought it well deserved—but how is it with the facts urged by Mr. Hill against general Jackson? Have Arbuthnot and Ambrister, for example, been restored to life, as the bank, under its new direction, was reformed?—and proceeded to accomplish the purposes for which it was designed, in the establishment of a sound and wholesome currency? We prefer not these things against the president—but refer to them for the sole benefit of the honorable and “honest” senator—who said more against gen. Jackson, personally, in the little paragraphs quoted, than is contained in all the forty-five capacious volumes of the REGISTER, as written by us—there is more pure malignity and caueus-slavish abuse in it, than we ever extended towards an individual, (for we seldom indulge at all in personalities, unless in the lex talionis); but Isaac Hill cannot complain that we have “returned his compliment”—extract against extract.

*We have italicized the word "honorable" because that the "New Hampshire Patriot" of the 3d May, 1830, for instance, had his name 138 times, in different essays, and often with the prefixure; and in two columns of that paper of the 10th of the same month, his name was used 42 times, several of which were in flaming capitals, and, perhaps, all manufactured by his own honorable and "honest" self.

On Monday next it is probable that Mr. Webster will bring out his project concerning the bank—preferring a renewal of its charter, with certain modifications. A general discussion in the house on the report of the committee of ways and means (inserted in the present sheet), will also soon be going on.

A gentleman of South Carolina, remitting his payment for the REGISTER, says, “I am the only union man in this village, and have often been insulted by being told that it was because I read old Niles’ paper. I fear, and am sorry to say that more has been done [by “the government”], in the last four months to promote nullification, than ever before was done for it.”

The National Intelligencer of the 12th says—The president yesterday re-nominated to the senate the three persons lately rejected as government directors of the bank of the United States. The reasons which he assigned to the senate for this unusual step, if any, were communicated in confidence, and are of course unknown to us.

Mr. Leigh the new senator from Virginia, made his first speech on the 12th inst. It was a brief one—of some 30 or 40 minutes; but is said to have fully sustained the high reputation which he has long borne at home, and had preceded him to the senate. What a constellation of talent is now collected in that body, though it contains some very small men!

ITEMS.

The frigates United States and Constellation suffered much damage in a severe gale, on the 14th Dec. and were in great danger of being lost, but they got into Milo, where they were repaired, and had since arrived at Malta on their way to Mahon.

It does not appear that the difficulties in Alabama are yet adjusted. It is said that the removal of the white settlers have been commenced by the U. S. officers.

At last, a representative has been chosen in the 9th congressional district of Massachusetts. Mr. Jackson, anti-masonic, has succeeded by a small majority of all the votes; and, as on all leading questions that has been or are before congress, Mr. J. declared that he coincided in opinion with gen. Dearborn, the late representative—many of the friends of the latter, to end the contest at a crisis so important, cast their votes for Mr. Jackson. There are yet three vacant seats in congress—that which is contested by Messrs. Letcher and Moore, the one made vacant by the decease of Mr. Bouldin, of Va. and the other by the resignation of Mr. Bullard, appointed a judge of the supreme court of Louisiana.

We much regret to hear that the cholera has reappeared in some parts of the west, bordering on the Mississippi.

There have recently been several great fires at New York. This city has very many buildings fair to the eye, like “painted sepulchres,” but made up of the most combustible materials within, as well as many frame edifices, built in a hurry, to accommodate the rush of population—and to have a dozen or two of these burnt down at a time, is no extraordinary affair, in the want of water to extinguish the flames, let the valuable firemen do all that they can. About 50 families, of the poorest classes, were dislodged by one fire on the evening of the 10th instant—chiefly natives of Ireland.

The Corkonians and United Irishmen, laborers on the canal, had a terrible fight at New Orleans, in which several were killed and wounded, when the riot was suppressed and many of the rioters arrested to answer for it. We wish that these people would leave their abominable local hatreds of each other, as well as their much cherished desire of appealing to force, behind them.

LOWER CANADA. The discussions between the colonial legislature and the governor-general Aylmer and the royal government at home, have risen to a great height. Early in last month, a set of resolutions, nearly one hundred in number, was moved, forming a sort of declaration of rights of the people of Canada, and concluding by proposing to expunge from the journals of the house the despatches of Mr. Stanley, the British colonial secretary, and the impeaching of the governor-general. They were brought up for discussion on the 15th, ult. and debated all that day and the next. All substitutes were rejected by overwhelming majorities, and late in the night of the 16th, fifty-five of the resolutions were agreed to without opposition. The whole probably passed as reported. The resolutions adopted contain a call for conventions of the people. The results of this bold attitude which the house have assumed, must be important to the future relations of the colony with Great Britain.

In one of the resolutions it is significantly remarked, that the population of the United States will, in twenty years, be equal to that of Great Britain, and that of the British North American colonies will, in the same period, be equal to that of the United States when they declared their independence.

Upper Canada is also in a state of high excitement.

Two or three great nests of counterfeiters of bank notes have been broken up. The extent to which this business was proceeding, is truly astonishing. The increase of banking institutions will give it a new impetus.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 28th and Paris to the 31st January.

FRANCE.

A duel was fought on the 29th January, between gen. Bugeaud and M. Dulong, two members of the chamber of deputies. The seconds of gen. B. were gen. Kuminny and col. Lamy, and those of the latter, M. George Lalayette and col. Bacot. The duel resulted in the death of M. Dulong. There had been several other duels between students of medicine, one of which also proved mortal to one of the parties.

The French journals are equally severe with the English, in regard to the conduct of the president of the U. States on the subject of the currency of the country. They say that no constitutional, or absolute monarch would have dared to commit such an outrage upon the laws.

SPAIN.

Martinez de la Roza had been nominated to succeed M. Zea, the prime minister. This nomination gives universal satisfaction and the best anticipations are indulged in for the success of the monarchy under his guidance. The national guard had been reorganized, the government reserving to itself the choice of the officers. The entire military force of the country is to consist of 120,000 men.

The most important feature in the present aspect of Spain, is the contemplated re-organization of its government. The cortes, it is understood, will not be convoked; but instead of a representative government established, consisting of two branches. Two-thirds of the upper branch is to consist of the nobility, and one-third of the higher orders of the clergy. The lower branch is to consist of 250 members, elected from the cities, towns and villages.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

March 7. Mr. McKean presented the petition of 2,500 or 3,000 citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying for a return of the public deposits to the bank of the U. States. On which Mr. Webster rose and expressed much satisfaction at this movement of the agriculturalists of that rich and populous county. This memorial came from the agricultural interest, and he said—it was the “real lion of the country.”

Mr. Ewing offered a series of searching resolutions as to the condition of the post office department.

Mr. McKean presented the petition of 613 citizens of Marietta, Pa. praying for a restoration of the deposits.

Mr. Clayton offered the following resolutions, which lie one day on the table:

Resolved, That the postmaster general be directed to inform the senate, how many, and what postmasters, clerks and other agents in his department, have been by him removed from office, since the 3d day of March, 1829; also, to state the names of those who have been appointed in lieu of the postmasters so removed, their places of residence, and to furnish the original letters, or copies thereof, addressed to him as postmaster general, communicating the political character of those removed, or those who have been appointed to supply their places.

Resolved, That the postmaster general be directed to communicate to the senate a copy of any and every circular, or order, to his deputies, directing them, or any of them, to transmit to his department the names of the newspapers taken at their respective offices, or the names of the subscribers to such newspapers; and generally to state whether his department receives quarterly returns of newspapers taken in the United States, and the names and places of residence of their subscribers.

Mr. Webster rose, and addressed the senate as follows:

I rise, sir, to perform a pleasing duty. It is to lay before the senate the proceedings of a meeting of the building mechanics of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened for the purpose of expressing their opinions on the present state of the country, on the 24th of February. This meeting consisted of three thousand persons, and was composed of carpenters, masons, brick-makers, bricklayers, painters and glaziers, lime burners, plasterers, lumber merchants and others, whose occupations are connected with the building of houses. I am proud, sir, that so respectable, so important, and so substantial a class of mechanics, have entrusted me with the presentation of their opinions and feelings, respecting the present distress of the country, to the senate. I am happy if they have seen, in the course pursued by me here, a policy favorable to the protection of their interest, and the prosperity of their families. These intelligent and sensible men, these highly useful citizens, have witnessed the effect of the late measures of government upon their own concerns; and the resolutions which I have now to present, fully express their convictions on the subject. They propose not to reason, but to testify; they speak what they do know.

Mr. President, the members of this meeting have not transmitted their proceedings by mail, nor have they rested satisfied with merely causing them, in any way, to reach the two houses of congress, and to be read and disposed of in the ordinary manner. They have forwarded them by a committee of thirty persons of their own body, and those thirty persons are now within the walls of the senate. I wish, sir, that honorable senators would converse with these gentlemen; I wish they would use the opportunity of satisfying themselves of their intelligence, their fairness, their freedom from the influence of all oblique or improper motives, and the unquestionable truth of the existence of that distress, which they come here to represent. Such a communication would convince honorable members, that there is no pretence, no fiction, no exaggeration, in the whole matter; but that all their words are words of truth and soberness.

[Mr. Webster then urged the necessity of action to relieve the distresses of the people—and said]—

Sir, listen to the statement; hear the facts. The committee state, sir, that eight thousand persons are ordinarily employed in building houses, in the city and county of Philadelphia; a number which, with their families, would make quite a considerable town. They further state, that the average number of houses, which this body of mechanics has built, for the last five years, is twelve hundred houses a year. The average cost of these houses is computed at two thousand dollars each. Here is a business, then, sir, of two millions four hundred thousand dollars a year. Such has been the average of the last five years. And what is it now? Sir, the committee state that the business has fallen off seventy-five per cent. at least; that is to say, that, at most, only one-quarter part of their usual employment now remains. This is the season of the year in which building contracts are made. It is now known what is to be the business of the year. Many of these persons, who have heretofore had, every year, contracts for several houses on hand, have this year no contract at all. They have been obliged to dismiss their hands, to turn them over to any scraps of employment they could find, or to leave them in idleness, for want of any employment.

[Mr. W. then went into some detail] to shew the former operations of the builders of houses, which were almost totally destroyed by the "experiment" now going on; and then said]—

These, sir, are plain matters of fact, and they are manifestly the results of the measures of government; and have not these mechanics, then, a right to complain. Ought they to hold their tongues, and starve, in order to enable the secretary to try his experiment? Are they to be the willing victims of such fantastical and arrogant schemes? No, sir, that is not their notion of patriotism and duty. They think the government was established for them, and the rest of the people of the United States, for their protection, security and happiness. They think it not a subject for the practice of every raw conceit, every presumptuous theory, every impulse of arrogant and self-sufficient love of change. Sir, they are not the dupes of the secretary's experiment; and, if they can help it, they do not intend to be its victims. They know full well in what purpose these measures originated, which have since obtained the name of the "experiment." They think they have a right to demand of congress not to sanction such purposes, to their ruin. As American citizens, they demand the shelter of the laws; as tax-payers to government, they demand the protection of government; as industrious citizens, they demand security for their industry; and they protest, solemnly protest—in their name, sir, in their behalf, in their presence, I now enter their protest—against these unnecessary and wanton measures, which destroy their property, break up their employments, and reduce them and their children to want and beggary!

Mr. Webster concluded as follows:

Sir, the agitations of the country are not to be hushed by authority. Opinions, from however high quarters, will not quiet them. The condition of the nation calls for action, for measures, for the prompt interposition of congress; and until congress shall act, be it sooner or be it later, there will be no content, no repose, no restoration of former prosperity. Whoever supposes, sir, that he, or that any man, can quiet the discontents, or hush the complaints of the people, by merely saying, "peace, be still!" mistakes, shockingly mistakes, the real condition of things. It is an agitation of interests, not of opinions; a severe pressure on men's property and their means of living, not a barren contest about abstract sentiments. Even, sir, the voice of party, often so sovereign, is not of power to subdue discontents and stifle complaints. The people, sir, feel great interests to be at stake, and they are raising themselves to protect those interests. They consider the question to be, whether the government is made for the people, or the people for the government. They hold the former of these two propositions, and they mean to prove it.

Mr. President, this measure of the secretary has produced a degree of evil that cannot be borne. Talk about it as we will, it cannot be borne. A tottering state of credit, cramped means, loss of property and loss of employment, doubts of the condition of others, doubts of their own condition, constant fear of failures and new explosions, an awful dread of the future—sir, when a consciousness of all these things accompanies a man, at his breakfast, his dinner and his supper; when it attends him through his hours, both of labor and rest; when it even disturbs and haunts his dreams, and when he feels, too, that that which is thus quailing upon him is the pure result of foolish and rash measures of government, depend upon it he will not bear it. A deranged and disordered currency, the ruin of occupation, distress for present means, the prostration of credit and confidence, and all this without hope of improvement or change—a state of things which no intelligent people can long endure.

Mr. Clay rose and said: I have been requested by the committee from Philadelphia, charged with presenting the memorial to congress, to say a few words on the subject; and although after the ample and very satisfactory exposition which it has received from the senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster), further observations are entirely unnecessary, I cannot deny myself the gratification of complying with a request, proceeding from a source so highly worthy of respectful consideration.

[Mr. C. then proceeded to show the effect of the measures of the government on the state of the country, and offered an opinion that the value of property in the United States had been reduced by them, in the great amount of four hundred millions of dollars,—a sum which would be less than half the real amount, were the property of the people placed in the market, and to be sold, as we believe. See.]

Mr. Clay next asked—

And what is the remedy to be provided for this most unhappy state of the country? I have conversed freely with the members of the Philadelphia committee. They are real, practical, working men; intelligent, well acquainted with the general condition, and with the sufferings of their particular community. No one, who has not a heart of steel, can listen to them, without feeling the deepest sympathy for the privations and sufferings unnecessarily brought upon the laboring classes. Both the committee and the memorial declare that their reliance is, exclusively, on the legislative branch of the government. Mr. President, it is with subdued feelings, of the profoundest humility and mortification, that I am compelled to say that, constituted as congress now is, no relief will be afforded by it, unless its members shall be enlightened and instructed by the people themselves. A large portion of the body, whatever may be their private judgment upon the course of the president, believe it to be their duty, at all events safest for themselves, to sustain him without regard to the consequences of his measures upon the public interests. And nothing but clear, decided and unequivocal demonstrations of the popular disapprobation of what has been done, will divert them from their present purpose.

But there is another quarter which possesses sufficient power and influence to relieve the public distresses. In twenty-four hours, the executive branch could adopt a measure which would afford an efficacious and substantial remedy, and re-establish confidence. And those who, in this chamber, support the administration, could not render a better service than to repair to the executive mansion, and, placing before the chief magistrate the naked and undignified truth, prevail upon him to retrace his steps and abandon his fatal experiment. No one, sir, can perform that duty with more propriety than yourself. [The vice president] You can, if you will, induce him to change his course. To you, then, sir, in no unfriendly spirit, but with feelings softened and subdued by the deep distress which pervades every class of our countrymen, I make the appeal. By your official and personal relations with the president, you maintain with him an intercourse which I neither enjoy nor covet. Go to him and tell him, without exaggeration, but in the language of truth and sincerity, the actual condition of his bleeding country. Tell him it is nearly ruined and undone by the measures which he has been induced to go in operation. Tell him that his experiment is operating on the nation like the philosopher's experiment upon a convulsed animal, in an exhausted receiver, and that it must expire, in agony, if he does not pause, give it free and sound circulation, and suffer the energies of the people to be revived and restored. Tell him that, in a single city, more than sixty bankruptcies, involving a loss of upwards of fifteen millions of dollars, have occurred. Tell him of the alarming decline in the value of all property, of the depreciation of all the products of industry, of the stagnation in every branch of business, and of the close of numerous manufacturing establishments, which, a few short months ago, were in active and flourishing operation. Depict to him, if you can find language to portray, the heart-rending wretchedness of thousands of the working classes cast out of employment. Tell him of the tears of helpless widows, no longer able to earn their bread, and of unclad and unfed orphans who have been driven, by his policy, out of the busy pursuits in which but yesterday they were gaining an honest livelihood. Say to him that if firmness be honorable, when guided by truth and justice, it is intimately allied to another quality, of the most pernicious tendency, in the prosecution of an erroneous system. Tell him how much more true glory is to be won by retracing false steps, than by blindly rushing on until his country is overwhelmed in bankruptcy and ruin. Tell him of the ardent attachment, the unbounded devotion, the enthusiastic gratitude, towards him, so often signally manifested by the American people, and that they deserve at his hands better treatment. Tell him to guard himself against the possibility of an odious comparison with that worst of the Roman emperors, who, contemplating with indifference the conflagration of the mistress of the world, regaled himself during the terrific scene in the throng of his dancing courtiers. If you desire to secure for yourself the reputation of a public benefactor, describe to him truly the universal distress already produced, and the certain ruin which must ensue from perseverance in his measures. Tell him that he has been abused, deceived, betrayed, by the wicked counsels of unprincipled men around him. Inform him that all efforts in congress to alleviate or terminate the public distress are paralyzed and likely to prove totally unavailing, from his influence upon a large portion of the members, who are unwilling to withdraw their support, or to take a course repugnant to his wishes and feelings. Tell him that, in his ho-som alone, under actual circumstances, does the power abide to relieve the country; and that, unless he opens it to conviction, and corrects the errors of his administration, no human imagination can conceive, and no human tongue can express, the awful consequences which may follow. Intreat him to pause, and to reflect that there is a point beyond which human endurance cannot go; and let him not drive this brave, generous, and patriotic people to madness and despair.

Mr. President, unaffectedly indisposed, and unwilling as I am to trespass upon the senate, I could not decline complying with a request addressed to me by a respectable portion of my fellow citizens, part of the bone and sinew of the American public. Like the senator from Massachusetts, who has been entrusted with the presentation of their petition to the senate, I found them plain, judicious, sensible men, clearly understanding their own interests, and, with the rest of the community, writhing under the operation of the measures of the executive. If I have deviated from the beaten track of debate in the senate, my apology must be found in the anxious solicitude which I feel for the condition of the country. And, sir, if I shall have been successful in touching your heart, and exciting in you a glow of patriotism, I shall be most happy. You can prevail upon the president to abandon his ruinous course; and, if you will exert the influence which you possess, you will command the thanks and the plaudits of a grateful people.

The memorial was then referred.

After other business, Mr. Clay rose to present the four resolutions that follow, and pronounced some strong observations in support of them—which cannot be made room for:

1. Resolved, That the constitution of the United States does not vest in the president power to remove at his pleasure officers under the government of the United States, whose offices have been established by law.

2. Resolved, That, in all cases of officers created by law, the tenure of holding which is not prescribed by the constitution, congress is authorised by the constitution to prescribe the tenure, terms, and conditions on which they are to be holden.

3. Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that in all instances of appointment to office by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, other than diplomatic appointments, the power of removal shall be exercised only in concurrence with the senate; and, when the senate is not in session, that the president may suspend any such officer, communicating his reasons for the suspension to the senate at its first succeeding session; and, if the senate concur with him, the officer shall be removed; but, if it do not concur with him, the officer shall be restored to office.

4. Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, of all deputy postmasters, whose annual emoluments exceed a prescribed amount.

March 10. Mr. Silbee presented the resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts in relation to the currency and removal of the deposits; and, at considerable length and with much ability, set forth the deranged state of business in consequence of the proceedings of the executive of the United States. He said that commission merchants declined not only the usual guaranty on sales, but refused to make advances. He mentioned the case of a cargo from the south worth 3,000 dollars, subject to a freight of 500, in cash, which was surrendered to the ship owner that he might make his freight out of it. He said that he daily heard of failures, and that 70 had taken place in one late flourishing town in Massachusetts. He spoke of the manufacturers and other working people discharged. He said that six months ago, the legal rate of interest for large sums of money could not be obtained, though now worth from 3 even to 5 per cent. per month! [We wish that we could make room for this speech of a practical man.]

Mr. Webster followed, and observing that his colleague had left him little to say concerning the resolutions, &c. took the opportunity to speak of the necessity of rechartering the bank, for which the committee of finance had agreed upon a plan to be laid before the senate on Monday next; and he gave it out as his opinion that congress ought not to adjourn until some measures were adopted to relieve the people.

His idea was that the present bank, with some few modifications of its charter, should be continued for a short time, and so as to leave the question open as to the establishment of a new one; or to renew the charter for a number of years with other modifications, among them to prevent the issue of notes of a less denomination than of 20 dollars, &c. But as we shall have the plan next week, the want of room will excuse us from giving a report of his speech now.

Mr. Forsyth followed and expressed his surprize at the idea thrown out, that congress would sit until the distresses of the country were relieved, by the gentleman's plan for rechartering the bank. Would the senate compel the other house and the executive to accede to his proposition? He expressed an opinion favorable to a bank, if the rate of interest was fixed at 5 per cent. and the power of the state governments over it were duly secured, and the power of the general government over it was made greater, &c.

Mr. Webster replied at considerable length, and the debate was continued, by Messrs. King, of Geo. Chambers, Forsyth and Webster.

Mr. Bell had leave of absence for three weeks. Adjourned.

March 11. Mr. Prenlist presented a memorial from Burlington, Vt. praying for a restoration of the deposits, and spoke at considerable length on the subject at large; he was followed by Mr. Swift, who described the derangement of business in Vermont, and the distress that prevailed, aggravated, as it is, by the failure of the grain crops last season.

Mr. Clay took an opportunity to correct certain things as to the petition from Troy for a restoration of the deposits. He referred to Mr. Wright, who, had said, on the information of a member of the other house that only 100 of the signers were friendly to the administration. Mr. Clay read a letter dated the 6th instant, saying that by a critical examination, recently made, there were at least 400 signers who are, or have been administration men, &c. Mr. Wright explained—he had not made the remark on his own knowledge, and spoke warmly as to the integrity of his informant, but supposed that some mistake may have been made, &c.

Mr. Fredinshayen presented the petition of 454 citizens of Paterson, N. J. praying for a return of the deposits, on which occasion he offered a brief statistical state of the business of that town, and said that 5,130 spindles, which had annually consumed 2,200,000 lbs. of cotton, were stopped, owing to the pressure of the times. Mr. F. also presented a memorial from Paterson and its vicinity, signed by 600 persons, approving of the removal of the deposits—and a long debate followed.

Other business attended to will appear in its course.

March 12. Mr. McKeen presented three memorials, one from a meeting of tin-plate workers, sheet iron workers and copper-smiths, of the city of Philadelphia, one from the citizens of the borough of Southwark, Pennsylvania, and the other from a meeting of citizens of Carlisle, in the same state, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments of the country, which the memorialists ascribe to the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States, and severally praying for their restoration. The memorialists, Mr. McK. said, so far as he was able to ascertain, were high respectable, and consisted of persons without distinction of party. He asked that the memorials be read, referred to the committee on finance and printed; which was done accordingly.

Mr. Leigh presented the memorial of sundry merchants, mechanics, professional men and others, of the city of Petersburg, in the state of Virginia, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments of the country; which the memorialists ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States; and praying congress to take such measures as will afford them redress.

Mr. Leigh accompanied the presentation of the memorial with some appropriate remarks; after which, he asked that the memorial be read, referred to the committee on finance and printed.

The memorial having been read, a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Forsyth, Leigh and King, of Georgia, took part; when the question was taken, and the memorial referred, nem. con. to the committee on finance, and ordered to be printed.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the special order, being the resolutions of Mr. Clay, and the report of the secretary of the treasury on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States; when

Mr. Talmadge, who was entitled to the floor, commenced his remarks, and addressed the senate until three o'clock; and then the senate adjourned.

March 13. Mr. Webster presented a memorial numerously signed by the people of Brooklyn, New York, and also the proceedings of a public meeting of the citizens, asking for a restoration of the public deposits. Mr. W. read one of the resolutions of the meeting, containing some strong remarks in support of the constitutionality of a bank of the United States.

Mr. Sprague presented two memorials—one from Eastport and the other from Lubec, Maine, praying for a restoration of the deposits, &c.

Mr. Tyler presented two memorials, from the towns of Fal-mouth and Fredericksburgh, and the proceedings of a meeting held in Accomack, Virginia, with reference to the public distress, and praying for a restoration of the deposits. A debate ensued, in which Messrs. Tyler, Brown, Leigh, Forsyth, Webster, Preston and Ewing took part.

The other business attended to will sufficiently appear in its progress. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 7. The whole of this day was given up to the consideration of private or local business, and a large number of bills for the relief of individuals were ordered to be engrossed or passed.

Adjourned until Monday.

Monday, March 10. This being the weekly day for presenting memorials, &c. and the consideration of the resolutions of the Virginia legislature, presented last Monday, being the morning business first in order—

Mr. Gholon, who had the floor, was about to address the house, but yielded his right for the present, at the request of

Mr. J. Q. Adams, who asked leave to present certain resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts on the subject of the removal of the deposits, stating, that, if the leave were granted, he should, in accordance with the rule or understanding in such cases, abstain from any remarks on the subject of the memorial, and take some other opportunity of expressing his sentiments on it.

Mr. Gholon, (who was entitled to the floor on the Virginia memorial, lying over from last Monday) signified his assent to Mr. A.'s request; but, objection being made by some other member, the leave was not granted.

Mr. Gholon took the floor, and addressed the house, in extenso, in support of the resolutions of his state, and particularly in reply to Mr. Patton's argument on the other side.

Mr. Moore, of Va. followed, in an animated speech, on the same side.

Mr. Pinckney, of S. C. next addressed the house, also in support of the resolutions, and continued to speak until half past three, when he yielded to a motion for adjournment.

All three of these gentlemen went occasionally into very severe animadversion upon the course of the administration in reference to the deposits.

The house then adjourned.

Tuesday, March 11. Many bills of a private nature were reported, and a great deal of local or private business attended to.

Mr. Adams, of Mass. asked the consent of the house to present certain resolutions of the legislature of his state. Objection being made, he moved to suspend the rules for this purpose.

Mr. R. M. Johnson suggested that, if the motion were made general, so as to admit of the presentation of other resolutions and memorials, it would be more likely to be generally voted for.

Mr. Adams consented so to modify his motion.

The question being twice put, and no quorum voting, he withdrew his assent to modify, and renewed the motion in its original form.

The question being once more put, it was negatived—ayes 70, noes 56, (not two-thirds.)

Mr. Archer offered, by leave, the following resolution, which was agreed to.

Resolved, That the committee on foreign affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing the library and the official private manuscript papers of gen. Washington, to be deposited in the department of state.

The army appropriation bill was read by sections. In the course of the proceedings—

Mr. Everett moved an additional clause to the bill, including $1,825 for surgeon Beaumont, in performing a series of experiments on the stomach of a wounded soldier, in illustration of the process of digestion. The appropriation had been recommended by the surgeon general. Allowances were made to officers of the line for extra services, but this could not be done to surgeons unless by express provision.

Some objection being made by Mr. Polk and Mr. Jones, of Geo. Mr. Everett said, that this soldier had been placed under the care of surgeon Beaumont; and he had expended upwards of $5,000 out of his own pocket, in the process of measures by which his life had been saved and prolonged. He might, no doubt, have left the man to die, but because he acted, first from humanity, and then from the love of science, and had thereby succeeded, not only in saving his patient, but in presenting the most curious and valuable results in aid of the great objects of the surgical department of the army, was he to be refused such a pittance as this, when it was recommended by the head of the surgical staff?

Mr. McDuffie supported Mr. E.'s proposition. Mr. Clifton expressed his hearty concurrence in these views. The house voted thousands upon thousands to reward persons who had killed men; but in this case, not only had the life of a man been preserved, but facts discovered and plans suggested, which might lead to the saving of millions of human lives. Mr. Jones still objected, and said, this surgeon was paid by the month, and had fixed rations. Was not all he had done included in the duty for which he was paid?

Mr. Crockett rose. Gentlemen objected to paying for experiments; but in these days, when we were trying experiments on the currency, why not try experiments on the sciences? Though, for his part, he thought it was hardly necessary to make any appropriations at all, for this, or any thing else. He had been almost ready to go against all appropriation bills, till he knew where the money was. If one man in the country could take all the money, what was the use of passing any bill about it? It was a monkey—it was childish, to sit there and appropriate at all. If one man could take the money, and put it where the law had not placed it, how did the house know where it was? How could they tell but it might be in his royal majesty's pocket, or in the pocket of that imp of famine, his 4th auditor. The money was not where the law put it, and who knew where it was? He would vote for one experiment, but he should for certain vote against the other.

The question was now put, and the amendment proposed by Mr. Everett agreed to—ayes 80, noes 53.

Other amendments being made, the committee rose, reported progress and had leave to sit again. Adjourned.

Wednesday, March 12. This being the day to which the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, on the deposit question, and also of the report from the minority of that committee, had been deferred, and this subject being, therefore, the order of the day—

Mr. Polk rose and observed, that, although the two reports were printed, and on the tables of members, yet the appendix to the committee's report, containing certain documents referred to in it, were not yet on their tables; and, as he considered these as essential to a due consideration of the report itself, he moved that the subject be further postponed until Tuesday next.

On this a very long debate took place—many distinguished gentlemen taking part in it. The differences of opinion were chiefly as to the order of proceeding, and the disposition of many bills already before the house. Mr. Polk's motion to postpone was adopted.

Mr. Adams, of Mass. once more asked permission of the house to present certain resolutions of the legislature of that state.—Objections being made, he moved to suspend the rule; but the house refused to do so.

Mr. Polk then made a similar request, for leave to introduce a resolution referring to the subject which had been postponed.

Mr. Adams objecting,

Mr. Polk asked the suspension of the rule; which was carried—ayes 119, noes 47.

Mr. P. thereupon offered a resolution, in the form of an order, that the report of the committee of ways and means on the subject of the secretary of the treasury's letter, &c. be the order of the day at 1 o'clock on every day, except Saturdays.

Mr. Polk then moved that the rule which requires such a resolution to lie on the table for one day be suspended, and that it be considered at this time.

After some conversation, this was carried—ayes 115, noes 56. So the house proceeded to consider the order.

The debate was renewed with much spirit. Finally, Mr. Polk's proposition was agreed to, and the house adjourned.

Thursday, March 13. After some other business—

Mr. Burges moved to recommit the report of the committee of ways and means to that committee, with instructions to report that the reasons of the secretary for removing the deposits were insufficient.

Mr. Burges addressed the house at length in support of the motion he had made, and continued to speak till the expiration of the morning hour; when the residue of his remarks was cut off by the house passing to the order of the day, (which was the commutation pension bill). Before the order, however, was proclaimed from the chair.

Mr. Polk moved to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, with a view to take up the appropriation bills.

Which being agreed to, the house, in committee, took up the military appropriation bill, and finally passed through the bill, and reported it as amended to the house. Some of the items caused considerable debate, though their subjects were not important. Adjourned.

UNITED STATES BANK.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

House of representatives, March 4, 1834.

Mr. Polk, from the committee of ways and means, made the following report:

The committee of ways and means have had under consideration the letter of the secretary of the treasury of the 3d of December last, communicating to congress his reasons for ordering the public deposits to be removed from the bank of the United States; the memorial of the president and directors of the bank of the United States, complaining that the "chartered rights of the stockholders" had been violated, and asking redress; the memorial of that portion of the directors of the bank appointed by the United States, making certain charges of misconduct against the bank; and, also, sundry other memorials and resolutions from other banks, and citizens in relation thereto, which have been referred to them by the house, and have agreed to the following

REPORT:

The secretary of the treasury, in his letter of the 3d of December last, informs congress, that "in pursuance of the power reserved to him by the act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the U. States," he had "directed that the deposits of the money of the U. States shall not be made in the said bank or branches thereof, but in certain state banks which had been designated for that purpose," and he proceeds to lay before congress the reasons which induced him to give such order and direction.

The bank, in its memorial, draws in question the power of the secretary to issue such order, and also the sufficiency of his reasons for the act.

From the language employed, it is apparent that the bank claims the custody and use of the public deposits as a "chartered right," and in case of a removal for reasons which the president and directors may not deem sufficient, asserts the prerogative of making the bank a party in the transaction. They assume that the "chartered rights of the stockholders" have been "violated," and demand "redress," as an act of "justice."

It is the opinion of the committee, that the question as to the power of the secretary of the treasury, and the sufficiency or insufficiency of the reasons for which he may have ceased to make the bank of the United States the depository of the public moneys, is one exclusively between that officer and the constituted authorities to whom he is responsible. To pronounce a decision upon the act, and the reasons which superinduced it, appertains exclusively to the government, and is a question in which the bank has no right to interpose for the purpose of influencing the decision.

The bank denies the authority of the secretary of the treasury to issue his order for removing the public deposits from its custody, and claims possession of these deposits as a chartered right, because, as it alleges, "the bank has in all things performed the stipulations of the charter."

The secretary of the treasury, in his letter, affirms that the bank charter conferred upon him no new power or control over the public deposits, but was a reservation of a power previously possessed by him, and one which had been exercised by the head of the treasury department from the origin of the government, and that none of the "chartered rights" of the bank have been violated by the act complained of.

The ground should be well examined before it is conceded that a power which essentially belongs to the treasury department, and has always been exercised under the responsibility of the secretary, has been transferred to a corporation, which claims to be irresponsible to the government and people of the United States, except for palpable violations of its charter.

To arrive at a clear understanding of the power of the secretary to designate and direct the place of deposit of the public moneys, it is necessary to trace it from its origin; to show by whom and how it was exercised, prior to the establishment of the bank of the United States; and how far it has been regulated, modified or transferred, by the charter of that institution. The continental congress of the revolution, as far as it possessed any attributes of government, united in itself the powers of every department. In managing the concerns entrusted to its guardianship, it acted as much in an executive as a legislative capacity. The first germ of the treasury department of the United States is found in a resolution of that body, as early as the 25th of July, 1775, to the following effect, viz:

Resolved, That Michael Hiltgas and George Clymer be joint treasurers of the United Colonies; that the treasurers reside in Philadelphia; and that they shall give bond with security for the faithful performance of their office, in the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, &c.

In their hands were placed all the funds of congress, to be drawn out on the warrants of the president of congress. They were directly responsible to congress, settled their accounts with that body, and held their offices at its will.

In various other resolutions and ordinances subsequently passed, we trace the process by which the continental congress gradually vested a portion of its executive powers in subordinate agents appointed by its vote, and removable at its will. It began with appointing treasurers over whom it exercised a direct superintendence. It next vested the superintending power over that and other officers of the treasury, in a standing committee of its own body. Next, it was vested in commissioners, a part of whom were members of congress, and a part not members. Finally, by creating "civil executive departments," of the treasury, war and marine, it separated the superintending power over the treasurer and other subordinate officers of the treasury, wholly from its own body, reserving the right of removal; and in case of necessity, controlling the whole system. The principle on which the department was organized, was in no degree changed by afterwards instituting a "board of treasury," for the "superintendent of finance."

It will be observed that in the first instance, the power to direct the treasurers, in relation to the place where they should keep the public money, as well as every other portion of their duties, was vested in congress. This power was afterwards vested, successively, in the committee on the treasury, the commissioners of the treasury, the superintendent of finance, and the board of treasury. The power was expressly conferred on the "superintendent of finance," and "board of treasury," to superintend and control the settlement of all public accounts, and to direct and control all persons employed in procuring supplies for the public service, and in the expenditure of public money—and the ordinance expressly provides, that a treasurer,

&c. shall be appointed "in aid of the superintendent of finance."

The superintendent, therefore, had a right to direct him in all things, in subordination to the resolutions and ordinances of congress, which was the head of the executive department.

At the time the present constitution was adopted, the treasury department was managed by the "board of treasury," consisting of three commissioners, aided by a comptroller, a treasurer, a register, and auditors and a competent number of clerks. The board had power to direct the treasurer in all his acts, and were themselves responsible to congress, the head of the executive department in the existing government.

The new constitution took the entire executive power away from congress, and vested it in an independent co-ordinate department of the government. It declares that "the executive powers shall be vested in a president of the U. States of America;" "that he shall nominate, and by and with the consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, or other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointment are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the congress may by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

Thus, by the voice of the people of the states, assembled in the several sovereignties, was the entire executive power, including the power of appointment, and consequently of removal, taken away from congress and vested in the president. The ultimate supervision and control of the officers of the "civil executive departments" was taken from congress and vested in the president of the United States; and to enable him to exercise it with the more effect, he was, by the constitution itself, clothed with authority to "require the opinion in writing of the principal officers in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." To the president, therefore, was transferred, by the new constitution, that power of appointment and removal, and ultimate supervision over all the executive departments of the government which had before belonged to congress.

The change in the form of government effected by the new constitution, made it necessary to reorganize "the civil executive departments," which existed under the confederation. At the first session of the new congress, therefore, an act was passed entitled "an act to establish the treasury department." The first section of that provides "that there shall be a department of treasury, in which shall be the following officers, namely: a secretary of the treasury, to be deemed head of the department; a comptroller, an auditor, a treasurer, a register and an assistant to the secretary of the treasury, which assistant shall be appointed by the said secretary."

The duties assigned to the secretary of the treasury, are, in a great measure, identical with those assigned by the old congress to the superintendent of finance.

The offices of comptroller, treasurer and register of the treasury department, under the confederation, were retained under the new system, with similar duties attached to them. The very language of the old ordinances in relation to the leading duties of the treasurer, is copied into the act of congress of 1789, establishing the treasury department, viz. It shall be the duty of the treasurer to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants, &c.

That act was construed at the time of its passage, and has been ever since, as conferring on the secretary of the treasury all the powers which, under the old confederation, had been exercised by the "board of treasury;" and we accordingly find that Alexander Hamilton, the first secretary of the treasury, and all of his successors in that office, down to the time of establishing the present bank of the United States, constantly exercised the power of directing where the public moneys in the treasury were to be deposited. It was sometimes placed in the hands of individuals, sometimes in state banks, and a part of it in the former bank of the United States. It was never supposed, during the period above mentioned, to be the province of the treasurer to make the selection, nor did he ever attempt to exercise the power. It was, by uniform usage and the acquiescence of congress and all the branches of government, from 1789 down to 1816, admitted to be placed by law under the exclusive power of the secretary, subject to the supervision of the president as the head of the executive department. Under the construction given to the same act, and by uniform usage, the principle was equally well established, that to the secretary of the treasury belonged the exclusive power of ordering transfers of public money from one place of deposit to another, and the warrants or draughts issued for that purpose, did not take the funds from the debit of the treasurer, and were never considered as drawing them out of the treasury. The public revenue can never be entirely collected or disbursed at the same places. It must necessarily be transferred from the points of collection to places where it may be needed, and deposited in secure places for safe keeping prior to disbursement. If, in this operation, it remains charged to the treasurer on the books of the treasury, although separated into a thousand parcels, and in every part of the union, it is still in the treasury, ready to be disbursed upon warrants drawn according to the laws. The committee annex to this report, by way of appendix, various official documents, establishing conclusively the position here stated.

At the period, therefore, that the charter of the present bank was granted, the power of the secretary of the trethis subject was one well known and understood. It had been clearly settled by long usage and invariable practice under the act of 1789, and with which the congress of 1816, when they chartered this bank, were perfectly acquainted, and to which they must have intended to refer, when they speak in general terms of his power over the public deposits, without defining or prescribing its limits.

The 16th section of the charter declares that the deposits of the moneys of "the United States in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in the said bank or branches thereof, unless the secretary of the treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case, the secretary of the treasury shall immediately lay before congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons of such order and direction."

This section grants no new power to the secretary of the treasury. On the contrary, as far as it operates at all, it is a reservation of the power which before existed, to select the depositories for the public funds. The secretary, therefore, does not derive his power over the subject from this act.

Being a reservation, and not a grant of power, the secretary of the treasury retains all the powers over the public moneys he before possessed, except so far as they may be modified or taken away by the bank charter. The power of transfer, not being alluded to in the section, is not restricted by it, and of course is possessed by the secretary of the treasury to the same extent as before.

Accordingly, transfers have constantly been made, since the bank charter was granted, as before, not only from one office of that bank to another, but from that bank and its offices to state banks. Hereto annexed is a list of numerous transfers from the bank of the United States to state banks, taken from a report of Mr. Secretary Crawford to the house of representatives, dated February 7th, 1823.

The error upon this point consists in considering the provision in the bank charter a grant of power, instead of the reservation of a power previously existing. Not finding the power of transfer granted, it has been denied that it exists, when, in fact, the silence of the section leaves it as it was before.

The effect of the 16th section of the bank charter is, to take from congress entirely the power to control the public deposits, which that body before possessed. It provides that the deposits of the moneys of the United States shall be made in the bank of the United States, without reserving to the legislative authority any power to order their removal, with reason or without reason.

Whether the congress of 1816 acted wisely in thus divesting themselves of all control over the places of public deposit of the public moneys, for the long period of twenty years, is a question which it is unnecessary to determine. It is certain that they did so; and during the continuance of the charter, therefore, they must have continued to be made in the bank of the United States, unless the secretary of the treasury had otherwise ordered and directed. It was stipulated with the stockholders that they should have the public deposits, unless the secretary otherwise ordered, and that the legislative authority would not interfere to take them away during the continuance of their charter.

This section of the bank charter, although it surrenders the power of congress over the public deposits for twenty years, and indicates a legislative preference for the bank of the United States as a depository, does not diminish the positive power of the secretary of the treasury over the subject. He had the same legal power after the passage of this act, to order and direct the public deposits to be made in other banks, as he had before. An additional duty was imposed upon him. But how can this requirement impair his power? Had the clause requiring the reasons to be reported been omitted, could it have been doubted that the power of the secretary to cause the deposits to be made in other banks would have been absolute and unqualified? And how can the necessity for giving his reasons after the act is done, impair his power to do it? Before the bank charter was granted, the secretary of the treasury was liable to be called on by congress for his reasons for discharging one bank from the service of the treasury, and employing another, and it was his duty to give them. The change effected in his position is, that he is now bound by law to give his reasons without a special call. But the giving his reasons now, after the act is done, can no more affect his power to do it, than giving his reasons then under a special call of congress; and his duty to act only for good reasons, and his liability to be punished for measures originating in corrupt or wicked motives, were just as strong then as now.

That it was intended that this power should be exercised, as it always has been, by the executive authority, without consulting congress, is proved by the fact, that the secretary is not required to give his reasons to congress, even though they may be in session, until after the act is done. If it had been intended that he should be directed and advised by congress before he acted, provision would have been made that when congress are in session, the reasons should be laid before them for their consideration and approval before the act was done.

In illustration of the view here taken of the proper interpretation of this provision of the bank charter, and the power reserved by it to the secretary over the public deposits, the committee refer to another provision of that charter. By the 14th section, it was stipulated by congress, in behalf of the United States, with the stockholders of the bank, "that the bills or notes of the said corporation originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of congress." It was important for the bank, in order to obtain general credit and circulation for its notes, that they should be received in payment of public dues. The charter provides that they shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, but upon the express condition that congress reserves to itself the right to provide by law that its notes shall not be received in payment of the public revenue. This was a power reserved to congress, to which the bank agreed; as was the power reserved to the secretary to remove the deposits, to which the bank in like manner agreed. Now it will not be maintained by any one, that congress may not at pleasure, without any violation of the charter, or any infringement of the contract with the bank, by law refuse to receive the notes of the bank in the payment of the public dues.

If the secretary of the treasury, without an act of congress, should attempt to prohibit the receipt of the notes of the bank in payments to the United States, he would usurp a power which belongs to the legislative authority; and in like manner, if congress, without the previous order and direction of the secretary of the treasury, were to attempt to cause the public deposits to be removed from the bank, they would usurp a power which does not belong to them.

The bank would have the same cause to complain, if the executive refused to receive its notes in payment of public dues without the authority of an act of congress, as it would have if congress were to remove the deposits, without the previous order and direction of the secretary of the treasury, and no more.

The power reserved to congress to discontinue the receipt of the notes of the bank in "payment to the United States," is absolute and unqualified. In like manner, the power of the secretary of the treasury, for reasons which he is required to report to congress, to employ other depositories of the public money, is equally absolute and unqualified. Neither congress nor the secretary are required to give any reasons to the bank. And if congress were, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, to pass a law, declaring that the notes of the bank shall no longer be taken in payments to the United States, the president and directors of the bank would have no just ground of complaint that their "chartered rights" had been violated. Is the case now presented at all different in principle? Have they any just ground to complain that their "chartered rights" have been violated, by the act of the secretary, in the removal of the deposits? The bank charter is a contract between the government of the United States and the stockholders. To see that the secretary of the treasury acts from pure motives, and judge whether further legislation be not necessary on the subject, congress require of him to report his reasons to them. This is an arrangement between the legislative and executive departments of the government, who are jointly one party to the contract, with whose arrangement, the bank, as the other party, has no concern. The stockholders entered into the contract, in which the government reserved the right to reject their notes, and discontinue their bank as a depository, the one through congress and the other through the secretary of the treasury, without assigning to them any reasons whatever. Whenever either of these powers is exercised by the agent to whom it has been reserved, no stipulation of the contract has been violated, and the bank has no right to complain.

Not only was no stipulation made with the bank that its notes should be received in payments to the United States, and that it should be employed as a depository of the public moneys, longer than it should be the pleasure of the government; but any contract of that sort on the part of the government would have been indiscreet and improper. To have absolutely bartered away to a corporation, the high powers of both the legislative and executive departments, and left the government of the people absolutely dependent on a corporation of its own creation for the currency in which public dues should be paid, and the places in which the public moneys should be kept, would have been an assumption of power on the part of those who created the bank charter, which the boldest advocates of a controlling power over the popular will, never dared to maintain. Many unforeseen considerations, might render it expedient, if not indispensable to the preservation and protection of the public interests, within a less period than twenty years, to sever the connection between the government and the bank, and no congress has yet been found so imprudent as to transfer from the government the power to determine what currency it will or will not receive in payment of the public dues, and to select at will the depositories of the public funds; much less, have they imposed on the public authorities, and on congress themselves, the degrading duty of giving reasons to a corporation, for measures they may deem essential to the interests of the people, the purity of the government, and the preservation of our invaluable institutions.

The removal of the deposits by the secretary of the treasury from the bank of the United States, so far from being an usurpation of a power belonging to congress, actually restored to that body a power, of which they had by the terms of the charter divested themselves. So far as regards congress, the contract is absolute, that the deposits shall be made in the bank of the United States, and no shadow of authority is reserved to them otherwise to "order and direct." Congress divested itself of all power or control over the deposits unless the secretary should first issue his order for the removal. The exclusive power to issue such order was reserved to the secretary of the treasury, and but for his action, the deposits must have remained beyond the reach of congress until the termination of the bank charter. The moment they are out of the bank, by the order and direction of the secretary of the treasury, as provided in the charter, all the original power which congress possessed over them, reverts to that body. They may by law direct their future disposition. If they think proper to relieve the executive from all responsibility for the safe keeping of the public funds, they may, by an act of legislation, designate the depositories in which they shall be kept. The power with which, in the opinion of the committee, congress should never have parted, has been restored to that body by the act of the secretary, and it is not perceived upon what ground he can be charged with an usurpation of their powers, by an act which has essentially enlarged them.

In the section of the bank charter reserving to the secretary of the treasury the power over the deposits, it is not stated what reasons may be sufficient to justify him in directing the money of the United States to be deposited in other banks. That they ought to be good and honest reasons, there can be no doubt. Before the bank of the United States existed, he was equally bound to have such reasons for discharging one bank and employing another, as well as for all his other official acts. If they be not honest, he may be impeached by congress, or dismissed from office by the president. If they be not good, he may be overruled by a subsequent act of legislation, providing for their restoration, or designating some other place of deposit than that which he may have selected. But if they be both honest and good, the transaction should be at an end, when they are reported to congress.

It has recently been maintained in argument, that no reason but a want of safety can justify the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States; that the security of the public funds was the sole object which congress had in view; that having confidence in the bank, the act of charter directed the deposits to be made in it, but lest, at any time they should become insecure, they reserved to the secretary of the treasury the power of removing them, with a view solely to render them more secure; and that, for the same reason, he was required to assign his reasons to congress, whenever he did order the removal, that congress might review his act.

It is to be observed that the words of the bank charter recognizing the power of the secretary to remove the deposits, do not define the reasons or circumstances which will authorise him to act; and the necessary inference is, that he may act, for any reasons, which to him may seem sufficient.

If want of safety was the only reason which could justify a removal of the deposits, why was the secretary required to report his reasons at all? If there could be but one sufficient reason, congress would have known it as well without being reported as with it; and if there could be but one reason, why was it not so declared in the charter?

There are good grounds to believe that want of security was not the only, nor the chief reason in the minds of congress, when they required of the secretary to assign the reasons of the act to them. Suppose it to be discovered by the secretary, that the bank is in a tottering condition, and on the verge of stopping payment, what advantage would the government gain by a sudden withdrawal of its funds? Under the circumstances supposed, the first effect of such a measure would probably be, to compel the bank instantly to stop payment, and as a consequence, its notes would become fatally depreciated. But the bank charter requires that its notes shall be received in all payments to the United States, unless congress shall by law otherwise direct. All the revenues would then be paid in their notes, however much they might be depreciated, for the secretary would have no authority to refuse them until congress repealed the provision which required them to be received in payments to the United States. To remove the public funds, therefore, for want of safety, would be to depreciate the currency in which the accruing revenue must be received. Instead of having a deposit of good money in a doubtful bank, we might have one of bad money in good banks. The bank of the United States would be more likely to pay the warrants of the treasurer if the deposits were left in its possession, than it would to pay its own notes, received in payment of revenue, if they were taken away.

Instead of removing the deposits in such a case, the public interest would require every practicable effort on the part of the treasury to sustain the credit of the bank, at least until congress could repeal the provision which makes its notes a tender in all payments to the government. He would be a faithless secretary who should depreciate the currency he is bound by law to receive in payment of public dues; and under pretence of putting the public funds already collected in a safe place, resort to a measure which would inevitably make the currency which he was bound to receive in payment of the accruing revenue, in a great degree, worthless.

But the contemporaneous and continued construction of the clause in the charter relative to the secretary's reasons, even if the meaning of the words themselves was at all doubtful, is conclusive to show, not only that the secretary possesses full power to order the removal, but that it is his duty to do so for other reasons than the insecurity of the public funds.

On reference to the correspondence and documents connected with the treasury department, we find that Mr. Crawford, who was secretary of the treasury at the time the bank went into operation, in sundry letters, distinctly asserted his power under the charter to cause the deposits of public money to be made in state banks for various reasons, and that he did actually exercise that power during the first year of the bank's existence, reporting his reasons to congress at the next session; and that he did again exercise it in the year 1818—on both of which occasions it was not contested by the bank, and not called in question by congress. We find that in 1819 the power was expressly asserted by a committee of congress, and by eminent members, in debate, without controversy; and that at a subsequent period (1824) when Mr. Crawford's arrangements with state banks were called in question and investigated, it was declared by a committee of the house of representatives, that there was nothing in them in violation of law, or contrary to the usages of the department.

The successors of Mr. Crawford in the treasury department, Mr. Rush and Mr. Ingham, have asserted the power; and it was admitted to exist for other purposes than the security of the public deposits by the committee of ways and means of this house, as late as 1830.

The grounds on which it has been asserted the power may be exercised, have been, to equalise the benefits resulting from the deposits among the bank community; to aid the state banks in maintaining their credit; to induce them to resume specie payments; to prevent a pressure on their debtors; the refusal of the bank of the United States to receive as cash the notes of banks which it was deemed the interest of government to receive from its debtors; the public convenience; the misconduct of the bank; its interference in politics, and the use of its pecuniary power to produce injustice and oppression. These several grounds of action, suggested sometimes by the secretary of the treasury, sometimes by committees of congress or its members, as well in public documents as private correspondence, were never declared to be illegal or invalid even by the bank itself; nor does it appear ever to have been maintained or suggested, that the want of security was the only good reason for the action of the secretary, until since the removal by order and direction of the present incumbent. The committee consider the point too clear, under the words of the law and the practice of the government, to be now seriously called in question. Extracts of letters and reports are given in the appendix to this report, which fully establish the positions here asserted.

It has also been objected to the act of the secretary, that conceding to him the power to remove the deposits, and to direct them to be placed in state banks, that yet he had exceeded his authority in entering into contracts with the new depositories, prescribing the terms of deposit and the duties and services which they should be required to perform for the government, in consideration of the use of the public moneys.

The committee are of opinion that there is nothing in this objection. Money of the United States could not be placed in their keeping without a contract with them. If there was no written agreement, the law would imply one. It would imply a contract on the part of the deposit bank to pay; and if they refused to pay, the United States might sue and recover the money.

If the secretary, by depositing the money in a state bank, may make an implied contract, by which the bank would be bound to pay, surely he may make an express one. The objection, therefore, that he may not enter into a contract, although he has a right to deposit the money, is wholly untenable. If the state banks are selected lawfully as agents, and their duties not defined by law, they must necessarily be defined by contract, and the United States have the same right to take care of their interests in this respect as an individual.

In making these contracts, the present secretary has but followed the example of his predecessors, and has manifested an anxious care to protect the interests of the United States; and so far from being justly subject to censure, deserves rather to be commended for his vigilance, in guarding the public treasure as far as possible from danger of loss. But suppose all that has been urged by those who rely upon this objection to be true; suppose the contracts to be in fact void; still the public money is not less secure in the state banks than it would have been if no contracts had been made. In any view, therefore, the committee are of opinion that the objection is utterly futile, and deserving of no consideration. It has been the constant practice of the treasury to make such contracts with the banks selected as the public depositories, examples of which may be found in official letters of Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Crawford, hereto annexed.

The committee are of opinion, therefore, that the secretary possessed the power to issue his order for the removal of the deposits, and they are further of opinion that none of the chartered rights of the stockholders of the bank have been violated by it.

The bank in their memorial allege, "that in consideration of a full equivalent, rendered by them in money and services, they were entitled to the custody of the public deposits." To this proposition the committee do not assent. It appears by the 20th section of the act of the charter, that the bonus of a million and a half of dollars was paid by the bank in consideration of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act upon the said bank. This was the only money paid by the bank to the United States, and it was paid, not for the use of the public deposites, but for the exclusive privilege and benefit of banking conferred by the charter, and especially by the provision contained in the 21st section, viz:

"That no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States during the continuance of the corporation hereby created, for which the faith of the United States is hereby pledged."

The only services which the bank stipulates to perform for the government, are, "to perform the several and respective duties of the commissioners of loans for the several states, or of any one or more of them, whenever required by law;" and to "give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States, or the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions, or claiming allowance, on account of difference of exchange."

It nowhere appears in the charter of the bank that these services were to be performed by the bank in consideration of the use of the public deposits; but if it did so appear, it is evident that, so soon as the public deposits are withdrawn, the bank, not having possession of the public funds, can no longer be required to perform those duties. The committee think it much more likely that the consideration for these services in the minds of those who enacted the bank charter, was, that the United States agreed on their part to receive the notes or bills of the bank in payment of the public revenue, thereby enabling the bank to give general credit and circulation to their paper. Mr. Dallas, the secretary of the treasury at the time the bank charter was granted, in a letter addressed to the "committee on the national currency," dated the 24th of December, 1815, confirms this opinion. In that letter Mr. Dallas states, "It is proposed that in addition to the usual privileges of a corporation, the notes of the national bank shall be received in all payments to the United States, unless congress shall hereafter otherwise provide by law; and that in addition to the duties usually required from a corporation of this description, the national bank shall be employed to receive, transfer, and distribute the public revenue, under the direction of the proper department." Congress adopted this suggestion of the secretary, and hence we find, that by the 14th section of the bank charter, congress agree to receive the notes and bills of the bank in payment of public dues, and by the 15th section immediately following, the bank stipulates to transfer and distribute the public funds from place to place, without charge to the United States. In the same letter, Mr. Dallas negatives the idea that the deposits constituted any part of the consideration either for the bonus or the services proposed to be performed by the bank. He states that, "it is proposed that a bonus be paid to the government by the subscribers to the national bank, in consideration of the enrolments to be derived from an exclusive charter during a period of twenty years." This suggestion of Mr. Secretary Dallas, was also adopted by congress by a provision to that effect contained in the 20th section of the bank charter before recited. In the same letter, Mr. Dallas holds the following language in relation to the "deposits and the distribution of the public revenue," viz: "Independent of the bonus here proposed to be exacted, there are undoubtedly many public advantages to be drawn from the establishment of the national bank; but these are generally of an incidental kind, and (as in the case of the deposits and the distribution of the revenue) may be regarded in the light of equivalents, not for the monopoly of the charter, but for the reciprocal advantages of a fiscal connexion with the public treasury." It thus clearly appears that the ground assumed by the bank, that it had rendered "a full equivalent" in "money and services" for the use of the public deposits, is erroneous, and is not sustained either by the bank charter itself, or the opinion of the head of the treasury department—who furnished the plan, and largely contributed to found the present bank of the United States. Upon this ground, therefore, the committee think the bank cannot justly complain, that any of the "chartered rights of the stockholders" have been violated by the late removal of the public deposits from its custody.

The committee proceed to consider the sufficiency of the reasons assigned by the secretary for the exercise of his power in the case submitted to them by the house for their examination. These reasons may be classed under two general heads:

1st. Those which have relation to the public interest.

2d. Those which have reference to the conduct of the bank. The first reason given by the secretary is the fact that the charter of the bank of the United States will expire on the 3d of March 1836, and the probability that it will not be renewed. He has not undertaken to decide that the bank will not be re-chartered; but he has said he has no right to presume that it will be. He has said that he must act under the law as it exists, and not as it may by possibility be changed or altered by the action of congress hereafter. He has said that the bank charter will expire by its own limitation in the year 1836, and that he would not be justified in acting upon the supposition that the charter will be extended beyond that period; he has said further, that in his judgment, the presumption was very strong, that the charter would not be renewed. In the opinion of the committee, he was warranted in coming to this conclusion. What are the facts upon which an opinion on this point is to be formed? The corporation itself had made the renewal of its charter the leading question in the last contest for the presidency. It had procured from congress the passage of a bill to renew the charter, and elicited a veto from the president. Its advocates every where were uncommonly active. It is even charged with having stepped into the arena itself, and resorted to unusual means to give information to the people "relative to its nature and operations." Although, in addition to its own strength, it was sustained in the conflict by a combination of powerful political elements, it was signally defeated, and the president triumphantly re-elected. This result could not be otherwise considered than as a verdict of the people in favor of the veto, and against the bank.

If any doubt had existed in relation to the decision of the people on that point, we may confidently appeal to the elections of members to the present congress for its solution. Of the many expressions of public opinion, through the more numerous representatives of the people in the state legislatures, presented to congress and referred to this committee, during the present session, in relation to the bank, not one has recommended its recharter, while most have declared it unconstitutional.

That the bank would ever be rechartered, there was, therefore, when the secretary gave his order to remove the deposits, but little reason to believe; and there is less now.

Nor was there any reason to believe that a substitute for the present bank could be provided by congress. Of all the schemes suggested, none seemed to have met with any considerable portion of favor from the people. There were, therefore, abundant reasons to believe that the government would be under the necessity of resorting to the employment of state banks, in the same manner as before the present bank of the United States was created.

The transfer of the public deposits from the bank of the U. States and branches, to the state banks, at some period, was therefore inevitable. The only question was as to the time. Ought they to have been made in the bank of the United States to the last day of its existence, or to have been changed at an earlier day? and if so, how much earlier?

The public deposits constituted substantially a part of the capital of the bank, and enabled it to maintain an extension of business which would have been impracticable without them. If the deposits had remained in the bank until the close of the charter, that institution must either have commenced its curtailments at a preceding period, and locked up from the use of the community a large amount of funds, or the contraction of its business at the termination of its charter, to meet the demands from the public deposits, pay over its private deposits, redeem its returning circulation, and reimburse its stockholders, must have created a most appalling pressure upon the country. It was certainly wise policy to divide this operation, and save the community from being overwhelmed by all these demands at once. A withdrawal of the public deposits was calculated to produce that result. A part of the private deposits would naturally follow the public; and it was reasonable to suppose, that when the effective capital of the bank was curtailed, and it ceased to be the disbursing bank for the officers of the government, its circulation would be diminished. These consequences flowing gradually from a gradual removal of the deposits, would make it necessary for the bank, by gentle degrees, to call in its loans, and restrict its business, so that, at the termination of its charter, its demands on the community would be less, and the pressure lighter. These views, which appear to have been entertained by the secretary of the treasury, seem to have been verified by results.

The bank has proceeded to call in its loans, and has already wound up its concerns to the amount of about fifteen per cent. of all it had under disbursement. The manner in which this operation has been conducted, will be adverted to in another part of this report, as will also the effect produced by it. It is sufficient to remark here, that if embarrassment has been produced by it, (which could not have been its necessary effect), it rather proves the prudence and wisdom of the measure, than its impudence or hastiness. And if the mere removal of the deposits so long before the termination of the charter, has caused the public distress which is now alleged to exist, how overwhelming must it have been if that operation had been delayed until the expiration of the charter, when other inevitable demands to a large amount would have been superadded! It is only by dividing the evils which this bank, in its last moments, has power and seems disposed to inflict upon the country, that they can be made tolerable. And it is wise in the government so to conduct its policy, that they shall not be brought upon it at once. A new system of collection and disbursement cannot be introduced and put into operation throughout this extensive country at once. Local and temporary causes will be likely to interfere with its introduction, which it will require time, patience and labor to surmount. In some places, it may be difficult at first to find safe and willing agents to transact the business of the treasury. By introducing the new system before the old system is out of existence, the former agents may continue to be employed in such places until the difficulties be overcome. But if the removal were delayed until the moment the old system ceased to exist, such might be the influence or power of its advocates, and their resolute determination to force its continuance, that they might make it impossible for the government, upon the emergency, to employ suitable agents. To obviate those difficulties, which might create great embarrassment to introduce and put into harmonious operation all the machinery of a new system throughout a country so extensive, cannot surely require less time than has been taken by the secretary of the treasury.

There appears also to be much force in the considerations urged by the secretary, connected with the currency of the country, and the domestic exchanges. The notes of the bank of the United States must necessarily in a short time be withdrawn from circulation. The principal currency of the country for many years to come, will be bank notes, there is no reason to doubt, and it is certainly good policy to foster the state banks which furnish them, in measures tending to give them as general credit as has been heretofore attached to the notes of the United States bank and branches.

That the natural and ascertained course of trade, circulation and exchange, connected with the interests of banking institutions, will ultimately produce this result in relation to the notes of the principal state banks, there is every reason to anticipate; but their employment in the business of the government, by awakening them to their capacities and interests, is calculated to hasten the consummation of so desirable an event.

It was a matter of no small moment, to encourage and hasten the banks in maturing their system of circulation and exchange, so that at the termination of the charter of the bank of the United States, the trade of the country might not encounter at the same time the loss of a general currency and the entire breaking up of the domestic exchanges, a partial interruption of which, by that bank is now producing such serious inconvenience. By the latest returns of the banks employed by the government, it appears that they are already rapidly taking the place of the bank of the United States in the exchange operations. Upon all the points hitherto considered, there is room for a difference of opinion, as to the time when the public deposits should have been shifted to the state banks.

It is evident that it would have required one, two or three years, to realize the result which the public good required should be brought about before the termination of the bank's charter; but whether the greatest or least of those periods, men may differ according to their views of their several operations. But there was another consideration connected with the public good, which, in the opinion of the committee, made it the imperative duty of the secretary to act without delay. Without waiting for the final decision of the secretary, the bank of the United States, early in August last, although then in possession of specie to an amount exceeding ten millions of dollars, and receiving a rapid accession to the public deposits, commenced a system of severe curtailment, and before the end of that month took large sums in specie from the state banks. Before the 1st of October there was a pressure upon the money market, and serious apprehensions for the future. The board hoarded up the deposits it had received, and at the same time made a rapid curtailment of its loans. The secretary has accurately set forth the accession of public deposits, and the curtailment of loans during the months of August and September. The former amounting to $4,066,146 21, and the latter to $2,268,504 11, showing the whole amount abstracted from the use of the mercantile community, chiefly in the commercial cities, during these two months to have been no less than $6,334,650 32. In consequence of the change in the tariff, which threw into the latter part of the last year the payment of two sets of duties, the old credit and the new cash duties, the public deposits were accumulating in the Atlantic cities with unprecedented rapidity, and it was apparent that the business of the cities could not long bear the double drain of bank calls, and public revenue, without some return.

As the bank had commenced this course in anticipation of a removal of the deposits, it could not be expected to change it until all idea of that measure should be abandoned. Had it been postponed until the first of January, it is not to be imagined that the bank would have relaxed its rigid policy upon any other consideration than a disposition in the executive to abandon the measure, or in the legislature to overrule him. It cannot be doubted that the government would have been forced from its position, or that a scene of ruin and distress would have been produced by the unfeeling cupidity of the bank, and its determination to force a recharter.

If, under the circumstances, the secretary of the treasury had delayed the execution of his order for the change of the deposits to the first of December or January, he would, in the opinion of the committee, have been culpably regardless of the great public interests intrusted to his superintendence. But, independent of these considerations, it was the undoubted duty of the secretary of the treasury to order and direct the transfer of the deposits whenever, in his opinion, it was required by the public interests.

It is proper to observe, that in expressing the opinion that it is the duty of the secretary to change the place of deposits, whenever the public interest or convenience require it, the committee have no reference to interests which are not immediately connected with the financial concerns of the country, or the conduct of the bank as the fiscal agent of the government. Beyond these limits, the secretary of the treasury does not and has not claimed the right to interfere. The reasons upon which he appears to have acted are fiscal merely, and are confined entirely to the condition in which the government and people would be placed by the state of the currency on the termination of the charter of the bank, and to the misconduct of the bank in its character of fiscal agent of the government.

He does not claim for himself, nor do the committee claim for him, the right to regulate the currency, nor to influence by his power over the deposits any political movements affecting either our internal concerns or foreign relations. But it is unquestionably his duty to look forward to the condition in which the currency will in a short time be placed, by the existing laws, when the charter of the bank expires; and it is clearly his duty to examine also into the conduct of the agent which has been placed by law under his supervision; and to inquire whether its money or corporate powers are used in good faith, for the purposes for which they were given. As the presiding officer of the treasury department, these subjects were legally under his supervision, and came directly within the range of his official duties. In acting upon these reasons, it is not the theory of our system, nor has it been the practice, to consult the legislative power in relation to acts which are entrusted to the direction of the executive; and to ask the sanction of congress beforehand, to acts which a sense of duty requires him to perform, would be to shrink from his constitutional responsibility, and throw it upon another department of the government. With the removal of the deposits, and the reasons for it, congress, according to the charter of the bank, have clearly no concern, even if they be in session when, in the opinion of the secretary of the treasury, a removal becomes necessary or proper, until the act be done and the reasons be reported to them.

The committee come next to examine such of the secretary's reasons for the removal of the deposits as relate to the conduct of the bank.

The United States are the owners of seven millions of the capital stock of the bank, and by the charter are entitled to be represented at the board by five directors. The charter provides that "not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business."

Although the charter of the bank declares, in express terms, that it shall require the attendance of seven members of the board of directors to constitute a quorum for doing business, the government directors state, and the fact also appears from the evidence accompanying the report of the committee of investigation in 1832, and that of the committee of ways and means at the last session, that, for some time past, all the most important business of the board has been done by committees of less than seven, selected by the president, of which he is ex-officio a member; that these committees seldom report, and many of their most important transactions are secret, and remain for a long time unknown to the board.

This delegation of power to committees of the bank, the committee consider to be a direct and palpable violation of the charter of the bank. From all these committees, the government directors, who are appointed to represent the stock, and watch over the interest of the United States in the bank, state, in their memorial, they are entirely excluded. They state that, at the commencement of the last year, not one of their number was placed on any of these committees, and although, at a subsequent day, two of them were assigned to stations on committees, they were again, in a short time, excluded from them altogether. Thus were they cut off from all participation in the most important business of the bank, and know nothing of what is done except by accident or results. They state that all important negotiations are carried on by the committee of exchange, who grant discounts to printers, politicians and others almost without limit, often upon securities wholly inadmissible, according to the rules of the board, on extraordinary terms, and for unusual times. They state that, in one instance, when they discovered that certain debtors had been permitted largely to overdraw, and that their paper remained unprotected when due, and unpaid, they procured the appointment of a committee to investigate the account, but before that committee could act, the committee on exchange, in violation of the rules of the bank, discounted to the same men, certain notes and draughts (some of which on security of the most unusual kind) sufficient to pay the over draughts, and take up the unprotected paper; although they were then many times protested on other paper; and the board, to consummate the transaction, rescinded the order under which the select committee was appointed, three days after it was adopted.

To conform the practice of the bank to the charter, the government directors state, that they proposed to restore the business of discounts to the board of directors; but this was overruled. To enable them to participate, in some degree, in the business of the bank, they proposed that the members of the whole board should be selected, in rotation, to form the committees, in conformity with former practice, and an unrescinded rule; but this also was refused.

Finally, instead of reforming the practice of the bank, so as to make it conform to the charter and the rules, the majority of the board of directors changed the rules, and made them conform to the practice. Thus, rules made by themselves, are taken as authority for disregarding the restrictions of the charter and of the regulations prescribed by the stockholders; and from the statement of these directors, it appears that almost all the business of the bank is done by committees of three or five, to which the president is attached ex-officio. The board of directors remain ignorant of the movement of the corporation, which has been put under their management, and by an entire exclusion of the government directors from the committees, they are rendered useless for all the purposes, which induced their being placed in the direction. Under such management, could the interest of the government be considered secure in their hands? The committee think not—and that this, with other abuses connected with its management, which will be noticed in the subsequent part of this report, was a sufficient reason to justify the secretary in the removal of the deposits.

The conduct of the bank in the year 1832, in secretly interfering, through the agency of its president and one of its secret committees, with the policy of government, whereby they sought, without the knowledge or consent of the government, to postpone the payment of a large portion of the public debt, denominated the 3 per cent. stock, for a long period beyond the time fixed by the government for its reimbursement, was, in the opinion of the committee, not only without warrant of law, but highly reprehensible. The conduct of the bank in this transaction, was fully examined by a committee of the house at the last session of congress, and resulted in a report from the majority, and a counter-report from the minority of that committee. To these reports, hereto appended, the committee refer for all the facts connected with this illegal and unwarrantable act on the part of the bank. In neither of these reports is the conduct of the bank approved. In the report of the majority it is admitted that "it is due however, to the government, to express the opinion, that the arrangement made by the agent in England for the purchase of the 3 per cent. stock, and the detention of the certificates (which measures were subsequently disclaimed by the bank), the institution exceeded its legitimate authority, and had no warrant in the correspondence of the secretary of the treasury." The minority of that committee in their report, present all the facts in detail, derived from official correspondence and documents, and from the personal examination on oath of a part of the directors of the bank. Referring to these official reports of a former committee, of the house, the committee deem it unnecessary to do more than to call the attention of the house to them as developing all the facts and circumstances connected with this transaction.

But it has been urged that the conduct of the bank, in regard to the three per cent. stock, should have constituted no part of the reasons which should have influenced the secretary of the treasury in the removal of the deposits, because a majority of the house of representatives had, at the last session, expressed an opinion, by the adoption of a resolution, that the deposits may be "safely continued in the bank of the United States." To determine what consideration ought to be given to such an expression of the opinion of the house, it is necessary to look to the circumstances under which it was given. By the journals it appears that the committee reported to the house on the first March, and on the next day (second March) the minority made a further supplemental report. The resolution in question was adopted on the second of March, being the last day but one of the session. The reports of the majority and minority of the committee were very long, and were accompanied by a mass of testimony, upon which they were based, and which it had occupied the committee many weeks to collect. The reports had not been printed, and could not have been examined or read by any member of the house except the committee themselves.

The house, by this vote, did not approve the conduct of the bank in regard to the three per cent. They expressed no opinion that other causes than the insecurity of the public deposits in the bank, would or would not be sufficient to justify the secretary in removing them. These points were not presented for their consideration or decision. The vote, in fact, amounted to nothing more than a simple expression of the opinion of a majority of the house, that as the deposits had been heretofore kept in the bank, for aught that appeared, (the reports of the committee not having been printed or examined by the house), they might be safely continued there. This expression of opinion, given under the circumstances stated, ought not, in the opinion of the committee, to have restrained the secretary from the performance of his duty, if, in his opinion, the bank had become faithless to its trust, or the public interest made it necessary for him to act.

The next reason assigned by the secretary for the removal of the deposits, is the unjust and unconscientious demand on the part of the bank for damages to the amount of $158,842 77, upon the protested bill drawn by the United States on the French government. A bare statement of the facts connected with this transaction will show the true character of this demand on the part of the bank. The bank is the fiscal agent of the government, and during the whole period of its existence, has held on deposit very large amounts of the public money, which it has used (without the payment of interest to the government, in loans to the community) and has been thus enabled largely to increase its profits. From an official statement appended to this report, it appears that the average amount of deposits of the public money in the bank of the United States, and its offices, for each month, from the year 1818 to the year 1833, both inclusive, (being a period of 16 years) was $6,717,353 67; the annual interest accruing to the bank upon this amount of public deposits, at 6 per cent. per annum, would be $403,635 22, and for a period of 16 years, would be $6,448,563 52. During the month of February, 1833, the government were desirous to have remitted from Paris to the United States, the amount of the first instalment due to the United States from France under the French treaty of the 4th July, 1831. For the purpose of effecting the remittance in the most convenient and least expensive form, the government of the United States drew on the 7th of February, 1833, a bill on the French government for $903,565 89, and sold the bill to the bank of the United States. The bill was paid for by the bank, not by cash advanced and paid out of the bank, but by simply entering the amount to the credit of the treasurer on the books of the bank, and thus increasing by that amount the public deposits in the bank; the bank continuing in the possession and use of the money as before the purchase, with this difference only, that the amount paid for the bill was subject, with the other public moneys on deposit, to be drawn for by the government as the public service might require. The bill was sold by the bank in London and forwarded by the purchaser to Paris for collection, where it was protested, because the French chambers had failed to make provision for its payment, and was afterwards taken up for the honor of the bank, by its agent. The government immediately paid back to the bank the principal of the bill.

But the secretary of the treasury declined paying the damages which the bank claimed. In the monthly statement from the bank of the 3d of June following, and in all the monthly statements since that time, (in each of which is contained, amongst other things, the bank's account with the treasury), the following item is charged by the bank, to wit: "Due by the U. S. for protested bill of exchange on France, $158,842 77."

What makes this demand the more unconscientious, is, that during the whole period, from the 7th of February, the day the bill was drawn, until it was repaid to the bank, the public deposits in bank, and which it held and used without interest, greatly exceeded the amount of the bill. The bank then did not in fact suffer any damages, or losses, other than the interest, cost of protest and re-exchange, which the government promptly, and without hesitation, avowed its willingness to repay, together with the principal of the bill. But the bank claims more than this. They claim $158,842 77 as damages, not on the ground that any damages were in fact sustained, but upon a technical claim of a legal right to damages. Under such circumstances, the committee consider it to have been the duty of the secretary of the treasury, not only to decline making the payment, but to discontinue the fiscal agency of an institution capable of asserting so unjust a demand, and seeking to enrich itself at the loss of its principal. Here was a bank which, for upwards of 16 years, had had the use of an average deposit of public money of near seven millions of dollars, without the payment of interest, deriving a profit from the use of the public money during that period of upwards of six millions; and at the very moment when it has in use millions of the public money, is taking advantage of the disappointment of the government which employs it, and that disappointment too growing out of an unforeseen contingency, against which the government could not guard; and seeking, upon what it is pleased to regard as the strict law of the case, without even color of justice, to make the government, in whose employ it is, pay in damages the large amount already stated. No prudent individual, who had any regard to his own interests or rights, would continue an agent who would manifest such an utter disregard of his interests. An individual would have taken his business out of the hands of such an agent. The secretary of the treasury, as the only authorised agent of the government, competent to do so, has done nothing more, by the removal of the deposits, than discontinue the fiscal agency of the bank of the United States.

In the view which they have here presented, the committee have proceeded upon the supposition that by the strict law, the bank might demand the damages in question. If that were the case, the demand would be most unconscientious and unjust.

The committee do not, however, concede that the bank has even a legal right to the damages claimed. In general, the drawer of a foreign bill returned protested, is liable for the amount on the face of the bill, for interest, for cost of protest, for re-exchange, and for the reasonable expenses which have been incurred by the dishonor of the bill, and, according to the general usages which regulate foreign bills of exchange, he is liable for nothing more. There is no general commercial usage which gives damages of 15 per cent. or at any other rate, on the return of a protested foreign bill of exchange. Damages of that description, whenever they are allowed against the drawer, are either given by statute or depend upon the established local usages of particular places, and not upon the general usages of trade. In the United States, the amount of damages, recoverable upon a foreign bill returned protested, varies according to the local usages or statutory provisions of the different states, respectively. In Massachusetts the damages are 10 per cent. in addition to interest and cost of protest; in Pennsylvania the damages are 20 per cent. on bills drawn on Europe, and returned protested. In Maryland 15 per cent. The amount of damages in the respective states being regulated by statute, there is no general usage prevailing all the states, which can regulate the amount of damages. This bill was drawn and sold to the bank at the treasury in the District of Columbia—and in that portion of the district which was before the cession to the U. States a part of Maryland. The right of the bank to recover the damages claimed, must depend upon the laws of Maryland, still in force in this district—congress never having passed any law on the subject since the cession of the territory, and the exclusive jurisdiction over it to the United States. The only statute of the state of Maryland in force in that part of the district formerly held by Maryland, is an act passed in 1785, chap. 38, S. 1. by which it is provided, "That upon all bills of exchange hereafter drawn in this state, on any person, corporation, company or society, in any foreign country, and regularly protested, the owner or holder of such bill, or the person or persons, company, society or corporation, entitled to the same, shall have a right to receive and recover so much current money as will purchase a good bill of exchange of the same time of payment, and upon the same place, at the current exchange of such bills, &c.; also, fifteen per cent. damages upon the value of the principal sum mentioned in such bill, and cost of protest, together with legal interest upon the value of the principal sum mentioned in such bill, from the time of protest, until the principal damages are paid and satisfied." The account rendered by the bank (see letter of cashier of the 13th May, 1833, hereto annexed), appears to have been made out according to the provisions of this act, and the question is, whether this bill is embraced by the act of 1785.

The committee are of opinion that a bill of exchange drawn by the United States, is not embraced by this act.

The state is never construed to be included in the general provisions of a statute, unless it is expressly named, or the language of the law, or the nature of its provisions plainly imply, that its enactments were designed to bind the state as well as individuals. A bill of exchange drawn by the state would not have embraced by the act of 1785, already referred to, because the state is not named in the act, and the whole scope and language of the law, shows that its object was to provide for the dealings of individuals, corporations, companies, societies, and not to regulate the action of the government by which it was enacted. The large damages mentioned in the law, are evidently intended for the benefit and convenience of commerce, and to prevent persons from drawing bills on foreign countries, where the drawer had reason to believe they would not be honored. The reason could not apply to the state, and there can be no ground to suppose that the state, in passing this law, intended to inflict upon herself a penalty, if a bill drawn by her should be unexpectedly returned protested. If a bill then drawn by the state of Maryland on a foreign country, and protested, would not have entitled the holder to the 15 per cent. damages against the state under this law, neither can these damages be claimed against the United States, who now stand in the place of Maryland, in that part of the District of Columbia where this bill was drawn. But this bill is not embraced by this law, because a bill drawn by an individual on a foreign government, would not be included by the terms of the law. The language of the law confines its operation to bills drawn on "any person, corporation, company or society, in any foreign country," and these words cannot by any fair rule of interpretation be construed to mean a foreign nation, or to embrace a bill drawn on a foreign government. Neither the drawer nor drawee then, in this case, seem to be embraced within the purview of this law; but if they were, yet this transaction does not seem to be one of the description for which it intended to provide.

A bill of exchange, as known in commerce, is of itself a sufficient authority to the drawee to pay the money, and a proper endorsement on it transfers the right to the endorsee, and the bill and its endorsements do not require the aid of any other instrument to give them force and authority. The endorsement of the bill by the payee, in blank, is of itself sufficient to warrant the payment to the holder. The bill in question is not an instrument of this description; standing by itself it was of no value, and gave no right to the payee or the holder to whom he might endorse it to receive the money. It was deemed necessary by the parties to this transaction, that there should be other and higher authority, in order to enable the bank to receive the money, and this authority accompanied the bill.

This authority was executed by the president of the United States on the same day that the bill was drawn by the secretary of the treasury, under the seal of the United States, and countersigned by the secretary of state, whereby the bill was recognized, and the cashier of the bank (who was the payee), or his assignee of the bill, was authorised to receive the money and to give an acquittance to the French government, and the bill, sustained by this authority, was sold to the bank at the treasury, and the proceeds placed to the credit of the United States on their books. The act of the president under the seal of the United States, which accompanied the bill, was the only instrument which conferred on the bank the right to receive the money, and the only instrument which enabled them to assign their right to receive it. The government and the bank both acted with a full knowledge that the bill itself would be unavailing to accomplish the object in view, and the proper authority in another instrument was executed for that purpose. This was a transaction between governments, and the authority given by the government of the United States to the bank to receive the money from the French government, cannot be regarded in the commercial sense as an ordinary bill of exchange.

By the treaty, the money was to be paid by the French government at Paris, "into the hands of such person or persons as shall be authorised by the government of the United States to receive it." In order, therefore, to obtain the money, it was necessary that a person should present himself at Paris, with the usual testimonials from the government of the United States, of his authority to receive it. And the evidence of his authority, according to the laws which regulate the intercourse between nations, must be furnished by the president of the United States, through the department charged with our foreign relations. This was done in the power executed by the president, before referred to. It was this power, and not the bill, which authorised the demand upon the French government for payment. The bill, without this power, would have been insufficient; but the power without the bill would have been sufficient. If the bill had been presented alone, the French government might have refused to pay, without any violation of its engagements. It was necessary that the person demanding the money from the French government should have authority, accompanied by the customary testimonials in the intercourse between nations, to receive it.

This authority the instrument executed by the president gave, but none such was conferred by the bill alone. In truth, the bill of exchange and the endorsements contributed in no degree to the authority of the holder to demand or receive the money. His right to demand depended upon the formal power executed by the president; and the bank, or its assignee of the bill, became entitled to demand it by virtue of this power, and not by virtue of the bill or the endorsements on it. The bill itself, and the endorsements on it, did nothing more than designate the person whom the government of the United States, by the instrument executed by the president according to the treaty, had authorised to receive it. The government and the bank show, from the instruments executed, that neither of them regarded the bill of the secretary of the treasury as sufficient to authorise the bank or its endorsee to receive the money; for the bill standing alone, had no authentication which would entitle it to be regarded by the French government as sufficient evidence of the authority of the holder to receive the money. The question, then is, did the act of Maryland, of 1785 (under which these damages are claimed) intend to give fifteen per centum damages on an instrument in the form of a bill of exchange, which the parties to it knew had none of its substance and qualities, and upon the authority of which the payee himself did not rely? or did the act mean to give damages on those instruments only which are recognized and known in the commercial world as bills of exchange, and possessing all the qualities of such instruments? The act obviously alludes to the bill itself, and the endorsements on it are sufficient of themselves to convey the right to the holder, and not to instruments in the form of bills, which give no authority, and are merely useful in designating the person on whom another instrument has devolved the power to receive the money. If the power given by the president to the cashier of the bank, or his assignee of that instrument, as the person authorised to receive the amount due to the United States from France, and the bill had been endorsed to different persons, it is very clear that the assignee of the instrument executed by the president, and not the assignee of the bill, would have been entitled to demand the money. The bill of the secretary was therefore one of the forms in which, for the sake of convenience, the government gave its authority to the bank to receive the money, and it is evident, from the papers executed, that the bank, as well as the government, so understood it. The parties to the bill in question, and the bill itself, is not therefore, in the opinion of the committee, such an instrument as the act of Maryland, 1785, contemplated, and that the bank is not entitled, as a mere strict legal right, (independent of the manifest injustice of the demand,) to claim the 15 per cent. damages by virtue of that law. If an instrument, in the shape of a bill of exchange, forming a part of such a transaction as this, between two governments, is not to be regarded as the bill of exchange known in the usage of trade, then the liabilities on bills of exchange will not apply to it, by force of the law which regulates contracts amongst private persons.

The government is ready fully to indemnify the bank against loss in this transaction, and the bank cannot, either in law or justice, demand more. The committee think the bank had forfeited all claims to be any longer trusted with the keeping of the public moneys, and that the secretary would have failed to perform his duty, had he permitted the public moneys longer to remain with the bank.

In his annual message of December, 1829, the president of the United States expressed his doubts of the constitutionality and expediency of the bank of the United States. This part of the message was referred to the committee on finance in the senate, and to the committee of ways and means in the house of representatives; both of which made reports in favor of the bank, which were ordered to be printed by congress. It appears that the bank, not content with the circulation of these imposing documents, through extra copies printed at the public expense, through the newspapers, and all the usual channels of communication to the people, applied its corporate funds, and exerted its corporate power, to multiply and circulate them through pamphlets and extra newspapers into every part of the union.

In November, 1830, an article on banks and currency, exhibiting great research and much talent, appeared in the American Quarterly Review, which was by the president of the bank submitted to the board of directors, with a suggestion as to the "expediency of making the views of the author more extensively known to the public than they can be through the means of the subscription lists." The board, therefore, adopted the following resolution, viz: "Resolved, That the president be authorised to take such measures in regard to the circulation of the contents of an article on banks and currency, published in the American Quarterly Review, either in whole or in part, as he may deem most expedient for the interests of the bank." Here was no limit to the president's discretion, or the amount which he was authorised to expend. His power was very extensively exerted.

In his annual message of December, 1830, the president reiterated the opinion previously expressed by him in relation to the bank of the United States. The subject was not agitated in congress at that session, and that body adjourned on the 3d March, 1831. The subsequent session of congress was necessarily to be the long session, immediately preceding the presidential election. On the 11th March, 1831, a resolution was adopted by the bank, as reported to the president of the United States by the government directors, authorising the president of the bank to cause to be prepared "and circulated, such documents and papers as may communicate to the people information in regard to the nature and operations of the bank." By this resolution, the president was authorized, not to cause specific papers to be printed and circulated as before, but power was conferred upon him to hire writers, for the purpose of preparing documents and papers, without designation as to their character or numbers, to employ printers to print them, and carriers to distribute them. Neither was there any restriction as to the amount of funds which he was authorized to employ in carrying into effect this new system for disseminating information among the people. A short time after the passage of this resolution, conferring upon the president of the bank such extraordinary and unusual powers over the funds of the bank, a negotiation commenced, (as appears by the evidence accompanying the report of the investigating committee in 1833), in relation to a press in New York, in the progress of which the president of the bank, on the 26th day of March, 1831, advanced $15,000, which was not entered on the books of the bank as a loan until January 2d, 1832. The paper which had before that time been decidedly opposed to the bank, immediately became its advocate; and in a few months, the notes discounted for its benefit amounted to $52,975, and at periods of from six months to five years, the last of which did not fall due until the year 1836, and several months after the bank charter would expire. These were credits altogether unusual in the regular business of banks. About the same period large sums were advanced to editors of political papers in other parts of the union. During this period a most unprecedented extension of loans was granted by the bank. For some years, its loans had not varied much in the aggregate from forty millions of dollars. In October, 1830, they amounted to $49,527,523. From that time they began rapidly to extend, and on the 1st of May, 1832, amounted to $70,428,007. In eighteen months the extension was near thirty millions, being at the rate of about two millions per month.

Whilst these accommodations to editors, and this great extension of its loans, were in progress, the bank in December, 1831, applied for a renewal of its charter, which then had upwards of four years to run. A bill to renew it passed both houses of congress, was presented to the president of the United States, and on the 4th of July, 1832, received his veto.

The president was then a candidate for re-election, and that question was to be settled in November of that year. The power given to the president of the bank by the resolution of the 11th March, 1831, was during that and the succeeding year exerted with great industry. The fact of the existence of this resolution, and the expenditures under it, came to the knowledge of the president for the first time, through the report of the government directors, during the last summer. From that report it appears, that for the last half of 1829 these expenditures were $3,765 94, giving as an average for the year $7,531 88. In 1830 they increased to $14,081 47, about $7,000 of which were "for printing and distributing the report of the committee of ways and means, and Mr. Gallatin's pamphlets." In 1831 they increased to $43,304 79, and in 1832, they were $38,667 88, of which $25,543 72 were incurred in the last half year, including the general election; so that these expenditures continued to increase from 1829 up to the presidential election.

So far as communicated by the government directors, the documents and papers printed and distributed with this money, appear to have been chiefly reports of committees in congress, and speeches of members friendly to the bank, and generally opposed to the president; extra newspapers containing similar matter, and other electioneering matter calculated to defeat the election of the president; reviews of speeches and of the veto prepared with the same object; addresses to state legislatures, and editorial articles in favor of the bank.

It is further stated by the government directors, that for about $24,000 of the expenditures, no vouchers whatsoever had been rendered. The several sums were paid on the orders of the president of the bank, referring to the resolution of 11th March, 1831, as his authority to make the expenditures, but not stating the persons to whom they were paid, or the purposes for which they were expended. Nor does it appear that the board of directors, or any committee of the board, or any other person, except the president of the bank and the parties receiving the money, passed upon the claims, or know for what object this large expenditure was incurred. As the government is the owner of the fifth of the capital stock of the bank, one fifth of this unwarrantable expenditure was the money of the people.

In this narrative of facts are found ample reasons to justify the secretary in the removal of the deposits. It seems impossible to resist the conviction, that from 1829 down to November, 1832, the bank was managed with reference to the presidential election; that all its mighty means and power were exerted to influence and control the people in the exercise of their right of suffrage, and secure a recharter, by filling congress and the executive offices with its friends and supporters. It was said by a wise man of antiquity, "that the borrower is the servant of the lender"—and with equal truth it has been recently asserted, that "he who controls a bank, controls the debtors of that bank." No adequate motive can be conceived for the unprecedented extension of the business of the bank from forty to seventy millions of dollars in eighteen months, but a determination to make as many debtors to the bank as possible, and thus bring multitudes of men under its control. Through the fear of being pressed too severely for repayment it might have been reasonably expected that most of these debtors, and the friends they could influence, would support the bank in a struggle for a recharter. While this process of extension was going on, numerous editors of political papers appear to have received large sums of the bank's money, and were thus prepared to advocate measures or men, as the ultimate interests or views of that institution or its managers might indicate or require. Contemporaneously the funds of the bank were put at the disposal of its president, to be used without limit, and their expenditure sanctioned without vouchers, as a means of accomplishing the great design.

Connected with these operations was the conduct of the bank during the same period, in the three per cent. transaction, examined by a committee of congress. Last year, whereby the bank attempted to baffle the government in its efforts to pay the public debt, and secretly sought the aid of foreign bankers to influence its means to control the government. "In addition to its faithlessness to the government, the bank seems to have formed a foreign alliance, and procured foreign aid, in its war with the president of the people. The three per cent. transaction was condemned by the committee of ways and means last year, as already stated, and the pretences on which it sought to be justified, declared to be unfounded. Of itself, it would have justified a removal of the deposits; but it seems to have been but an incident in a grand scheme, to make our whole people and their government subservient to this moneyed incorporation. A scheme, which, if successful, would have left us but the name of a republic.

But the bank was not content to submit to its fate and execute its duties as a faithful agent of the government, when, with all its debtors, its presses, its advocates, its foreign aid, hired writers, and extra documents, it received the decisive rebuke of the American people in the result of the presidential election. During the last summer, one of the government directors, by being placed on the dividend committee, a temporary body appointed every six months to ascertain what dividend shall be declared, discovered in the expense account of the bank, some of those items for printing which have since been reported. On consulting his colleagues, the other government directors, they deemed it their duty to inspect that account. Having done so, and found that it gave no definite information relative to large portions of the expenditure, they brought the subject before the board, for the purpose of obtaining more certain information and rescinding the resolutions under which it had been incurred. Not only did the board refuse to cause the account to be stated with such precision that it could be understood, and to rescind the resolutions of the 30th of November, 1830, and March 11th, 1831, but, instead thereof, resolved as follows, viz:

"That the board have confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the president and in the propriety of the resolutions of 30th November, 1830, and 11th March, 1831, and entertain a full conviction of the necessity of the renewed attention to the object of those resolutions; and that the president be authorized and requested to continue his exertions for the promotion of that object."

This was the formal sanction of the board given to the acts of their president under their former resolutions, and he was stimulated to renewed vigilance in employing writers and presses to influence the public mind. Thus, expressly did they approve of the expenditure of the $24,000, without vouchers, and promise to their president future immunity and irresponsibility for the use of any larger sum.

Corporations have no powers but such as are granted in their charters, and those necessarily incidental. As an incident, the bank of the United States has an unquestionable right to procure and pay for bank notes, the necessary blanks and such other papers as are requisite in the transaction of all business which it may be expressly authorized to perform by its charter. When it proceeds further, and prints documents, speeches, handbills or newspapers, it transcends the power granted to it. The bank of the United States was not created "to communicate to the people information in regard to" its own "nature and operation" or the acts of their chosen rulers. The people supposed they understood its "nature and operation" before they gave it existence, and they tolerated its establishment as a servant, and not as a teacher. Few would have been found to advocate its creation, if it had been a provision of its charter that it might apply its corporate funds to the printing and circulation of such congressional reports, speeches and other political documents, as its managers might deem useful in conciliating public opinion to its management, and circulating denunciations against the constituted authorities for their official acts. Certainly no friend or enemy of the bank at that time conceived that the bank had a right to employ its corporate funds for the purpose of teaching the people how to estimate the acts of their representatives, in either the executive or legislative branches of the government. The idea that such a right was veiled under the charter, or any of its provisions, would have been fatal to its passage. Is it less alarming that it has now usurped the right?

The conduct of the bank, in this respect, has been attempted to be justified on the ground of self defence. The error in this point consists in considering the bank and its managers as identical. The bank has not been attacked. The president of the U. States, in his messages to congress, has expressed his opinion that the charter ought not to be renewed, and has put his constitutional veto on a bill passed by congress for that purpose. But this was no attack upon the corporation, for, to a renewal of its charter it had no legal right. None of the chartered rights of the bank have been wrested from it; no judicial process has been instituted to vacate its charter. When such attacks are made, no man will complain of the bank for defending itself in the courts by the employment of counsel, and paying their fees out of the corporate funds. But the president and directors of the bank have no right to use the funds of the institution in making publications vindicatory of their own management, or tending to show that the president of the United States has been guilty of usurpation of power, or dereliction of duty in refusing his assent to a renewal of its charter. These are matters which belong to the forum of the public; into the discussion of which the managers of the bank, in common with other citizens, had a right to enter, not in their corporate, but in their individual capacities, and at their own expense. The managers of the bank, if assailed for misconduct, may, like every other citizen or officer of the government, defend themselves, but not by the use of the corporate funds or power. They may expend their own money without limit, in employing writers and presses to defend them.

What would be said of the president of the United States if he were to expend the money in the treasury in printing congressional reports, and speeches, hiring writers, employing editors, printers and distributors, for the purpose of defending himself and the executive officers against attacks made upon them from sources official and unofficial? If he were to request congress to put the whole deposits of the treasury at his disposition, for such a purpose, how would it be received? If the senate and house of representatives were to employ their contingent fund in printing and circulating speeches of members, and articles prepared by hired writers, paid from the same fund, under pretence of defending the members of the house against the attacks daily made upon them, would it be tolerated by the American people?

The committee consider this delegation of unlimited and irresponsible power to the president of the bank over the whole funds of the institution, the most atrocious violation of the bank charter, and the most daring abuse of its power, which has hitherto been disclosed.

It is sufficiently alarming that the government directors have been deprived of all participation in the principal business of the bank—that its most important discounts and other business are managed by committees selected by the president, who seldom report—that the restrictive provisions of the charter have been subverted by arbitrary rules, and responsibility to the government, which owns a fifth part of its stock, in effect destroyed.

But, in addition to all this, here is a discretionary power vested in the president of the bank alone, to be exercised without the responsibility of rendering specific accounts, or vouchers, under which he may apply hundreds of thousands and millions to operate on public opinion, and through the prostration of enemies, and the advancement of friends, procure a new charter. In causing to be prepared and circulated such documents and papers as come within the scope of the authority vested in him, he may hire editors, and set up newspapers throughout the whole union, and by the use of unlimited sums of money, without appropriation or accountability, he may distribute a patronage more potent than that of many governments, because all wielded by the same hand, to secure a single object.

When the government directors, as faithful sentinels over the public interest in the bank, communicated the fact that this power had not only been assumed by the bank, but that its managers were determined that it should be wielded with renewed energy, and for an indefinite period, the secretary of the treasury was fully justified for this reason, if there had been no other, in severing its connexion with the government, and, as far as he legitimately could, lessening its power.

It will be seen by the views already taken by the committee, that in their opinion, the deposits have been lawfully removed from the bank of the United States, and the money now in the treasury has been legally deposited in the state banks.

In these circumstances, it remains to be considered, whether any, and if any, what legislation is necessary, in consequence of the change of the deposits.

It is the opinion of the committee that the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered. The constitutional objections to it are, in their judgment, insuperable; and if its charter could be justified by the constitution, recent events have demonstrated that the continued existence of such a vast concentrated money power, must prove dangerous to the freedom and purity of our institutions.

And after the great abuses of which it has been guilty, a recharter, under any modifications, would be offering the high legislative sanction and approbation of congress, to the various acts of misconduct detailed in this and former reports to congress. It is impossible that a corporation, which is proved to have used its money to corrupt the press, to influence elections, and control the government, can ever be selected as the peculiar object of the favor and bounty of the government. The bank ought not therefore to be rechartered on any terms. And as the charter ought not to be renewed, it is manifest that the deposits ought not to be restored to it. For, setting aside the various acts of misconduct, by which the present corporation has justly forfeited the public confidence, it is obvious that the restoration of the deposits to the present bank, to be removed again in two years, would produce nothing but the most serious evil and distress to the country, without any possible advantage. The restoration of the deposits and the recharter of the bank, are, in the judgment of the committee, inseparably connected together, and neither can with any propriety be adopted without the other.

The question then arises, whether the state banks should be continued as the fiscal agents of the government.

The committee are satisfied that the state banks are fully competent to perform all the services which the general government ought to require, in the collection and disbursement of the revenue; and to afford also all the facilities to the internal commerce and exchanges of the country, which have been derived from the bank of the United States.

The collection and disbursement of the public revenue may be safely placed where the ages who framed the constitution left it. They did not deem a national bank essential, either to the government they were forming, or to the successful administration of its finances. The opinion has already been expressed, that the state banks are competent to perform all the duties which the government or the public convenience may require. And there are many circumstances which strongly recommend them to a preference over the bank of the United States. No one of them can exercise a general control over all the others, and expand and contract the whole currency of the country at its pleasure, to favor the private speculations of individuals, or to increase its own profits. And they can never combine together for political objects, nor how to gain possession of the government, and control its operations. The state banks are now firmly interwoven with the institutions of the country. They are generally under the management of citizens as respectable, as trustworthy, as any directors of the bank of the United States. And it would be unjust, and contrary to the spirit of our institutions, for congress to sustain a great moneyed power to overawe and oppress them, and bring ruin upon multitudes of our citizens, whenever cupidity or ambition shall tempt them to exercise their power. The stock of the bank of the United States has fallen for the most part into the hands of the great capitalists of this and foreign countries, who have but little sympathy for the suffering of our people, when their own sordid or ambitious views makes it their interest to inflict it.

If it should be urged as an objection to the state banks, that they cannot afford a general currency, the answer is obvious. If it were necessary to create a paper currency, possessing equal credit with that of the present bank of the United States, the object can be as well accomplished with the state banks, as with the bank of the United States. The provision which has made the latter current every where, is the clause in the charter which compels the government to receive their notes in payment of all debts due to the public, and a similar provision in favor of the money of the United States, would immediately make their notes equally current, and ensure for them equal confidence in any part of the United States.

But the committee are not prepared to recommend the adoption of such a measure. They are convinced that all which public convenience requires, in this respect, will soon be accomplished by arrangements among the banks themselves; and that there ought to be no legislation of congress for the purpose of establishing a currency of paper.

The main object of legislation should be, to enlarge the basis of specie, on which the paper circulation of the state banks is to depend for support. And the committee are persuaded, that by the adoption of the state banks as the fiscal agents of the general government, and a judicious course of legislation founded upon it, that a sounder state of the currency than now exists would soon be attained, and the country rescued permanently from the danger of those sudden expansions and contractions of the paper currency which have been constantly succeeding each other, since the bank of the United States was established, which have brought such severe and extensive evils upon the country. The aid and co-operation of the several states may be relied on, to banish gradually the smaller notes, and introduce in their place silver and gold, for ordinary domestic purposes, and the convenience of travel between distant places. Such a reform is strongly called for by sound policy, and the best interests of the country, and the accomplishment of an object so desirable, may be mainly accelerated by laws passed by congress, adjusting the standard of value of our coins, and regulating the deposits and collection of the revenue. If gold and silver were brought into common use, and the small notes banished from circulation, payments of small sums would probably be made in specie. The great object is not to diminish the amount of the ordinary circulating medium, but to give it a broader and firmer foundation on the precious metals.

With these views, the committee are of opinion that the state banks ought to be continued as the depositories of the money of the United States, and that measures ought forthwith to be taken, to regulate by law the manner in which they shall be selected, and to ensure the safety of the public money.

According to the law, as it now stands, the duty of selecting the banks, and of prescribing the securities to be taken is devolved upon the secretary of the treasury, under the supervision of the president. This power has been heretofore exercised by the head of the treasury department, and in a manner advantageous to the public, and it is not doubted, if the law should continue unchanged, that it may and will continue to be so exercised by the head of that department—yet it is the opinion of the committee, that discretionary power should never be given, in any case, to any officer of the government, where it can be regulated and defined by law. They think that it would be more consistent with the principles of our government, for congress to regulate by law, the mode of selecting the fiscal agents, the securities proper to be taken, the duties they shall be required to perform, and the terms on which they shall be employed.

In accordance with these views they accordingly report for the consideration of the house, resolutions declaring that the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered, and that the state banks ought to continue to be employed as the fiscal agents of the government, under such regulations as congress shall prescribe.

Before they close this report, the committee consider it to be their duty to state, that in their judgment, a necessity exists for an immediate examination into the conduct of the bank, and they proceed to state the grounds which make it absolutely necessary, that a strict and rigorous scrutiny should be instituted. They think such an examination necessary in reference to the security of the interests which the United States as a stockholder have in the bank, as well as to correct as far as practicable, the abuses of which it has been guilty, and to prevent it from using its corporate power and money for purposes of corruption and oppression.

Numerous memorials have been referred to the committee, complaining of embarrassments in mercantile transactions, some attributing them to the removal of the deposits, and others chiefly to the subsequent conduct of the bank of the United States. That serious embarrassments exist in many of the commercial cities, cannot be doubted, and it seems necessary clearly to ascertain the cause before an attempt be made to prescribe the remedy. The powers possessed by the committee are inadequate to that object, and they are unable to do more at present, than to submit the facts which have come to their knowledge, with the course they seem to suggest. That the simple transfer of a sum of money from one bank of deposit to another, could have produced the commercial embarrassments complained of, is impossible. The public deposits have not been annihilated; nor have they been transported from the country; they are still in the country, and in the use of the community.

It is in vain that they look for the cause of embarrassment in the state of our markets, or the operations of trade. Our agricultural productions, and manufactures generally, bear a good price; foreign exchange is at its lowest rate; the balance of trade is decidedly in our favor, and the precious metals are flowing in upon us from South America, Mexico and Europe. None can doubt the power of the bank to create embarrassment whenever its managers deem it expedient. In four months, commencing with August last, and ending with November, it called in $9,707,245 of its loans. As the state banks could not commence extending until they began to receive the public deposits in October, and from that till December could not, in their extension, keep pace with the curtailment of the bank of the United States, it is evident that such rapid curtailment by the bank of the United States must have created some sensation in the commerce of the country. But it is easy for the bank of the United States to produce universal embarrassment, without any aggregate curtailment of its accommodations, by calling in rapidly one month, letting out the next, and calling again during the third; while it loans out in one place what it curtails in another, and in this manner, falls upon all the commercial cities in rotation, it may more effectually embarrass trade than by a steady curtailment. When the policy of the bank is unsteady and capricious, producing a scarcity of money to-day, and an abundance to-morrow, to be succeeded by a greater dearth the next day, it is impossible for merchants to conduct business with safety, and prudent men will restrict or discontinue their operations. The bank has long enjoyed a large portion of the business of domestic exchange, and whenever it chooses to cut off the supply in any or all directions, embarrassment and difficulty naturally ensue.

There is much reason to suspect that the bank has been managed, for the last six months, with a view to embarrass the community, as a means of operating on public opinion, and controlling the action of government.

In the proceedings of the bank, in relation to domestic exchange, as far as known, are perceived indications of a disposition to use the power it possesses through that branch of its business, for the purpose of producing excitement and distress.

The government directors inform us, in their memorial, that on the 13th of August last, two weeks before the treasury agent, returned from his mission to confer with the state banks, and five weeks before the determination of the executive was announced, the board of directors adopted a resolution, declaring:

"That the bills of exchange purchased at the bank, and all the offices, except the five western offices, shall not have more than ninety days to run. That the five western offices be instructed to purchase no bills of exchange, except those payable in the Atlantic cities, not having more than ninety days to run, or those which may be received, in payment of existing debts to the bank and the offices, and then not have more than four months to run."

The government directors inform us, that on a subsequent day, a series of resolutions were adopted for reducing the business of the institution, and authority given to the committee on the offices to modify them at pleasure, and although a strenuous effort was made to require them to report such measures as might be directed by them to the board, the proposition was voted down.

Thus, in direct violation of the charter, and in defiance of all prudence and propriety, was the whole power of this vast and powerful corporation to relieve or to oppress vested in a committee, who are not subject to the responsibility of even making reports to the board of directors. A few irresponsible men, issuing secret orders from their private chamber, possess more power to distress the American people, than any department of their government, or all departments, by an act short of a declaration of war. What the resolves and orders of this potent body have been, we have no means of knowing. The president of the bank who is ex officio a member of this committee, and undoubtedly directs its operations, is also clothed with unlimited power to set the press in motion for the purpose of promoting the views of the bank. For months, those presses which are known to have been sustained by enormous loans, and those which have received the most liberal allowances for printing, have been incessantly engaged in an effort to spread alarm and dismay throughout the land. It is impossible not to suspect that the secret management of the bank, and the use of its funds by its president, are in perfect concert with their dependent and devoted presses, all aiming to create a general panic, and produce the same result. That result is the restoration of the deposits, and, its certain consequence, the recharter of the bank.

If any thing was wanting to confirm, these suspicions, the alleged refusal of this bank to co-operate with the state banks in their laudable efforts to relieve the existing pressure upon the community, in the larger commercial cities, is sufficient to remove all doubts from the minds of the most incredulous.

It is due to the country, that the source of the embarrassments which oppress a portion of its commerce shall be laid bare. Should they appear to spring solely from the management of the bank, wantonly and wickedly directed to produce them, it may become the duty of congress to resort to all the means within their constitutional authority to check its career.

If it shall appear that the bank, by means of its money and the papers under its control, has wilfully and intentionally produced these embarrassments; and if its power has thus been abused, it cannot be endured that for two years longer it shall be suffered wantonly to excite alarm in the country, to direct a pressure first on one point and then on another, enlarge at one place and contract in another, for the purpose of continuing to the end of its existence the evils which there is too much reason to believe it has already inflicted on the community. If, upon examination, it shall be found that it has been guilty of such offences, its charter cannot be too soon terminated, and a scire facias would be imperatively demanded to put an end to its machinations against the peace and interests of the people. The government owns seven millions of its stock, equal to one-fifth of the whole amount. It is the duty of congress to see that it be not used to oppress the people and subvert the principles of our government. Of every hundred thousand dollars spent by the president of the bank, or distributed to advocates under the name of loans, and forever lost, $20,000 belong to the people of the United States. That their property may not be wasted, that the cause of their distress may be ascertained and a remedy applied, and above all, that their own funds, and the money and power of this corporation may not be employed to subvert the principles of their government by controlling their elections—the committee deem it necessary, that there should be a thorough investigation into the alleged abuses and corruptions of that institution, and particularly into the details of its management for the last six months. To this end, they propose a resolution to invest a committee of the house with power to make such investigations.

1. Resolved, That the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered.

2. Resolved, That the public deposits ought not to be restored to the bank of the United States.

3. Resolved, That the state banks ought to be continued as the places of deposit of the public money, and that it is expedient for congress to make further provision by law, prescribing the mode of selection, the securities to be taken, and the manner and terms on which they are to be employed.

4. Resolved, That, for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as practicable, the cause of the commercial embarrassment and distress complained of by numerous citizens of the U. States, in sundry memorials which have been presented to congress at the present session, and of inquiring whether the charter of the bank of the United States has been violated; and also, what corruptions and abuses have existed in its management; whether it has used its corporate power or money to control the press, to interfere in politics, or influence elections; and whether it has had any agency, through its management or money, in producing the existing pressure; a select committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the said bank, who shall report whether the provisions of the charter have been violated or not; and also, what abuses, or mal-practices have existed in the management of said bank; and that the said committee be authorised to send for persons and papers, and to summon and examine witnesses, on oath, and to examine into the affairs of the said bank and branches, and that they are further authorised to visit the principal bank, or any of its branches, for the purpose of inspecting the books, correspondence, accounts and other papers connected with its management or business; and that the said committee be required to report the result of such investigation, together with the evidence they may take, at as early a day as practicable.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 4—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, MARCH 22, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,174.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

In our account of the proceedings of congress we are compelled to omit notices of many things which we have been accustomed to record; but this is of less importance than usual—for very few important things will be attended to or fully disposed of, until after the great subjects under discussion are, in some way, put aside.

In conformity with the strict rule of impartiality that we profess, with regard to what may be esteemed personal matters, at least, we have made room for the letter of Mr. Taney, and the address of Mr. McKim, in consequence of certain statements contained in the report of the Baltimore committee, charged with the memorial of the citizens praying for a restoration of the public deposits. We have added the "card" of Mr. George Brown, and shall give the response of the committee, in our next.

The committee have fully replied to Messrs. Taney and McKim, in a well-written address of considerable length, published in yesterday's "Chronicle." It makes three columns; and yet, with an earnest desire to give all the papers belonging to this matter together, it must, therefore, be postponed. We could easily put it into type, but the character of the contents of the present number is such, that, if we excluded every article over which a discretion might be exerted, the room for it could not be obtained. We cannot, as the newspapers may, "make room," for we have no advertisements to lay aside, and so relieve our pages.

The gentlemen reaffirm, in the most decided manner, the strict verity of all that they stated in their report—and of every word used by them. They reject, with much severity, the idea that any part of their report was founded on private or confidential communications with Mr. McKim—saying "they have not stated one word, nor referred, by the remotest allusion, to one expression used by Mr. McKim any where but in their own room," when Mr. McKim paid them a visit, after their call upon him, and remained two hours with them, conversing on the subject of their mission, &c.

We have some later news from Europe. The details are not of much interest—and we can make space only for the British king's speech on opening the session of parliament on the 4th ult.

It will be seen that Mr. Webster was prevented, on Monday last, from presenting his project with relation to the bank, by an extraordinary discussion and proceeding in the senate—but that he offered it on Tuesday. Public opinion seems much divided as to the expediency of this proceeding, at the present moment. Mr. W. however, no doubt, has viewed the whole ground, and thought it best to have some object a-head to aim at. There is a report that Mr. Wilkins will, also, present a plan for a bank, which may have the support of several of the leading friends of the administration in the senate, and it is probable that Mr. Webster's purpose was to draw out one from the other party, by taking his new position. We wish that something could be done to relieve us of the pecuniary embarrassments which beset the people, at large, and almost banish the hope of a reward for labor performed; even the products of the earth, including the most substantial and necessary articles for food and clothing, have fallen 25 per cent. in price, within the last four months. This may help the consumers, but is hard on producers, who have made engagements that were graduated by the higher or general price of their commodities. The diminished money-value of the bread stuffs and meats, or live cattle, cotton, wool and tobacco, is of an enormous amount. Flour at Wheeling has been sold for $2 12½ the barrel, at Alexandria for $3 75. Wheat, at Frederick, Md. 75 cents, and so on. Let us offer a rough statement with relation to this subject.

VOL. XLVI—SRO. 4.

If the general money-value of the bread-stuffs and meats, of all sorts consumed, be equal to only 30 cents per head per week, the aggregate value will amount to 200 millions per annum. Three-fifths of these, perhaps, are consumed by the producers of them, and the market-value of the remainder, at late prices, would be, say

Crop of cotton, at fair prices	$80,000,000
Crop of wool	35,000,000
Crop of tobacco	20,000,000
	8,000,000

If the reduced price is only at the rate of 20 per cent. the money-value lost, in the whole year, would be nearly 30 millions, on these few leading articles, to the growers of them. The consumers would receive the benefit of this, provided the price of wages were kept up, and employment could be obtained. Instead of 30 cents per head, for an example, bread and meat might be had, at the reduction supposed, for 25 cents; but if wages declined from 100 cents a day to 50 cents, or at that rate, the loss to the laborer would be as 300 cents a week, for 5 cents gained, and so on.

The counter report of the minority of the committee of ways and means fills a large portion of the present sheet. Its length, as was the case with the report of the majority, has much interfered with the general business of the week. We hope for a little more variety in our next paper.

The minority in the legislature of Virginia have published a sixteen-column address to the people "on the deposite question, and the present condition of the country." It is signed Joseph S. Watkins, chairman, and Hugh A. Garland, secretary, and earnestly calls upon the citizens of the state not to "desert the present administration," and "betray the best interests of their country"—"commit an act of treason, and deserve the bitter curses of their children," &c. It is a discussion of matters and things in general, but especially about the bank, and the removal of the deposites.

Several extracts from Niles' Register of 1818, are introduced into this address. They consist chiefly of some remarks on a project then supposed to be entertained, of making "a paper currency a legal tender instead of coin"—to relieve the bank of the United States, and certain of the local banks, from the pressure caused by their own imprudent proceedings—and, certainly, never was business more wildly conducted than for some time after the establishment of the bank named, and in various respects, to say nothing of the great speculations in which some persons were engaged, and the frauds in which others soon after involved a considerable number of our banking institutions. To all these things we stood resolutely opposed, and, perhaps, had a degree of influence, (in the freedom with which we spoke of them), to check their progress, and finally to restore the bank to the purposes of its establishment—which was not for the benefit of some twenty or thirty huge speculators, but to furnish the people with a sound and uniform currency; and on that occasion, we said, "Give me to live under any despotism but that which springs from the command of money—for it is the most base and unprincipled of all." We thank the addressers for the honor conferred in quoting us. We took no ground then that we would not take now, in the existence of similar circumstances; but do not perceive how the matters stated in 1818 can be brought to bear upon the real state of things, and actual condition of the currency, at the time of the removal of the deposites, or since—so far as the bank of the U. S. is concerned. Money was abundant, and the bills of that bank better than coin, as exchangeable commodities, because convertible into coin at the will and pleasure of its holder, and prosperity abounded; all the great pursuits of industry, in agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and the mechanic arts, flourished—and the internal trade and business of the whole country was of a mighty and yet “onward” amount—and success in all these kept down the exchanges on Europe to rates that were below real par, though the importations of foreign goods were heavy. But how stands the case now? The “command of money” assumed by the president of the United States, has caused so great a want of paper reducible into coin, (though coin is more abundant than it was in years past), that there is not enough of it in circulation to perform the ordinary business of the people, and the banks hold fast to the coin which they have to save themselves, if it be possible, in the ruin which seemingly impends, through the loss of public confidence and a wide-sweeping bankruptcy; and the demand for labor is immeasurably diminished, in the uncertainty of a reward for it. Bills on Europe, too, are much lower than they were a few months ago, being really nine or ten per cent. below par, not from the successful industry of the American people, but in the want of it, and the severity of the demand for money, not for new enterprises, but to fulfil old engagements—hence there is a depreciation of the value of property, and a state of embarrassment, which causes some men (though not yet consenting to make paper a “legal tender”) to be nearly prepared, in the desperation of circumstances, to desire a suspension of specie payments by the banks.* This is a fearful state of things, but not the most fearful that others apprehend will, or may, ensue before the close of the present year—if present projects are persevered in.

What we said in 1818 we say still. We still fear the command of money as the most dangerous of all despotisms. The bank, as we believed, attempted this despotism—but failed; and a reformation was effected. Since then all has been peace and quietness, and the currency remained as steady as it was possible to keep it—for, on account of high or low prices of commodities, of excessive importations, and, for many other reasons, there must needs be occasional contractions and expansions; and, perhaps, no better evidence can be offered of the good conduct of the bank than the good will of nearly all the local institutions, though rivals in the business of money lending. Yet the bank had the “command of money”—a dangerous command, which we would not continue, nor is it probable that the bank itself wishes it, to the extent given in the present charter. But what is the new “command of money” doing? The power which laid dormant in the directors of the bank, has been grasped and used by the president, “on his own responsibility,” and the effect is the misery of which the people now so generally complain, and the losses which they are daily sustaining. The price, as above stated, of necessities has suddenly fallen from 20 to 25 per cent. and many hundred persons who were solvent, and, indeed, some of them rich, at this time last year, have become bankrupts, in a presidential exertion in the “command of money.” The power to do this is that which was and ought to be feared in the bank; but is not the less grievous when exercised by “the government.” The principle is the same—the effect the same. And a retracing of false steps, as to the “command of money,” is just as necessary now by the president, in our opinion, as it was by the bank in 1818. The withdrawal of the public deposits, with respect to their amount, is a matter of small consideration. The bank has made many times more heavy payments, on account of the United States, in the same period of time, and without any material derangement of business, unless for a short season; but it is the general want of confidence thereby produced, and the absolute necessity cast upon the bank to preserve itself against the “command of money” in the hands of “the government,” which forbids its heretofore confident operations, and keeps the local banks, also, continually on the “look-out for squalls!” Had the bank been permitted quietly to die a natural death, it is our serious belief that not a tith of the present evils, or those which are expected, would have ensued; for the bank, though not able to obtain the favor of the government in a renewal of its charter, would not have apprehended the hostility of “the government” in measures adopted to wind up its affairs. It is the abominable of this business, that transient political party has entered into the consideration of matters so important as the currency of the country.

We have seen accounts since our last publication, of, we think, about one hundred meetings of the people for and against a restoration of the deposits! Most of them will, probably, be briefly noticed in our sketches of the proceedings of congress, and that is all that we can do with them.

It may be mentioned, however, that there has been one great meeting at Albany, at which, it is said, that 3,000 persons were present, against restoring the deposits—and about 3,000 signed a call for a meeting to adopt resolutions in favor of restoring the deposits. [This meeting has been held, and said to have been attended by from 4 to 6,000 persons.]

Monday last was appointed for a meeting of the stockholders of the Girard bank, of Philadelphia, for the purpose of considering the propriety of declining to receive the public deposits. This matter caused a mighty excitement in that city, an immense crowd filled the streets, and the rooms and passages of the bank were crammed with persons, and great confusion ensued; for it was rendered impossible, by the press, for the stockholders themselves to attend to the business about which they had assembled. It appears, however, that each party to the subject passed a set of resolutions—and that each claims the majority! We gather from the proceedings, however, that means have been taken, (by the party in favor of giving up the deposits), to ascertain with whom the majority rests, by receiving the signatures of the stockholders.

There was to have been a general meeting at Philadelphia, on Thursday afternoon last, of those opposed to the removal of the public deposits, at which the different classes of persons and trades, were to appear with their badges and banners—and the papers have been filled with notices of the preparations making or made for this assembly. It is probable that we may be enabled to add a few lines, if the mail arrives in season.

The Delaware committee made a report of their proceedings, with an account of their interview with the president, &c. to a meeting of the people of New Castle county, on Saturday last.

Sales of 170 shares of U. S. bank stock, at New York stock exchange on Tuesday last, 105@105½.

There are many rumors as to the substance of the message of the president on a renomination to the senate of certain gentlemen for directors of the bank. It is said to contain a declaration that he will name no others—and added, that an appeal from the senate to the people will or may be made. We hope this is a mistake. It relates to a matter in which the senate has a perfectly concurrent right and power with the president—standing, indeed, in a more lofty position than the executive itself. The nominations of the president generally are, as they ought to be, treated with the greatest respect; but so should also the disapprovals of the senate. In such things it is not easy to believe that the latter has acted on what may be called party grounds. For a striking example, Mr. Henshaw, the collector at Boston, a gentleman remarkable for his party zeal, but who is reported an excellent officer, received every vote of the senate on his nomination for reappointment. A majority of the senate believes that the late “government directors” of the bank are enemies of the bank—committed, in fact, to carry on a war against an institution in which seven millions of the money of the United States are invested—and the fitness of the gentlemen, surely, the senate may and should be careful to ascertain. Mr. Bayard, though as decided a friend of the administration as either of those renominated, was promptly approved by the senate; and so would others, we presume, if well known as opposed to a renewal of the charter of the bank, but untrammelled by former proceedings.

*This, indeed, has been broadly thrown out, as to the safety fund banks of New York—and the authority of the legislature invoked to sustain the proceeding, “to uphold the president and crush the monster!”

The legislatures of Maryland, Virginia and Ohio, have recently adjourned—the house of delegates, of the former, 38 to 36, passed certain resolutions approbatory of the removal of the public deposits. William Badger ["Jackson"] has been elected governor of N. Hampshire, without opposition. The charter, or town elections, in N. York are contesting with unusual activity. The array of the contending parties in Virginia is more resolute than it has been for many years, each party seems sanguine of success, and both have addressed the people at much length.

The "National Intelligencer" of Thursday last contains the speech of Mr. Adams, on presenting the resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts, and Mr. Polk's in reply; Mr. Lincoln's speech on presenting the memorial of Worcester county, signed by 6,207 of his fellow citizens, praying for a restoration of the deposits, &c. Mr. H. Everett's when presenting like resolutions of a county meeting held at Woodstock, Vt. and Mr. Tomlinson's, in the senate, introductory to a memorial of the people of Bridgeport, Con. signed by 380 legal voters of that town, which contains but a few more than 400, in all.

In ordinary times, all of these speeches would have been registered—but they cannot now be, by us. Mr. Polk undertook to lecture Mr. Adams because of the freedom of his remarks when commenting upon the resolves of Massachusetts, which produced from the latter the following very severe remarks and quotation:

After Mr. P. had concluded—

Mr. Adams requested Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, who claimed the floor, to indulge him merely to say, that he had no reply to make to Mr. Polk; adding, I shall never be disposed to interfere with any member who shall rise on this floor and pronounce a panegyric upon the chief magistrate.

"No! LET the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where TURF may follow lawning!"

J. W. Bouldin has been elected to congress from the Charlotte district, Va. as the successor of his late brother judge Bouldin. It is a curious circumstance, that his competitor was B. Tucker, half-brother of John Randolph, who was judge Bouldin's predecessor in the same seat. This is the third election, held in that district for the same session of congress. J. W. B. is friendly to the administration, and against the bank.

We have a list of the United States custom house officers at New York, and of the corporation officers of that city, with the amount of the compensation received by each person. The number of the first is 923, the amount of their compensation 340,000 dollars! The number of the second is 171, and, including the watchmen, 719, and the amount of their compensation 248,337 dollars—together 1,042 persons, and 588,337 dollars; and the corporation officers, besides, disburse very large sums, and have many hundred persons in constant employment. When we get a table also of the state and other officers of the United States in that city, we may present a view of the whole together.

We are not "panic makers"—but duty requires us to say, there are strong reports that two of the deposit banks in the south had stopped payment—in one of which "the government" had about a million of dollars.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

March 14. Mr. Wright presented the proceedings of a meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Brooklyn, N. Y. and also a memorial on the same subject from the same town, approving the removal of the deposits, and pronouncing the chartering of a national bank unconstitutional, &c.

Mr. Prentiss presented the proceedings and memorial of a convention of delegates from the several towns and counties of the state of Vermont, disapproving the removal of the public deposits and praying a restoration thereof to the bank of the United States.

Mr. McKean presented the proceedings of a large meeting held in the city and county of Philadelphia, approving the action of the executive government in reference to the removal of the public deposits. [The matters stated in the three preceding items, were read, and referred and ordered to be printed.]

Mr. Pointexter reported a bill prescribing the manner and time of advertising the sales of the public lands; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Pointexter gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a resolution authorizing the committee on public lands to employ a clerk to take down the testimony of witnesses summoned to appear before said committee, touching the alleged frauds in the sales of public lands.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the special order of the day, but the secretary of the treasury's reasons, &c. for the removal of the deposits, when

Mr. Tallmadge resumed his speech, but before he concluded, he gave way to a motion to adjourn—and the senate adjourned to Monday.

March 17. The vice president submitted certain resolutions adopted by a portion of the people of Shanandoah county, Virginia, in support of the removal of the deposits—whereupon Mr. Tyler rose, and, after professing his willingness to bring to the knowledge of the senate the sentiments and feelings of any part of the people of his state, he spoke in terms of lofty praise of the good character of the citizens of Shanandoah—but expressed a belief, that, if the people of that "republican county" had had the same light on the subject as he himself possessed, there would not have been any difference of opinion between them and himself.

The chair communicated a paper containing the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting of citizens of York county, Pennsylvania, friends of the administration, in favor of the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States, and against the recharter of that institution; and, it having been read—

Mr. Wilkins moved that it be referred to the committee on finance and printed.

This matter produced a debate which lasted all day—in which a majority of the senate took part. We cannot do more than briefly notice its cause, and shew a few of the principal points made or referred to.

The proceedings first mentioned contained several offensive parts. Of the nature of the aspersions which it casts upon members of congress, some judgment may be formed from the following extract from what it contains concerning one of them:

"One word in conclusion: Daniel Webster, how a senator and a champion of the bank was, at its creation, a member of the house of representatives. Then the bank was not his client, and he was opposed to it. His unbiassed opinion, as a representative of the people, was in direct opposition to what he now holds; but now he is 'concerned for the bank;' (in legal phraseology), and no doubt finds it a good fat client, as it has already disposed of more than fifty thousand dollars in the shape of fees. In 1816, he was alarmed at the dangerous powers such an institution could make its own, and he raised his voice for a sounder currency than mere promises to pay, with nothing wherewith to fulfil such promises. He then said, 'gold and silver currency was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad, and that, in the present state of the world, there could be no other currency.'"

Before presenting the paper, the vice president directed the attention of Mr. Wilkins to the preceding and other objectionable passages, and the latter was ready to take the responsibility of striking them out, to which also Mr. McKean, with indifference as to the subject, assented—and they were so marked as not to be read by the secretary to the senate. After the reading, Mr. Webster rose and stated that he had been advised of the character of these proceedings, which he stated, on the information of persons of the highest respectability, some of whom he named, had been issued by the minority of the meeting held in York, and he offered a protest against them which had been sent to him; he also read a letter from York which concluded with saying "there are enough administration men who have changed to revolutionize this state—if they will stay changed."

After the names attached to the resolutions had been read, Mr. Preston asked "how came this paper before the senate?" The vice president answered that he had received it in a letter addressed to himself, which was read; and in explanation, the vice president stated the facts as to the suppression of the exceptionable paragraphs, as briefly noticed above. Mr. Preston then asked—Did the chair mean to state that the obliteration took place after the paper was in the possession of the senate, and that it was done with the knowledge of the vice president? To which the chair assented.

After some further remarks of Mr. Webster, in which he said that he had felt it his duty to notice this "miserable statement," though for himself he would rather have permitted such idle and ridiculous scandal to have passed unnoticed by him—

Mr. Preston rose, and warmly denied the right of any person to alter or mutilate a petition—the right to petition being a sacred one—and he protested against the alteration made after this paper was in the custody of an officer of that house. Mr. Wilkins explained the part that he had taken in this matter. It was obvious, he said, on the face of the fact, that the striking out matter which was individually offensive to a member of the senate, could not have proceeded from any improper motive; and it did not change, in any essential point, what the people of York had presented; and he added that there was another paragraph in the proceedings which ought not to be there. He then spoke of the protest against the proceedings of the meeting, and made light of it, and concluded by saying—"As to the erasure, it might have been unjustifiable, as he had before said, but it was made entirely out of delicacy to the member assailed. If this motive was not sufficient to justify the act, it ought, at least, to excuse it."

Mr. Preston replied, and insisted that the mutilation of the paper had changed its character—and that it was wrong, because that paper was in the possession of an officer of the house—individual signers might do what an officer should not do, &c. Mr. Clay followed, and said that the conclusion of Mr. P. was a just one—it was evident that if a right existed in an officer to make an erasure, there was also a right of insertion; and he asserted that the paper had lost its "identity"—it was not "a genuine document." After he had concluded, the vice president stated the question, "shall the petition be received?" and a long debate followed, the various questions raised being discussed by Messrs. Kane, King, of Geo., Preston, Wright, Leigh, Bibb, Poindester, Mangum, McKean, Black, Callhoun, Clayton, Webster, Forsyth, Brown, Sprague, and the chair. The debate lasted until half past 5 o'clock, and was listened to by one of the most closely packed auditories that ever filled the galleries of the senate. Finally—the senate refused to receive the communication* presented by the chair, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Ala., King, of Geo., Linn, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Robinson, Shingley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Callhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Leigh, Moore, Naudkin, Poindester, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster—21.

The senate then, soon after adjourned.

March 18. After other proceedings—Mr. Webster rose and presented a protest against the recent measures of the executive in the removal of the deposits, &c. signed by 6,841 voters and tax-payers of Boston, which had just been brought to the seat of the national government by a most respectable committee. Mr. W. proceeded, at length, to shew the character of the signers, and referred, with much force and beauty, to times long past, and he commented on the proceedings of the executive at much length and with great freedom. We can only make room for the following paragraphs:

"They thought that the effect of the measure was to produce, to augment, the rapidity of certain tendencies which they believed had attended the government for some years past, and that was the tendency to increase power and influence in the executive hands. They were of opinion, that the subtraction of the public revenue from a custody where it was under the eye of congress—to a custody where it was only under the eye of the secretary of the treasury, was one great proof of the existence of that tendency to increase power. Were they not right? Where were the public treasures of the United States? No man in that senate knew; no man in the other house knew. The last time that the senate had heard of them they were deposited in certain banks not created or fixed by its will. They might be changed, for aught the senate knew, within the last half hour, to some other place, which it knew not. What was (said Mr. W.) the condition of the treasury six months ago? Was it situated as it is now? Did not every member know where the money was then?—and had not congress an account of it, and could see that it was all there? Had congress any such right now? Had that house, or the other, the power to go to the bank of the Metropolis, or to the Manhattan bank, in order to see that the money deposited in these places was safe? The executive had now the preservation of the public treasure, and congress had no control over it.

"It was a fact not to be denied, that every dollar of the public money—ordinarily eight or ten millions—between the moment of its receipt at the custom house and the land offices—from the moment of its appropriation under the authority of law, was under the entire, exclusive government of the secretary of the treasury—congress knew not where—congress declared not how."

He was followed by Mr. Silsbee who made a few remarks on the competency of the signers to form correct opinions on the subjects presented by them; and Mr. Sprague, more at length, bore a like testimony, and with reference to Boston, said—

"It was from the same source; it was under the same roof, as has been so well remarked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that memorials, protests and petitions, were transmitted to the British parliament. Those memorials, protests and petitions, denounced, at that time, an act of political power, seizing their money without the consent of either themselves or their representatives. The descendants of those people come now, and protest against an act of political power, also seizing their money without their consent, or the consent of their representatives. The memorials, protests and petitions sent to the British parliament were contemned. He trusted that a different fate awaited those which were now sent to congress. The memorialists had come hither because they thought that they lived, or ought to live, under a government of laws. They have come here with faith in law, and in the national legislature, and ask for relief and for redress.

"It has been remarked, that they did not go to the executive mansion, they did not pass by the halls of congress, to lay their complaints at the feet of the executive. They believed that the executive had no right to interfere: and the manner in which the other committees who had come hither, were treated by the chief magistrate, had prevented them from exposing themselves to similar treatment. Their behaviour to the chief magistrate in the city of Boston, shows that they know how to respect the official dignitaries of the county: their refusal now to go to him, shows that they know how to respect themselves."

The memorial was then read, and referred to the committee on finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster then rose to introduce the bill, of which he had given notice, and which is as follows: A bill to continue for the term of six years, the act entitled "an act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c. That the act entitled "an act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States," approved on the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, shall continue in full force and effect for the term of six years, from and after the period therein limited for its expiration, to wit: the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six; and that all the rights, interests, properties, powers and privileges secured by the same act, with all the rules, conditions, restrictions and duties therein prescribed and imposed, be and remain after the said third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, during the said six years, as if the said limitation in the said act, had not been made; provided, nevertheless, that so much of the said act as declares that no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States, during the continuance of the corporation thereby created, shall not be continued by this act; but that it shall be lawful for congress, whenever it shall see fit, to establish any other bank, to come into existence and operation at any time, on or after the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all the public moneys accruing to the United States, and becoming payable from and after the passage of this act, in places where the said bank, or any of its offices, is established, shall be deposited in the bank of the United States and its offices as heretofore; provided, That, at any time after this act shall have been accepted, congress may, by law or joint resolution, cause such moneys to be withdrawn and removed to any other custody or place of deposits.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in consideration of the benefits and privileges conferred by this act, the said bank shall pay to the United States the annuity or yearly sum of two hundred thousand dollars, which said sum shall be paid, by the said bank, on the 4th day of March, in each and every year, during the said term of six years.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That congress may provide by law, that the said bank shall be restrained at any time after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, from making, issuing or keeping in circulation, any notes or bills of said bank, or any of its offices, of a less sum or denomination than twenty dollars.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, any time or times within the last three years of the existence of said corporation, as continued by this act, it shall be lawful for the president and directors to divide among the several stockholders thereof, such portions of the capital stock of the said corporation as they may have withdrawn from active use, and may judge proper so to divide.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act or acts of congress, heretofore passed and now in force, supplementary to, or in any wise connected with, the said original act of incorporation, approved on the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, as is not inconsistent with this act, shall be continued in full force and effect during the said six years, after the third day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the said bank, on or before the first day of the next session of congress, to signify to the president of the United States their acceptance, on behalf of the bank of the United States, of the terms and conditions in this act contained, and if they shall fail to do so on or before the day above mentioned, then this act shall cease to be in force.

Previous to the introduction of the bill, Mr. Webster addressed the senate at some length, expounding the situation of the country, the opinions of the committee, and his own views, in the presentation of this measure.

Mr. Leigh then gave the reasons which would compel him to vote against the prolongation of the charter of this bank, or the charter of a new one; at the same time he threw out the idea that a condition of things might be developed which would change both the views of the state of Virginia and his own, on the subject of the bank.

On motion of Mr. Wright, who then expressed a desire to give some views, the senate adjourned.

March 19. Mr. Tomlinson rose and presented the memorial of the merchants, manufacturers and other citizens of the town of Bridgeport, in Connecticut, signed by 380 voters, against the removal of the deposits. Mr. T. stated that there were but 400 legal voters residing in the town; and entered into a very interesting history of the place, and testified in the strongest terms to the high character of the memorialists.

Mr. McKean presented the proceedings and memorial of 700 cabinet makers, piano forte makers and other mechanics of the city of Philadelphia, also opposed to the removal of the deposits.

Mr. Bibb presented similar proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Madison county, Kentucky.

Mr. Waggaman presented the resolutions and memorial of a meeting of the merchants of New Orleans, also opposed to the removal of the deposits.

Mr. Nungun presented a memorial signed by 250 citizens of Plymouth, North Carolina, of a similar character to the above; he stated that the voters of the place were about 450.

All the above memorials, resolutions, &c. were read, referred to the committee on finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Freston reported the bill to increase and regulate the pay of surgeons and assistant surgeons in the army of the U. States, without amendment.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the bill from the house of representatives making appropriations for the support of the army of the U. States, for the year 1834, was taken up, twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. King reported a bill making appropriations for the repairs of the military road to Mars Hill, in Maine, which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The chair then announced the special order of the day, being the unfinished business of yesterday, the bill to continue for a limited time the charter of the bank of the United States.

Mr. Webster said, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. Wright) had expressed a wish to say something on this subject, and as the senator from S. Carolina also wished to say something on it, he would move to lay the bill on the table, and thus give the other senator from New York (Mr. Tallmadge) an opportunity of continuing his remarks on the other special order, the removal of the deposits. He would make this motion now, at the same time giving notice that he would call up the bill at an early hour to-morrow.

The motion was then agreed to.

The chair then announced the second special order, being the report of the committee on finance, and the resolutions offered by Mr. Clay; when—

Mr. Tallmadge resumed his observations commenced last week, in defence of the removal of the deposits, and in vindication of the power exercised by the executive, and continued until near 5 o'clock, when he concluded.

And, on motion of Mr. Clay, the senate adjourned.

March 20. The chair communicated a report from the war department, transmitting copies of the Army Register for 1834.

Various memorials, petitions and reports, were presented and made, on private claims, and referred and disposed of.

On motion of Mr. Webster the senate resumed the consideration of his motion for leave to introduce a bill to continue, for a limited time, the charter of the bank of the United States; when

Mr. Wright, Mr. Webster and Mr. Leigh successively addressed the senate on the subject, and, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 14. Nearly the whole of this day was given up to the consideration of private or local business, and a large number of bills for the relief of individuals were considered, and ordered to be engrossed or passed.

The consideration of the resolution of Mr. Mardis, on the subject of the deposits, being the unfinished business of the morning—

Mr. Burges resumed the course of his remarks in opposition to the resolution, and continued to speak for some time, though in a state of indisposition, when he gave way for a motion to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to to-morrow.

The army appropriation bill was then considered, amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—when the house adjourned.

Saturday, March 15. The resolution of Mr. Mardis respecting the public deposits, was taken up.

The speaker informed the house that he had received a letter from Mr. Burges, stating that he was prevented by indisposition from attending the house to day, and requesting that the consideration on the resolution be postponed till Monday.

On motion of Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, the further consideration of the resolution was postponed till Monday.

The army appropriation bill was read a third time and passed.

The house proceeded to consider a joint resolution for the purchase of certain books, for the use of the new members, the question being on the amendment reported from the committee of the whole, for the purchase of additional copies of Gales & Seaton's debates, which amendment being agreed to, the resolution, as amended, after an animated debate, which lasted till near 4 o'clock, in which several gentlemen took part, was agreed to, and the house adjourned.

Monday, March 17. The consideration of the Virginia resolutions on the removal of the deposits being the unfinished business of the morning, Mr. Pinekey, of S. C. who was entitled to the floor, at the request of Mr. Adams, of Mass. waived his right, in order to allow the presentation of memorials.

Memorials favorable to the restoration of the deposits were then presented by the following persons:

By Mr. Jarvis, of Maine, from inhabitants of Eastport; by Mr. Swans, from inhabitants of Lubec, Maine; by Mr. Gorkham, from nearly 7,000 citizens of Boston, all of them voters in that city; by Mr. Lincoln, from 6,207 citizens of Worcester, Mass.; by Mr. Everett, of Vermont, from delegates from all the towns of Windham county in that state; and by Mr. Fillmore, from 729 citizens of Buffalo, New York, all praying for a restoration of the deposits, which were severally read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the committee of ways and means. Mr. Adams presented the resolutions of the Massachusetts legislature, also disapproving of the removal of the deposits, and applying to congress for relief. On presenting them Mr. A. went very much at length into an explanation and commentary on the several resolutions, which he read in succession, and moved that they be referred to a select committee, and that his motion and the resolutions, for the present, lie on the table. He withdrew his last motion at the request of Mr. Polk, who replied to Mr. A. in defence of the administration. Mr. A. made a brief response.

After several other petitions on various subjects had been presented and disposed of, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, March 18. Mr. Binsy reported a bill to remit the duty on locomotive engines heretofore reported, and to allow them their future importation duty free.

Mr. Leavitt reported a bill appropriating 150,000 acres of land, in addition to the quantity heretofore appropriated, for the satisfaction of bounty land warrants.

Mr. R. M. Johnson reported a bill for the erection of an armory on the western waters.

The above bills were twice read and committed.

A message was received from the president of the U. States, suggesting the expediency of extending the term allowed for the settlement of the claims under the late treaty with Naples; which was referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Pinekey obtained leave, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the documents communicated by the president of the United States, in relation to the trade between the United States and the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, be referred to the committee on commerce; and that said committee be instructed to inquire into the discriminating duties referred to by the president in his message, and into the expediency of adopting countervailing measures, for the protection of American merchants and ship owners. Agreed to.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Mardis, of Alabama; when

Mr. Burges took the floor and continued his speech in opposition thereto, until one o'clock, when he suspended his remarks; and the speaker announced the special order of the day, being the resolutions reported by the committee of ways and means on the removal of the deposits, and the house proceeded to consider the same; when

Mr. Wildc said he would now proceed to offer some observations to the house, unless the gentleman from Tennessee desired to speak.

Mr. Polk having signified that he did not wish to speak,

Mr. Wildc took the floor, and offered the following resolution as a substitute for the first resolution reported from the committee of ways and means:

Resolved, That the reasons submitted by the secretary of the treasury for removing the public deposits are insufficient and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Wildc, after speaking nearly three hours, yielded the floor, without concluding, to a motion to adjourn; when, on motion of Mr. Williams, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, March 19. Mr. Elisha Whittlesey, from the committee of claims, reported the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for referring all claims for buildings burnt and destroyed by the enemy during the late war, because they were in the military occupation of the United States, by an order of an officer, or agent, of the United States, as places of deposit, or as barracks, to the third auditor of the treasury department, on principles that have been heretofore prescribed in the settlement of such claims; and that they further inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the settlement of all claims arising from the loss of property in the military service of the United States, by contract or employment, and for horses lost during the late war—also, during the war with the Seminole Indians; and the late war with the Indians commanded by Black Hawk, on such principles as have heretofore been prescribed in such cases.

Mr. Whittlesey explained the reason why the commissioner of claims had not acted on these cases, which was understood to be, a limitation as to time in their presentation, and contended that no such limitation should be interposed. The resolution was agreed to.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of Mr. Mardis' resolution on the deposits, when,

Mr. Burges resumed the floor, and continued his speech in opposition to the resolution, until 1 o'clock, when they were again cut short by the expiration of the morning hour.

The house then went into the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means on the removal of the deposits, when

Mr. Wildc again took the floor, and concluded a very animated and sarcastic speech, in support of the amendment he had offered declaring the reasons of the secretary insufficient and unsatisfactory. He closed at half past three o'clock, when, on motion of Mr. Pinekey the house adjourned.

Thursday, March 20. Mr. Clay reported a bill authorizing the construction of rail roads and canals, through lands of the United States.

After various other business of a private or local character, the house took up the unfinished business of the morning, which was the consideration of Mr. Mardis' resolution on the deposits, when

Mr. Burges once more addressed the house in opposition to the resolution, and held the floor until the expiration of the morning hour, when his remarks were suspended.

The house then proceeded at one o'clock, to the orders of the day, viz: the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means; when

Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, rose and addressed the house at large, in opposition to the resolutions with which the report concludes, and which it recommends for adoption.

BRITISH KING'S SPEECH.

House of lords, Tuesday February 4.

His majesty this day opened the sessions of parliament in person.

At half past 1, the lord chancellor took his seat on the woolsack.

His majesty, attended by the usual ministers of state, entered the house at a quarter after 2 o'clock. His majesty, we are happy to say looked very well. He appeared to be in excellent health.

The commons having been summoned, about 200 of them, headed by the speaker, immediately presented themselves at the bar, when his majesty proceeded to read, in a distinct and audible voice, the following gracious speech:

My lords and gentlemen:

"In calling you again together for the discharge of your high duties, I rely with entire confidence on your zeal and diligence, on your sincere devotion to the public interests, and on your firmness in supporting on its ancient foundations, and in the just distribution of its powers, the established constitution of the state.

"These qualities eminently distinguished your labors during the last session, in which more numerous and more important questions were brought under the consideration of parliament than during any former period of a similar duration.

"Of the measures which have in consequence received the sanction of the legislature, one of the most difficult and important was the bill for the abolition of slavery. The manner in which that beneficent measure has been received throughout the British colonies, and the progress already made in carrying it into execution by the legislature of the island of Jamaica, afford just grounds for anticipating the happiest results.

"Many other important subjects will still call for your most attentive consideration. The reports which I will order to be laid before you from the commissions appointed to inquire into the state of the municipal corporations, into the administration and effects of the poor laws, and into ecclesiastical revenues and patronage in England and Wales, cannot fail to afford you much useful information; by which you will be enabled to judge of the nature and extent of any existing defects and abuses, and in what manner the necessary corrections may, in due season, be safely and beneficially applied.

"It has been the constant aim of my policy to secure to my people the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessings of peace. In this I have been much assisted by the good understanding which has been so happily established between my government and that of France; and the assurance which I receive of the friendly disposition of the other powers of the continent give me confidence in the continued success of my endeavors.

"I have, however, to regret that a final settlement between Holland and Belgium has not yet been effected, and that the civil war in Portugal still continues. You may be assured that I shall be careful and anxious to avail myself of any opportunity which may afford me the means of assisting the establishment of a state of security and peace in countries the interest of which are so intimately connected with those of my dominions.

"Upon the death of the late king of Spain I did not hesitate to recognize the accession of his infant daughter; and I shall watch with the greatest solicitude the progress of events which may affect a government, the peaceable settlement of which is of the first importance to this country, as well as to the general tranquility of Europe.

"The peace of Turkey since the settlement that was made with Mehemet Ali, has not been interrupted; and will not, I trust, be threatened with any new danger. It will be my object to prevent any change in the relations of that empire with other powers, which might affect its future stability and independence.

Gentlemen of the house of commons:

I have directed the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you.

They have been framed with a view to the strictest economy, and to such reduction as may not be injurious to the public service.

I am confident that I may rely on your enlightened patriotism, and on the cheerful acquiescence of my people for supplying the means which may be required to uphold the honor of my crown and the interest of my dominions.

The accounts which will be laid before you of the state of the revenue, as compared with the expenditure, will be found most satisfactory.

My lords and gentlemen:

"I have to lament the continuance of distress amongst the proprietors and occupiers of land, though in other respects the state of the country, both as regards its internal tranquility, and its commerce and manufactures, affords the most encouraging prospects of progressive improvement.

"The acts passed in this last session, for carrying into effect various salutary and remedial measures in Ireland, are now in operation, and further improvements may be expected to result from the commissions which have been issued for other important objects of inquiry.

"I recommend to you the early consideration of such a final adjustment of the tithes in that part of the United Kingdom as may extinguish all just causes of complaint, without injury to the rights and property of any class of my subjects; or to any institution in church or state.

"The public tranquillity has been generally observed, and the state of all the provinces of Ireland present, upon the whole, a much more favorable appearance than at any period during the last year. But I have seen with feelings of deep regret and just indignation, the countenance of attempts to excite the people of that country to demand a repeal of the legislative union. This bond of our national strength and safety, I have already declared my fixed and unalterable resolution, under the blessings of Providence, to maintain inviolate by all the means in my power. In support of this determination, I cannot doubt the zealous and effectual co-operation of my parliament and my people.

"The practices which have been used to produce disaffection to the state, and mutual distrust and animosity between the people of the two countries, is chiefly to be attributed to the spirit of insubordination, which, though for the present in a great degree controlled by the power of the law, has been but too perceptible in many instances.

"To none more than to the deluded instruments thus perniciously excited, is the continuance of such a spirit, productive of the most ruinous consequences, and the united and vigorous exertions of the loyal and well affected in aid of the government, are imperiously required to put an end to a system of excitement and violence, which, while it continues, is destructive to the peace of society, and if successful, must inevitably prove fatal to the power and safety of the United Kingdom."

London, Feb. 4. We have received by express the Paris papers of Sunday, together with letters from Madrid of the 21st and 22d ult. The particulars of M. Dulong's funeral, which took place on Saturday, occupy a considerable space of most of the Paris papers. It appears that there were 30,000 men under arms, for the purpose of suppressing any movement which might have threatened an encute.

THE WEST INDIES.

James McQueen is the name of a well known writer of various pamphlets and letters in behalf of the West India proprietors, and hostile to the course of the British ministry in relation to the West India colonies. One of his recent letters, since the adoption of the emancipation bill, contains a large amount of statistical information with respect to the population, progress and production of the islands belonging to the several European powers. Some of the items are interesting to Americans, and they are believed to be, in the main, accurate.

The island of Cuba is first noticed. The whole value of the property in the island, in 1830, is put down at $562,191,730. The exports of that year were $9,662,000, and the consumption $50,776,500. The total imports in 1829, were $14,300,000, of which $4,100,000 were received directly from the United States, and $3,200,000 indirectly. From all other sources the imports were $7,000,000. From 1821 to 1830, inclusive, the United States received from Cuba upwards of sixty millions of dollars in return for exports, chiefly of provisions. The annual amount of actual produce, bona fide of the United States, taken by Cuba, is averaged at $8,000,000.

Porto Rico exported, in 1830, to the value of $3,491,805, and in 1832, $5,095,996. About one-half of the imports of the island are received through St. Thomas. One-half of all the exports is carried directly to the United States. Thirty thousand tons of shipping owned in the United States, nearly one-half of the shipping of the island, were engaged in the direct trade with this country, and a large part of the remaining half, engaged in the trade between the island and Spain, also belonged to Americans. The revenue of Cuba in 1829 was $9,150,000, and of Porto Rico in 1832, $1,000,000.

Hayti presents a miserable account. The year 1826 is the last for which correct returns have been found, and Mr. McQueen presents some strong evidences of the decay of the island. The value of the produce of the French part of the island, in 1791, was upwards of £7,000,000 sterling. In 1826 it did not exceed £1,000,000 for the whole island. In 1789 the trade employed 1,700 vessels, or 357,800 tons; in 1822 only 947 vessels, or 162,693 tons of every description and from all nations. Two-thirds of the whole were from the United States. The population in 1790 was about 750,000; in 1826 it was a little more than 420,000. [Bull. Am.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

March 5th, 1834.

At a meeting of the board of directors held this day, Mr. Eyre, from the committee on the offices, presented the following report, which was read.

REPORT.

The committee on the offices having now ascertained by an experience of several months, the progress of the reductions in the business of the bank ordered by the board on the 8th of October last, avail themselves of the monthly returns of the bank and all its offices, made up for the month of March, to present a statement of those reductions.

The design of the board in directing them was to protect the institution, and to provide the means of paying the deposits of the government, so as to press with as little injury as possible on the community. How far that purpose has been accomplished, will be seen from the following detailed statement of the amount of the loans, deposits, specie and circulation of the bank, from the 1st of October, 1833, to the 1st of March, 1834.

1833.	Discounts.	Domestic bills.	Total.
October 1	42,226,375 42	17,867,927 51	60,094,302 93
November 1	41,062,813 94	16,147,790 44	57,210,604 38
December 1	38,780,567 49	15,672,537 18	54,453,104 67
1834.
January 1	38,609,069 46	16,302,392 24	54,911,461 70
February 1	37,544,352 82	17,098,790 82	54,643,143 64
March 1	37,381,131 86	18,786,698 00	56,167,829 86
1833.	Public deposits.	Private deposits.	Total.
October 1	9,868,435 58	8,008,862 78	17,877,298 36
November 1	8,932,311 18	7,285,041 88	15,517,353 06
December 1	5,162,260 63	6,827,173 10	11,989,433 73
1834.
January 1	4,230,509 63	6,734,866 06	10,965,375 69
February 1	3,066,561 72	6,715,312 60	9,781,874 32
March 1	2,604,233 62	7,343,129 92	9,947,363 54
1833.	Specie.	Circulation.
October 1	10,663,441 51	19,128,189 57	29,791,631 08
November 1	10,342,160 46	18,518,000 57	28,860,161 03
December 1	9,818,529 25	18,650,912 90	28,469,442 15
1834.
January 1	10,031,237 72	19,208,379 90	29,239,617 62
February 1	10,523,385 69	19,260,472 90	29,783,858 59
March 1	10,385,430 15	18,523,189 00	28,908,619 15

From this statement it will be perceived that from the 1st of October to the 1st of March, the total reduction in the line of local discounts was 4,845,143 56
While there has been an increase in the domestic bills of 918,770 49

Making the total reduction of loans 3,926,373 07
During the same period the reduction of the public deposits was 7,264,201 96
And of the private deposits 665,732 86

Making a total reduction of deposits of 7,929,934 82
During the same time the specie of the bank has diminished 278,002 36
And the circulation of the bank 605,000 57

The comparison of the two periods will be more obvious from the following tabular statement:

	Loans.	Deposites.
October 1, 1833	60,094,302 93	17,877,298 36
March 1, 1834	56,157,829 86	9,947,363 54
	3,926,373 07	7,929,934 82
	Specie.	Circulation.
October 1, 1833	19,128,189 57	10,663,441 51
March 1, 1834	18,523,189 00	10,385,430 15
	605,000 57	278,002 36

The general result of the operations of the bank during the last five months has been—

1st. That the reduction of the loans has not been, by upwards of four millions of dollars, as great as the reduction of deposits; and

2d. That the withdrawal of nearly eight millions of dollars of those funds on which the bank had based its accommodations to the community, has not yet been followed by a reduction of accommodation equal to one-half the amount of funds withdrawn.

3d. That from the 1st of January to the 1st of March, the increase in the line of domestic bills amounted to nearly two millions and a half of dollars.

4th. That during the same period there has been an actual increase in the total loans of the bank of 1,256,368 dollars 16 cents.

The committee cannot regret the smallness of this reduction during the last five months, nor even the actual increase of its loans since the 1st of January; because both have arisen from the strong desire of the bank to give every relief to the community consistent with its own safety. But they cannot forbear to express their deliberate conviction that these reductions are much less than are required for its security during the present unsettled state of the currency; that it has now become the duty of the bank, gently but steadily, to diminish the amount of the claims upon it by continuing to lessen its business.

Whereupon, on motion of Newkirk, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That as much misapprehension appears to exist throughout the country in regard to the reduction of the loans of the bank since the removal of the government deposits, the foregoing report be published for general information.

BANK COMMITTEE AND MR. TANEY.

From the Baltimore Republican of March 14.

We copy from the Chronicle of yesterday morning, the following card, giving one side of the account of the conversation between the committee of the memorialists in favor of the bank and Mr. Taney.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Our attention having been directed on Monday, the 10th instant, to an editorial article in the Washington Globe of that morning—we, the same day, addressed the annexed note to Mr. Taney, and not having heard from him, it becomes our duty to the community, as well as to ourselves, explicitly to repeat, that the conversation between Mr. Taney and us, was correctly stated in the report of the committee.

WM. CRAWFORD, jr.
G. BROWN.
J. W. PATTERSON.

Baltimore, 12th March, 1834.

Baltimore, 10th March, 1834.

The undersigned, (Mr. Gaiter being absent) the members of the Baltimore committee, who had the interview with you, and responsible for that part of the report made at a public meeting on the 5th inst. having seen by the Globe of this morning, that the editor of that paper asserts that he has your authority for saying that that part of the report which refers to our conversation with you is a misrepresentation, we deem it necessary to ask of you whether the editor had your authority for his assertion. We are respectfully yours,

WM. CRAWFORD, jr.
GEO. BROWN.
J. W. PATTERSON.

To R. B. Taney, esq. secretary of the treasury, Washington.

It strikes us that the committee were rather hasty in publishing this letter. It was written, it seems, on the 10th instant, and could not have been received by Mr. Taney before the 11th. Had he been entirely disengaged, he could not have answered it before the 13th. But with the multifarious duties he has to perform, it was unreasonable to suppose that they should be laid aside to attend immediately to such a matter. And yet, because the answer was not received by the return mail, they seem to have taken it for granted that none was to be expected. It is a trite saying that one story is good until another is told. And here follows the answer. The public have now the whole matter before them, and will decide according to the evidence of the case.

To the editor of the Republican.

SIR—I transmit to you for publication a letter which I received the day before yesterday from Mr. Taney. Understanding yesterday that a portion of the committee that recently visited Washington, had addressed a note to him in relation to an editorial paragraph which appeared in the Globe, I had determined not to publish the letter at present; but the card of Messrs. Crawford, Brown and Patterson, in the Chronicle of this morning, appears to me to render its publication proper. I therefore avail myself of the authority which the letter gives, and desire you to insert it in to-morrow's Republican, with the request that the editors of other papers who may have published the card of those gentlemen, will republish from the Republican Mr. Taney's letter. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. HEATH.

Washington, March 10, 1834.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with much surprise the report made by the committee to the meeting at Monument Square, in the city of Baltimore, on the 5th instant. The report does me great injustice, and does not present the opinions which I expressed to the members of the committee with whom I conversed.

I must begin by observing that Mr. Birkhead, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Graham and Mr. Howell, whose names are signed to the report were not present at any part of the conversation, and can have no personal knowledge of any thing that was said. I did not see either of them while they were in Washington. Mr. Patterson came in near the close of the interview, and was in the room but a few minutes.

The only persons who were present throughout the conversation were Messrs. Brown, Crawford and Gaiter. My acquaintance with the two latter was a very slight one. But circumstances had often brought Mr. Brown and myself together while I lived in Baltimore, and we had, for several years past, been on terms of familiar and friendly acquaintance. He introduced the conversation soon after they came into the room by giving me to understand that they had called on me as members of the committee, and that they wished a free and friendly conversation with me, not only in my official character, but as a citizen of Baltimore, and as one who could not be indifferent to the welfare of a community of which I had so long been a member. It never entered my mind that a conversation so invited by Mr. Brown was designed for publication; much less that detached expressions were to be selected separating them from the connecting observations, so as to create an impression entirely different from the one I intended to convey.

The common principles of fair dealing between man and man would seem to require that when such a design was entertained, I should have been warned of the intention, in order that others might be present to hear what passed, as well as the persons, who, it now seems, were secretly awaiting some phrase or expression which they might note down and publish to do me injury.

The conversation was chiefly carried on between Mr. Brown and myself. The others occasionally took part in it. He reproached the conduct of the bank of the United States in strong terms. He said that it had abused its powers by wilfully oppressing the community, and that it ought not to be rechartered on any terms. He admitted that the depositors ought not to be restored, and that the restoration would not relieve the pressure which he stated to exist. But he and the other persons present with him drew a strong picture of the distress in Baltimore, and represented that the commercial community there was in danger of general bankruptcy unless something was done by the government to relieve it. His plan of relief was a new bank, and he left with me a draught of his project. He urged me to consider it, saying it was the plan of one of my friends, in whom he knew I had much confidence. But he did not name him.

In reply to these statements I told them that I was opposed to the recharter of the present bank on any terms—and that if it succeeded in its present attempt to coerce the renewal of its charter, the government of the country would, in effect, be surrendered into the hands of a money corporation—that I was opposed to any bank of the United States, and believed such an institution wholly unnecessary—that the state banks, I had no doubt, were fully competent to perform the duties of fiscal agents—and that notwithstanding the efforts to embarrass their operations and to discredit them, I had found no difficulty in carrying on the operations of the treasury, and placing money wherever it was needed for public use—and that I was satisfied they would be able to afford all the facilities in the domestic exchanges which the interest of the country required, and upon terms as favorable as any bank of the United States—that the pressure, of which they had spoken, had been designedly created by the bank of the United States for the purpose of compelling the people to yield to the demands of the bank—but it was greatly aggravated by the panic which had been got up to aid the bank in its attempts to bring distress and ruin on the country—that the newspapers in the commercial cities, which were understood to belong to the bank, or to be under its control, had teemed, for months past, with groundless reports of failures, and bankruptcies, and predictions of the approaching ruin of the mercantile community, and the stoppage of specie payments by the state banks—that the merchants themselves had, by their own conduct, and meetings, and resolutions, and deputations to Washington, contributed greatly to increase the excitement and alarm, and by that means disabled the state banks from loaning as freely as they would otherwise have done—that if the mercantile community of a commercial city chose to proclaim itself on the eve of bankruptcy, every body would naturally believe them, and be unwilling to trust them, and that embarrassment and distress would unavoidably follow the destruction of credit.

That if they expected to drive the administration from its course by such measures they were mistaken, that the government was not responsible for evils which merchants, or any other class of individuals voluntarily brought on themselves for political party purposes; and it could not be expected to change its course on that account. And if by persisting in fostering the alarm they had excited, and increasing the panic, they should produce the general ruin which they said was about to fall on the city, it would not change the measures of the administration—that the evil would be the work of their own hands for which the government was in no degree responsible; that it was in their own power to produce or avert it, and they could not justly charge, upon the government, the evils which they themselves should voluntarily occasion.

I do not profess to give you the whole conversation between us which lasted more than half an hour. But I give the opinions distinctly stated by me, to which the passages mentioned in the report, (if I used such expressions) must have had reference.

I cannot undertake to say whether I did or did not use the words imputed to me. But, if they were used, they were applied to the general ruin which the mercantile community should willfully bring on itself by creating a panic for party purposes. The committee have reported my language, as if I had expressed a cold and callous indifference to the sufferings of Baltimore. Nothing could be more unjust. I was endeavoring to impress upon them the folly of co-operating with the bank in exciting an alarm for political objects, and ruining the credit of their whole community to give political power to the bank. I wished to satisfy them, that while it endangered the happiness and comfort of innumerable industrious and valuable citizens, it would fall to produce the political object it was intended to accomplish.

To you, my dear sir, this explanation is, I know, unnecessary. You have often heard me express my opinion on the subject, and would at once see the unjustifiable use made by the committee, of certain expressions, which they say I used. But I am not willing to be misrepresented to the people of Baltimore. And in a community in which I lived so long, and where my principles, feelings and opinions are so well known, I trust that not even the sanction of the names attached to the report can persuade the people that I could express that heartless indifference to their sufferings which this report imputes to me.

As I have already said four of those whose names are signed to the report never heard a word of the conversation alluded to, and I did not even see them while they were in Washington, and one of the others heard but a small portion of it. And without meaning any disrespect to others, I must say that I am as well known to the people of Baltimore, as the four gentlemen who were present at the conversation, and I am willing to leave it to their knowledge of us, whether more sympathy would be likely to be felt for the sufferings of our citizens by Mr. J. W. Patterson, Mr. George Brown, Mr. George B. Gaither and Mr. Wm. Crawford, Jr. than by myself—and whether either of these four gentlemen would be expected or disposed to make greater personal sacrifices to alleviate and relieve them than I would.

I commit this letter to your friendship and discretion. Use it as you think right to vindicate me from the unjust imputations contained in the report.

I am, dear sir, with great respect and regard, your friend and obedient servant,
R. B. TANEY.

Upton S. Heath, esq. Baltimore.

P. S. I have not deemed it necessary to give more of my conversation with the committee, than was required to vindicate myself against an imputation calculated to do me personal injury with the citizens of Baltimore. But it must not be understood that I admit that my opinions are given in the report with ordinary fairness in other respects. On the contrary, the conversation is garbled by the committee in such a manner, as to misrepresent me most grossly in other instances, in which they profess to give the opinions I expressed to them.

R. B. TANEY.

From the Baltimore Patriot of March 18.

A CASE.

It is with regret I find myself compelled to appear before the public, to shew the injustice done me in the letter of R. B. Taney, esq. secretary of the treasury, under date of the 10th inst. addressed to U. S. Heath, esq. and published in the Baltimore Republican of the 13th inst.

Mr. Taney says, that I "reprobated the conduct of the bank of the United States in strong terms, said that it had abused its power by wilfully oppressing the community, and that it ought not to be rechartered on any terms, that I admitted the depositors ought not to be restored, and that the restoration would not relieve the pressure."

How he could have so entirely misunderstood my expressions in regard to the bank, I cannot conceive, never having entertained them; such a view expressed by me would have been completely at variance with the object of my visit to Washington; and with the sentiments I still entertain. Mr. Taney would be correct in saying, that I admitted there were objections to the present bank charter, and I admit that I also said it might be questionable, whether it would be prudent to direct the immediate change of the public money now deposited in the state banks; but I gave it as my decided opinion, that if the public revenue were in future deposited in the United States bank, it would restore confidence and relieve the public distress. The views I intended to convey were decidedly in favor of a renewal of the present bank, or the establishment of a new bank with a modified charter, and I left with Mr. Young, his chief clerk, an outline of such a bank as would, in my opinion, remove many of the objections now entertained against a national bank, and requested him at his leisure to look at it.

For the correctness of this statement, I confidently appeal to the other gentlemen who were present at the time and heard the whole conversation. In concluding these remarks, I need scarcely add, that nothing was stated in the report as regarded Mr. Taney, but what was deemed necessary to show his decided determination against the object of the mission, and that his views were no further detailed than were considered necessary to the discharge of a public duty.
GEO. BROWN.

Baltimore, March 18, 1834.

In corroboration of the correctness of the statement made by Mr. Brown, and as a proof that he never could have expressed himself as represented by Mr. Taney, we also publish the letter of Mr. B. as president of the Mechanics' bank of Baltimore, in relation to the removal of the depositors from the U. S. bank; which must satisfy every one that Mr. B. never did approve of the removal, and never could have expressed himself in the terms expressed by Mr. Taney.

Mechanics' bank of Baltimore, 31st July, 1833.

SIR: Your letter of 30th, stating that you have been appointed to confer with such state banks as you may think proper, in relation to the future deposit and distribution of the public revenue, and inquiring whether this bank is desirous of undertaking the business of the government as now transacted by the branch bank of the United States, has been submitted to our board of directors.

I am instructed to inform you, in reply, that, although gratified at being considered worthy of so high and important a trust, we are unwilling to assume it.

Our capital is not large, and we find that all our means and resources are actively and profitably occupied. We are apprehensive that the facilities and accommodations which government will require in the prompt payment and transmission to different quarters of large sums, &c. &c. could not always be afforded by a state bank, without much embarrassment and difficulty. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
G. BROWN, pres't.

MR. McKIM AND THE COMMITTEE.

From the Baltimore Republican of March 17.

TO MY FELLOW CITIZENS OF THE 5TH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT.

The great principle upon which every representative in this free government is bound to his constituents by a responsibility to them, for the purity of his motives, and the integrity of his public course (directed by their interests and instruction) brings your representative before you, for justification or condemnation of that course, under circumstances of unusual provocation and necessity.

It must be known to all of you, that I have been wantonly assailed by a committee opposed to the present administration of the government deputed in a great part, from a neighboring congressional district, and that at a public meeting convened without the limits of my district, upon the report of this same committee, without even the means or opportunity of a hearing on the part of myself or friends, that meeting has pronounced me subservient and unfit to be the representative of a free and enlightened people. This denunciation it will readily be perceived, affects you as well as myself, and if they generously concede to you, the same measure of light and freedom of which they boast themselves, it will follow that, I am not worthy of the high relations in which I am placed to you, and that the judgment pronounced on me is just, provided the facts and premises upon which they are based are true; and here you have precisely the issue between these gentlemen and myself, as it is my intention to show to you, that where they even stated any thing that approached the truth, they have managed to distort it, and that in other instances, they have stated what is entirely unfounded.

In this appeal of necessity and self-defence on my part, I make no claim upon your known generosity. I appeal to a loftier and more moral feeling—your sense of justice; and upon the statement of facts I shall now lay before you, compared with their own report upon the subject, decide, between these gentlemen and your representative. I was elected by you, as a friend of the administration of gen. Jackson, and as an opponent of the existing bank of the United States. It cannot be assumed, that this was unknown to any of those gentlemen. It must likewise be borne in mind, that I had the strongest indication of the sentiments of the people by the vote of a meeting in my district, convened without regard of party, approving the course of the administration in the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States. All this was matter of publicity in Baltimore; none of the committee were ignorant of it; and the first intimation I had of their arrival in Washington was through Mr. John B. Howell, who with his friend Mr. Shelton, from Cuba, on Monday evening the 10th February, called to see me at my room, Gadsby's hotel, and were received in the room in which the ladies of my family and myself were. After the usual salutations and inquiries, I asked Mr. Howell, if the committee from Baltimore had arrived: he answered in the affirmative and said, that he wished to confer with me on the subject of presenting the memorial. I told him, that as the greater portion of the signers to the memorial resided in the district represented by Mr. Heath, it might be deemed improper on my part to present it, particularly as I understood that Mr. Heath concurred in the views of the memorialists and would support them, and that as I believed a majority of my constituents were opposed to the bank, I could not give it my support; yet, if the committee of which he was a member, wished me to present the memorial, I should certainly do so; that I should feel it my duty to say to the house, on presenting the memorial, that the signers were respectable and incapable of stating any thing, but what they believed to be true; that I could not in discharging what I considered to be my duty, give the memorial my support. At this Mr. Howell seemed to be somewhat surprised, under an impression, on his part, that my mind had not been made up on the subject submitted by the memorial. I reminded him then, that my election had taken place after the order for the removal of the deposits, and by a majority of those opposed, as I believed, to the bank, that I therefore considered myself bound to carry the will and wishes of my constituents into effect; that I should be a traitor to them, if, having been elected to support the president and his administration, I could abandon the solemn pledges I gave to do so; and I did intimate, perhaps warmly too, that I would risk my life and fortune rather than betray the trust which they had delegated to me. These are, I am sure, the sentiments expressed at that time. Mr. Howell being an old friend and neighbor, I invited him and his friend Mr. Shelton (who was present, and as I presume heard the conversation), to dine with me the next day; which invitation they accepted, and took their leave.

On Tuesday morning, February 11th, at 10 o'clock, captain Graham, the only member of the committee from the district I represent, called at my room, I received him as an old acquaintance and townsman, and invited him to join Mr. Howell at dinner, which he declined. He took occasion to say to me, that a great many of those who had voted for me had signed the memorial. In reply I reminded him of the large meeting which had taken place at White hall at which resolutions had been adopted against the bank, and in support of the administration in the course with regard to the deposits. He appeared to regard this meeting as of little importance. I do not recollect that capt. Graham said a word about presenting the memorial. Being myself under engagement to meet the committee of ways and means that morning, at 10 o'clock, capt. Graham left me.

At that moment Mr. Hugh Birkhead, another of the committee came into my room, said his visit was intended for the ladies, and while I remained with him, not a word was said about presenting the memorial. I also requested Mr. Birkhead to dine with me that day, but he said he was under a prior engagement. I then went to the committee room, and immediately afterwards into the house.

Mr. Howell and Mr. Shelton, dined with me agreeably to appointment, and I trust that I shall be excused from relating the conversation that passed at dinner. I am quite sure however, that there was nothing said about the memorial. Mr. Howell and Mr. Shelton having expressed a desire to wait on the president, 10 o'clock Wednesday morning was appointed, and I was to introduce them.

As during my absence in the morning, the committee had left their card, for me, I deemed it proper, as a mark of respect, to return the call, on the same day: I did so in the evening, and on calling at their room, I found Mr. Crawford, the chairman of the committee. This was the first time I had seen him, since his arrival in Washington. Mr. Patterson and capt. Graham, of the committee, were in the room, and gen. Chambers and Mr. Maxcy, as visitors. The rest of the committee were absent. General Chambers and Mr. Maxcy soon took leave, when I had some general conversation with Mr. Crawford, and the other gentlemen present, about the state of the money market—but not a word to my recollection was said by the chairman about presenting the memorial. Some other visitors to the committee then came in, as also Mr. Brown, Mr. Gaither and Mr. Shaw, members of the committee. To the two last named gentlemen, I was introduced, and with them, I conversed separately on the subject of the bank and the pressure in the money market, but I do not recollect a word being said about presenting the memorial. After remaining about an hour, I took my leave.

The next morning, Wednesday, 12th February, about 11 o'clock, I went with Mr. Howell and Mr. Shelton to the president's, and after paying our respects there, we visited the vice president, and then went to the secretary of state's office. During this ride, a variety of free and familiar conversation passed, and we returned to Mr. Gadsby's. This terminated all the intercourse I had with any members of the committee, from their arrival until their departure on Wednesday, the 12th February, about 2 o'clock. I have no recollection of having mentioned the name of Mr. Bibb in any manner, to any member of the committee, and shall for the present, content myself with a positive denial of that assertion.

This is the history, to the best of my recollection, of what took place between the committee and myself, in relation to this subject, and upon which, they have felt themselves authorized in making the report, which denounces me as subservient, and unfit for the station in which you have placed me.

I have deemed it my duty to lay the facts before you at the first moment my official duties permitted in my own name, lest my silence might be construed into an admission of the correctness of any part of that report which relates to myself. Of the justice and propriety of this proceeding on the part of the committee, the public will now be able to judge. I have only to add, that I utterly deny having said any thing to any member of the committee which could warrant them to infer for a moment, that I was willing to surrender my own opinions and independence, or violate my duty as a representative, under the influence of official power, or to subserve any political or party purpose whatsoever—and to those who know how little I could gain by such a course, and what I must lose, it is scarcely necessary to make this denial. For what purpose then, some of those gentlemen upon the list, with whom I never exchanged a word upon the subject of their mission, have by their names sanctioned these misrepresentations of me, I leave to others to infer, and to their sense of honor to approve if they can—my object has been to discharge my duty according to my own sense of what is right, and best calculated to promote the interests and wishes of my immediate constituents, and that, regardless of consequences to myself. This was what I meant to impress on those of the committee with whom I conversed on this subject, and without some design to injure me, I could not have been otherwise represented. It may be proper in conclusion to say, that however these conversations may have been regarded by the members of the committee with whom they were held, garbled and distorted as they have been, I never for my own part considered any of them official, and if the use that has been made of them is conformable to the moral and social code of this committee, I am not yet prepared to become a convert to the system. ISAAC McKIM.

UNITED STATES BANK.

REPORT OF THE MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS, SUBMITTED BY MR. BINNEY.

House of representatives, March 4, 1834.

The undersigned, minority of the committee of ways and means, to which was referred the letter of the secretary of the treasury, communicating to the house his reasons for removing the deposits of the public money from the bank of the United States, and several memorials upon the same subject, submit the following reasons for not concurring in the report of the majority of that committee:

The removal of the public deposits from the bank of the U. States is an act upon which the judgment of the country has now irrevocably passed. The reasons have been investigated in both houses of congress, and by the public press, to such an extent that it may be fairly deemed impracticable to add anything to the arguments by which they are either refuted or sustained; but being most thoroughly convinced that the act of removal was wholly indefensible, without color of probable cause, a violation of the bank charter, an inroad upon the property and security of the citizens, and upon the rights of the legislative department, the undersigned deem it their duty to submit such a statement as will record their personal opinion upon the subject.

I. The power of removing the public deposits is granted or reserved by the 16th section of the bank charter, to be exercised by the secretary of the treasury, for reasons to be communicated to congress. This power is not absolute or unconditional, in regard either to the bank or to the country. Absolute and unconditional power does not reside in any department of government. Congress hold their own power under the condition of conforming to the principles of justice, as well as to the restraints of limitations contained or prescribed in the constitution. They cannot grant an absolute and unconditional power to any officer of government for any purpose of government. The broadest discretion they can give, must be subject to the implied condition of being exercised in conformity with the constitution, the laws, the rights of individuals, and the principles of natural justice. Above all, they cannot, in the absence of express declaration, be presumed to have given an unconditional power to an officer of government to affect rights and privileges conferred or sanctioned by law.

Congress have not granted to the secretary of the treasury any power over the public deposits that is inconsistent with these principles. The grant or reservation of power in the 16th section of the charter is qualified by the express provision that the reasons for its exercise shall be immediately reported to congress, and the sufficiency of the reasons concerns all who may be affected by the act, that is to say, the bank, congress and the people especially, who are vitally interested in every act that invades a legal or constitutional right.

The charter is a contract between the stockholders of the bank and the United States, and all its clauses must receive such an interpretation as is consistent with the principles of contract. The United States contracted to allow to the bank the benefit of receiving and holding the public moneys, unless the secretary of the treasury should, at any time, see fit to order otherwise; in which case he should immediately lay before congress the reasons of such order and decision. "In consideration of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act," the bank contracted to pay, and did pay to the United States one million five hundred thousand dollars; and also engaged to perform, and has performed for seventeen years, important duties, in exoneration of the treasury, at an expense of several hundred thousand dollars more. The custody of the public deposits is not only a benefit, but, next to the power of exclusive banking, it is the principle benefit conferred by the act. It is contrary to every sound rule of interpretation that has ever heretofore been applied to a contract, or to a law regulating a contract, that a power like the secretary's, to suspend the enjoyment of a right, for reasons to be communicated forthwith to congress, should be deemed an absolute and unconditional power as it regards the bank. The minority reject this doctrine as utterly irreconcilable with justice or with law, with reason, whether natural or technical, with the meaning of the charter, or with the faith of the nation.

Various suggestions are made to sustain the position that the exercise of the secretary's power, whether for good reasons, or for no reasons at all, determines the right of the bank to the deposits, and leaves the nation free from all reproach of violated faith.

It is said that he is authorized to act, before he gives his reasons to congress; and his act, therefore, has validity, whatever may be his reasons. The efficacy of his act to remove the deposits is not the question. Whether his reasons be good or bad, his order is, in the first instance, to be respected; but if he is bound to have good reasons, and his reasons have not been good, the subsequent communication of them will show that his act was unjust at the time; and if congress do not rescind it, they will sanction the injustice. There are innumerable instances in which an order, right or wrong, must be respected when it is given; yet when it is subsequently shown to have been wrong, the injustice is declared, and the aggressor punished.

It is further said that the bank has paid nothing for the use of the deposits, and therefore has no right to them that may not be revoked at pleasure, and that the bonus and other expenditures in the public behalf have been paid by the bank for the privilege of exclusive banking, and for the benefit of having their notes received in all payments to the United States. If the deposits be a benefit, (and of this there can be no doubt), the 20th section of the charter shows that the bonus was given for that benefit as much as for any other. The language of the section is general. The payment is "in consideration of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by the act," and this is one of them. Whether the receipt of the notes in public payments is really a benefit to the bank, has been much doubted. That it is a benefit at all comparable to that of having the deposits, cannot be maintained. The obligation of the United States to receive these notes was absolute and unlimited in the charter of the first bank, which did not pay any bonus at all; and in the present charter, for which a large bonus was paid, the engagement to receive them is subject to the pleasure of congress. The great difference in benefit of the respective charters of the two banks is, that in the first there was no stipulation for the public deposits, and the bank paid nothing for its charter; whereas, in the present charter, the case is otherwise in both particulars.

Another suggestion to show that the power of the secretary over the deposits is absolute and unconditional, is, that the power of congress to repeal the guaranty of the notes is so. The difference between the cases is, that the secretary must have reasons for his direction, as the 16th section expressly declares, whereas the 14th section, in regard to the notes, makes no such qualification of the powers of congress.

It is again said that the power given to the secretary by the 16th section is his old, or former power, which was absolute and unconditional as it regarded every depository with whom the public money was placed, and therefore the present power must be the same. If the power given by the 16th section is the old power, the house is possessed of the secretary's letter in as to the extent of it. The language of the secretary's opinion is as follows: "The treasury department being intrusted with the administration of the finances of the country, it was always the duty of the secretary, in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject, to take care that the public money was deposited in safe keeping, in the hands of faithful agents, and in convenient places, ready to be applied according to the wants of the government. The law incorporating the bank has reserved to him, in the fullest extent, the power he before possessed. It does not confer upon him any new power, but reserves to him his former authority without any new limitation." It is unnecessary to dispute the position that the power in the 16th section is the old power in this sense; for the power in the 16th section is not only admitted, but asserted to go to the very extent which the secretary claims for the old power, and no further, namely, to the extent that the safety of the deposits, and their distribution in convenient places, require. Such a power is obviously neither absolute nor unconditional. But independent of this definition of his own power by the secretary, it seems to have been overlooked by the committee that the present power is to be applied to divest a right, whereas the former power was exercised over the possession of depositories who had no right whatever. The control of the treasury department over the public moneys, until the charter of the present bank, was universally a question between the treasury and congress; it is now a question between the bank and congress.

It is finally said that the power of the secretary is absolute and unconditional, because congress have given to him their whole power, reserving none whatever to themselves to touch the deposits until he shall have restored their power to them. This argument begs the question in dispute. The secretary supposes himself to be an independent judge in this matter, whereas the minority suppose that he is merely the agent of congress. His power in the premises is a part of their power intrusted to him as their representative. Though he may use it for sufficient reasons, congress may use it also for the same reasons. The restraint upon the exercise of his power is imposed by the right of the bank, and this is all the restraint that is imposed upon the right of congress. If the bank has no right, as the committee appear to assert, upon what ground can the right of congress be denied? If the power reserved to the secretary, by the 16th section, is neither more nor less than the old power, how is it possible to deny the right of congress to control the deposits, under the charter, if congress had any right to control them before the charter? It is worthy of deep reflection, that the argument put forward by the committee, to sustain the secretary's reasoning, has carried them to the extent of asserting that congress abandoned the public treasure to the secretary and the bank beyond the possibility of recall.

Upon this head the minority state their opinion to the house, that the power of the secretary over the deposits in the bank depends for its just exercise upon the existence of adequate causes; that the bank had a direct and immediate interest in them, and is entitled to an impartial decision upon them; that an unjust decision upon them will be a violation of the charter, and a stain upon the public faith; and that the secretary's position, that his power is absolute and unconditional in regard to the bank, is an unwarrantable assumption of power, instead of a just interpretation of that which has been given.

If, in the execution of this power, the secretary was the agent of congress, and not of the president. He derived the power from congress; he is to report his reasons for using it to congress. The act of the secretary in removing the deposits is neither actually, nor by construction, the act of the president, nor are the reasons of the president a satisfaction, either in effect or form, of the requisition on the secretary to report his reasons. The exercise of this power affects the public treasure which congress directed to be placed in the bank of the United States. That treasure is the treasure of the people, the custody and control of which belongs to the legislature and to the agents of the legislature. The custody of the legislature is exclusive of the executive department. The custody of the bank, as the agent of the legislature, is equally exclusive. The power of the secretary is, in like manner, exclusive. The chief executive magistrate has no constitutional authority to raise revenue, or to take it into his official possession when raised, or to direct who shall possess it, or to interfere with a direction or authority in this behalf, proceeding from congress, any more than he possesses authority to direct by whom the public money shall be used and disbursed. The secretary cannot be relieved from the duty of accounting to congress by any order of the president; nor can the reasons of the president be imposed upon him as a guide, nor be offered to congress as an excuse. The discretion which is given by the charter, is given to the secretary alone. The order of removal must come directly from the secretary; and if it came from the president alone, it would be null and void.

The power of the president to remove the secretary of the treasury is no reason for holding that the secretary is under the direction of the president in the exercise of the discretion conferred by the charter. The president may remove the secretary whether he performs or does not perform his duty. The legal power to do it is as perfect in the one case as the other. The mere exercise of the power does not consequently imply the right of direction or control. The constitutional duty of the president, to see that the laws are faithfully executed, requires him to see that an officer to whom the law confides a discretion is permitted fairly to exercise it. A law which confers a discretion upon one officer, is violated, instead of being faithfully executed, by compelling him to submit to the discretion of another officer. If the president has in this matter, directly or indirectly, controlled the discretion of the secretary, the law has not been faithfully executed, and his act has been a violation both of the law and of the constitution.

III. The only adequate cause for removing the public deposits, must be a cause affecting the safety of the public moneys in the bank, or their distribution for the public service. Such a cause alone directly concerns the subject upon which the power is to be exercised. It is the only cause of which the functions of his office and his relations to the bank authorise and enable the secretary to judge, and which is of such a nature as to require immediate action without a previous reference to congress. It is the only cause which would justly deprive the bank of the use of the public moneys after having paid for it. It is the only cause which congress could safely submit to the discretion of the treasury, without abandoning to that officer the whole scheme of public policy in regard to a national bank.

1. A cause that does not directly concern the subject upon which the power is to be exercised, must regard the public moneys as an instrument, and not as an object of the power. To comprehend such a cause, the charter must be construed to give the secretary an unlimited choice of the objects to be attained by the custody of the public moneys; for as none are pointed out by the charter but those of mere custody and transfer, the instant that these cease to be only objects of the power, we are without any limitation. Whether the purpose of the secretary be local or general, whether it be to make money dear or cheap, to regulate or disturb exchanges, to promote or retard public works, to increase or diminish the amount of bank discounts, to excite or counteract political movements, each and all of these objects must be within the discretion of the secretary, if any of them are.

2. That the secretary should be entrusted with a power necessary to protect the treasury itself, or to meet the demands upon it, is reasonable. If the public moneys are exposed to danger, he must first perceive its approach, and would be best able to measure its extent. He also, from his official position, must know the direction which public engagements require to be given to the means of satisfying them. The power, which either danger or the public credit makes necessary, is one that does not admit of delay, whether congress be in session or not. The action required, to be effectual, must be in some cases instantaneous. The grant or reservation of such a power to the secretary of the treasury was necessary and proper. But if the public moneys were to be made an instrument for affecting an ulterior object, no reason can be imagined why the power of using them should be given to the secretary rather than to the president, or why it should be given to either instead of being left to the action of congress. That nothing but the safety and distribution of the national treasure were the lawful objects of the secretary's power, is conclusively shown by the circumstance that the "act to establish the treasury department," the very moment that the secretary gave the order not to make the deposits in the bank of the United States, placed them in the hands of the treasurer, who could lawfully make no disposition of them, but to keep them secure, to be disbursed according to law. A removal of the deposits for any purpose, except to place them in this custody, would be not only a violation of the rights of the bank, but of the functions of the treasurer as created by law.

The minority are aware that an elaborate inquiry into the history and practice of the treasury department has been made by the committee, for the purpose of sustaining the position that the secretary of the treasury has the right, not only to superintend the collection of the revenue, but to direct in whose hands it shall be placed after it has been collected, and for what purposes it shall be placed there. The minority do not entertain the opinion that the inquiry has sustained the position of the committee. It ought to be a sufficient objection to it, that it gives to the secretary a power which the law does not give him. The secretary's asserted power is both without law and against law. It is a further objection to it, that most of the precedents of treasury practice referred to, are directions affecting the collection of the revenue, which, by law, is under the superintendence of the secretary. The acts of gen. Hamilton, the first secretary of the treasury, are all of this description; they prove nothing to the purpose. Orders to collectors to place the duty bonds in particular banks for collection, are strictly within the legal authority of the secretary. More must be shown, to make any of the precedents conclusive of the point for which they are cited, namely, the existence of a treasury practice. But if the practice were, in point of fact, established, no instance has been produced, in which the law has sanctioned it.

The language of the 16th sec. of the present charter expressly confines the power of the secretary to the making of an order, or direction, that the deposits of the public moneys shall not be made in that bank; and does not give him authority to direct where they shall be made, or recognise such an authority as existing in him. It does not authorise him to remove the deposits already made there, or to select another place of deposit. He is to order or direct that they shall not be made there, and this order is not to be executed by himself, but by those to whom the general law gives the custody of the treasure, when the place selected by congress is repudiated by the secretary. Nothing can afford a stronger argument against the asserted authority of the secretary to direct in what place the public deposits shall be made, than the omission to describe his power as that of ordering or directing them to be made in some other place or places. Until the law shall give the power to the secretary, which it probably never will do, without regulating its exercise so as to make it consistent with the public safety, the minority must be understood as wholly denying the efficacy of any practice whatever to give it, in violation of the plain provisions of the act of 1789.

But if the treasury practice was known to congress, what follows? What is the import of the provision in the charter, that the public moneys shall be deposited in the bank, except that the practice was thought dangerous to the safety of the public moneys, and therefore was to be abolished, unless where that safety itself required a change of the place of deposit? The question under consideration is, whether any thing but the safety of those moneys, and their due distribution, authorised the order: and it is an extraordinary mode of proving the secretary's power, to show a former practice to that effect, before the charter was granted, and which the charter provision effectually opposed.

3. The removal of the deposits must have been regarded by the congress which gave the charter as a certain loss to the bank. The bank was to pay for them, and to be at liberty to employ them according to the usage and practice of banks; holding itself ready to pay, on demand, whatever should be required, in pursuance of appropriations by law. The advantage of possessing them was great, and the disadvantage of losing them, after paying for the possession, was greater. If they were to be removed on account of their insecurity, or for any breach of contract by the bank, or to place them where the bank could not herself distribute them, it is easy to perceive why no provision is made for an indemnity to the bank; but if they might be removed for other causes, particularly if removed to promote other interests, at the expense of the bank, indemnity would have been provided, because it would incontestably be due.

4. The decisive reasons, however, against allowing the secretary to order the removal for any other cause, is that the grant of such a discretion abandons the bank, as well as the country, to the secretary of the treasury, and gives him a sway over the nation, which belongs to no other than the legislative department.

It is not to be doubted that the entire removal of the deposits is fatal to the bank as a national bank. Instead of being the bank of the nation, the nation, by depositing its treasure elsewhere, adopts other banks, and sets them up in opposition. This is the certain and undeniable effect of the secretary's act; and if he had power to do this, he had power to repeal the bank charter. If, indeed, the bank had disqualified herself for her duties, by insolvency or infidelity, the removal of the deposits, to secure their safety, could only be considered as a renunciation of the bank, after the bank had renounced the nation; but a removal for other causes, however honest or good they may be, can only be regarded as a removal to destroy the bank.

As to the suggestion, upon which the committee appear to place some reliance, that safety cannot be the only reason, because, in case of danger, the removal could not be effected, if it proves any thing, it proves that safety cannot have been even one of the objects of the power, because it was an unattainable object; and then it proves too much.

A cause, then, which neither concerns the safety and due transfer of the public moneys; nor is within the cognizance of the secretary's office; nor furnishes a moral justification for depriving the bank of a benefit which it has purchased and paid for; nor can be confided to the judgment and discretion of an individual, without surrendering to him the established policy of the nation, cannot be such a cause as justifies the secretary in ordering the removal of the public deposits, because it cannot be maintained that congress meant to give him a discretion to such an extent.

IV. The secretary's communication admits that the public moneys were safe in the bank, and that in the transfer of them from place to place, and in the performance of every duty to the treasury, which the law requires, there was no ground of complaint whatever against the bank. These facts are admitted, because, in a communication which accumulates all the reasons which have governed the secretary, there is no suggestion of danger to the public moneys, or of infidelity in the transfer of them.

V. The causes which the secretary has assigned for the removal of the deposits, might, therefore, if the preceding propositions are true, be generally rejected as insufficient and illegal, since they do not come within the only description of causes which the minority hold to be adequate. They are, however, deemed to be particularly and specially inadequate, and most of them for reasons which are independent of any of the preceding propositions. Such of them as do not involve any disputed facts, are inadequate in law. Those which depend upon such matters of fact, are inadequate in law, and also in point of proof. All of them which accuse the bank of violation of charter, and claim to proceed upon that ground, are themselves in flagrant violation of the charter, and of the constitution of the union, which entitle the bank before the infliction of any penalty whatever, to an impartial sentence of the judicial department. Upon these reasons, the undersigned proceed to submit the following remarks:

At the head of the secretary's reasons, is placed the expiration of the charter and corporate powers of the bank, on the 3d of March, 1836. This is a reason which congress, by the clearest implication in the charter, have declared to be insufficient.

1. By the 15th section, congress have exacted of the bank, whenever required by the secretary of the treasury, to give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place within the United States, or the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, during the continuance of the act; and also to do and perform the several and respective duties of commissioners of loans, whenever required by law, which requisition was made in terms of unlimited continuance, that is to say, for the whole period of the charter, by the act of 3d March, 1817. These provisions of law are in irreconcilable hostility with the notion that, for the mere lapse of time, congress authorised the secretary to remove the public moneys from the bank two years and more before the charter would expire. The bank cannot give facilities for transferring and distributing the public funds throughout the United States, in payment of the public creditors, without having the funds in her possession to transfer and distribute. The duty is for the whole period of the charter. The possession is implied for the same period. Whatever may be the discretion of the secretary as to other causes, he has no discretion to remove the deposits for the mere lapse of time, since the 15th section secured to the public, for the whole time of the charter, the performance of the duty by the bank.

2. This cause has not, and never had any contingency about it, nor is the removal on account of it, a remedy for an unexpected evil. If there is any evil in permitting the deposits to remain in the bank until the expiration of the charter, congress knew that the evil would occur, unless they should guard against it and yet they did not guard against it, but gave the bank a right to the deposits for the whole time, and received from the bank a compensation proportioned to that time.

3. The cause is not well founded in point of fact. The charter does not expire on the 3d of March, 1836. Certain of the faculties of the corporation will expire at that time, and certain of them will not; and the very faculties which will not expire are those whose cessation would alone give color to the removal, upon the ground of time. The faculty of retaining the public and private deposits, and paying them in such portions as may be required, will continue after the 3d of March, 1836, in as much rigor as before. The bank will continue for two years after that time to be a corporation for the purpose of holding and paying deposits, and of owning and paying her bank notes in circulation; and what other corporate faculties concern the security of the public treasure?

4. This cause is founded, moreover, upon an assumption that it would be the height of extravagance to suppose it was contemplated by the congress which incorporated the bank. The secretary supposes that the charter, "in many of its provisions, is not warranted by the constitution, and that such a powerful moneyed monopoly is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and to the purity of our political institutions;" and that he is required to act upon the mere lapse of time, because he has no right to assume that unconstitutional law, and a law dangerous to the liberties of the people, will be renewed. But it seems to have been forgotten that the question of removal is not the question of renewal, but a question of the interpretation of the charter; and, if this is the true question, can it be seriously alleged that the congress which passed this law meant to include among the sufficient causes of removal, one that depended on the assumption that the charter was against the constitution? Had the charter contained an express stipulation that it never should be renewed, instead of its following as a consequence that the bank ought not to enjoy the privileges and benefits promised her up to the last moment of her existence, the contrary would have followed, because the bank could not have an indemnity for the wrong in the terms of a subsequent charter.

5. It is attempted to sustain the propriety of the removal for this cause, upon the further ground, that the question of renewal has been decided adversely to the bank by the last election of president. But what part of the charter, or of any law of congress, authorizes the secretary to communicate such a reason to the house? Where is the warrant for the secretary's instructing congress as to the decision of the people upon a matter of future legislation? By what channel does the secretary maintain an intercourse with the people that is not open to their representatives? How does the secretary know any thing as to the wishes of the people, which the representatives of the people do not better know themselves? The communication of such a reason to the representatives of freemen, who are themselves freemen, is without a precedent in the history of this or any other representative government. The alleged fact is, moreover, an assumption, and a mere assumption, without proof, and without the means of proof. It is a political inference which the people of this country will never sustain, until they are prepared to say that the election of a president is not the result of a preference founded upon his general qualifications, opinions and actions, but is an adoption and ratification of his single will to any extent that he has at any time declared it, and even when he may have declared it in contrary directions at different times.

6. Another suggestion by the secretary, in connexion with the question of time, is the apprehension of danger to the deposits, by permitting them to remain in the bank until the expiration of the charter. The congress of 1816 were but a very few years removed from a parallel case in the history of our government, calculated to put to flight every such apprehension. They had at that time before them the closing transactions of the first bank of the United States. They had seen that the first administration of Mr. Madison (and it was in his second term of office that the present bank was chartered) witnessed the continuance of the public deposits in that bank to the last moment of its existence. They had seen that the then secretary of the treasury, Mr. Gallatin, who had been in office for ten years, and who had for twice ten years given the strength of his powerful mind to the investigations of finance, and of practical banking, had not directed a removal of the deposits from any apprehension of a final default in the bank. They had seen this, moreover, in the case of a bank whose corporate powers expired totally and absolutely on the 3d of March, 1811, so that all subsequent operations were to be conducted by the machinery of a trust, and by no other means. They had seen this bank expire with a circulation then flowing through the country greater than the maximum of its amount at any previous time, with the usual extent of deposits, public and private, in its vaults; with nearly all its canvass of every kind spread to the last hour of its voyage, and which the just and amicable relations subsisting between the administration and the bank made it safe to spread for the good of the country. They had seen the trustees of that bank pay every dollar of its debts instantly upon demand; and finally, they had seen that demand so much behind the ability of the trustees to meet it, that its tardy approaches were quickened by repeated public notices to come in and relieve the trust, by presenting the notes for payment. And what did the congress of 1816 provide, or mean to provide, for the occurrence of the same day in the career of the present bank? Did they mean to provide for an apprehension which they knew to be chimerical? Did they mean to give occasion for actual apprehension and dismay, by authorising the officer at the head of the treasury to declare that there was cause for them, and by his very declaration to create them? On the contrary, they negative all such fears and suppositions, by adding two years more to the corporate existence of the bank, for the very purpose of enabling it to liquidate its affairs after its banking powers were at an end.

The minority deem it expedient to add a summary statement of the condition of the first bank of the United States on the 1st of March, 1811, two days before the expiration of its charter, and at two semi-annual periods after the expiration, and to name the tables from which they are derived, that the benefit of the facts may avail hereafter, if unfortunately they are to be lost to the country for all purposes of present good.

On the 1st of January, 1811, the situation of the bank was as follows:

Notes discounted and loans	$17,759,001
Specie	5,317,885
Public deposits	6,474,402
Private deposits	3,855,402
Notes in circulation	6,070,153

On the 1st of March, 1811, the same items stood thus:

Notes discounted and loans	14,587,134
Specie	4,835,702
Public deposits	2,874,838
Private deposits	3,585,596
Notes in circulation	6,552,575
On the 1st of September, 1811, the same items stood thus:
Amount of discounts and loans	7,152,788
Specie	4,500,527
Public deposits	432,349
Private deposits	448,112
Notes in circulation	2,963,309
On the 1st of March, 1812, twelve months after the expiration of the charter:

Amount of discounts and loans	3,792,975
Specie	6,116,778
Public deposits	81,517
Private deposits	223,442
Notes in circulation	1,070,459

It is unnecessary to suggest the inferences to which these statements give rise. By adverting to the ratio which the capital of the first bank, ten millions of dollars, bears to thirty-five millions, the capital of the present bank, and by applying the same ratio to the liabilities and resources of the two banks, it will be easy to perceive whether the case of the first bank was, or was not, of a character to allay the alleged apprehensions of the secretary.

7. The remaining suggestion of the secretary, under the head of time, is the necessity or expediency of providing the country with a paper currency from the local banks, as a substitute for that of the bank of the United States.

The minority have understood the committee to say that they do not claim for the secretary a power to remove the deposits for the purpose of regulating the currency. The question is what the secretary has claimed for himself; and that there may be no misunderstanding about it, extracts from his letter are given, that it may be seen not only that the secretary has claimed this power, but that the effect upon the currency was the great public and political purpose of the whole operation. "Nothing can be more distinctly and literally avowed. 'It is obvious,' the secretary says, 'that the interests of the country would not be promoted by permitting the deposits of the public money to continue in the bank until its charter expired. Judging from the past, it is highly probable that they will always amount to several millions of dollars. It would evidently produce serious inconvenience, if such a large sum were left in possession of the bank until the last moment of its existence, and then be suddenly withdrawn, when its immense circulation is returning upon it to be redeemed, and its private depositors removing their funds into other institutions. The ability of the bank, under such circumstances, to be prompt in its payments to the government, may be well doubted, even if the ultimate safety of the deposits could be relied upon. Besides, the principal circulating medium now in the hands of the people, and the one most commonly used in the exchanges between distant places, consists of the notes of the bank of the United States and its numerous branches. The sudden withdrawal of its present amount of circulation, or its sudden depreciation before any other sound and convenient currency was substituted for it, would certainly produce extensive evils, and be sensibly felt among all classes of society.'"

The secretary then adverts to the public agreement to receive the notes of the bank in payment of its dues, and proceeds as follows: "But this obligation on the part of the United States will cease on the third of March, 1836, when the charter expires; and so soon as this happens, all the outstanding notes of the bank will lose the peculiar value they now possess, and the notes payable at distant places become as much depreciated as the notes of local banks. And if, in the mean time, no other currency is substituted in its place by common consent, it is easy to foresee the extent of the embarrassment which would be caused by the sudden derangement of the circulating medium. It would be too late, at that time, to provide a substitute which would ward off the evil. The notes of the bank of the United States in circulation on the second of September last, which was the date of the latest return before me when the order for removal was given, amounted to $18,413,287 07, scattered in every part of the United States; and if a safe and sound currency were immediately provided, on the termination of the charter, to take the place of these notes, it would still require time to bring it into general use, and in the interim the people would be subjected to all the inconveniences and losses which necessarily arise from an unsound state of the currency. The evil would be so great, and the distress so general, that it might even compel congress, against its wishes, to recharter the bank; and perhaps more effectual means could hardly be devised for insuring the renewal of the charter. It is evident that a state of things so much to be deprecated can only be avoided by timely preparation; and the continuance of the deposits can only be justified by the determination to renew the charter. The state banks can, I have no doubt, furnish a general circulating medium, quite as uniform in value as that which has been afforded by the bank of the United States—probably more so. For it is well known that, in some of the cities, the branches of the bank have been in the habit, whenever they thought proper, of refusing to honor the notes of their own bank, payable at other branches, when they were not offered in discharge of a debt due to the United States. But a currency founded on the notes of state banks could not be suddenly substituted for that heretofore furnished by the bank of the United States, and take the place of it, at the same moment, in every part of the union. It is essential that the change should be gradual, and sufficient time should be allowed to suffer it to make its way by the ordinary operations of commerce, without requiring a hasty and violent effort.

"In this view of the subject, it would be highly injudicious to suffer the deposits to remain in the bank of the United States until the close of its corporate existence. And as they cannot be withdrawn without the action of the secretary of the treasury, it must unavoidably become his duty, at some period of time, to exercise the power of removal."

These are literal extracts from the secretary's letter, and no one who reads them can doubt that the secretary claims the right to regulate the currency, and that he meant to force one kind of currency out, and, by means of the state banks, to force another kind of currency into use. Can any one who has read his letter, doubt that, if this power is denied by the committee, they deny the whole case of the secretary? The lever he has undertaken to use, is one which not only cannot be used without changing the currency, but the secretary has used it for the express determinate purpose of producing the change. But to proceed with the reason itself:

The value of the measure, as an operation of finance, to expel one currency, and to introduce a better, has been already tested, in the short time which has elapsed since the order of removal. The discounts of the bank have been partially reduced, yet the circulation of the bank, instead of being diminished, has increased. The local bank paper, except for local purposes, has generally depreciated, and the paper of the bank of the U. States is at par in all places except where it is above par. But without adverting further to the incompetency of the means proposed to attain the end, it is an imputation upon the congress of 1816 to say they intended to authorise the secretary of the treasury to use any means whatever for the attainment of such an end. The avowed purpose of the secretary is to change the currency of the country, and to change it during the very time in which congress have made a different provision in regard to it. The purpose is to be effected by compelling the bank of the United States to cease lending, and by enabling the deposit banks to lend; by compelling the one to cease circulating bank notes, and enabling the others to circulate them more extensively. In fine, by compelling them all to give him indirectly the management of banks, without any law, warrant, or title, and to surrender it themselves, contrary to the laws by which they are exclusively entitled to it. A power to do this congress could lawfully give to a secretary of the treasury, and no congress therefore should be presumed to have given it. It is a delegation of the highest powers of legislation, under the form of ministerial agency. If there is any legislative power which demands more circumspection in its use than any other, it is that of regulating the currency. The currency is the measure of value of every man's property, of his contracts, of indemnity for the breach of them, and of the revenue of the country; and without a due adjustment of it, it is a hopeless effort to distribute in equal proportion among the citizens either the burdens or advantages of civil society. A deranged currency deranges every institution of the country that has any relation to property. It makes laws, promises, the verdicts of juries and the judgments of courts, speak unintentionally the language of falsehood or deceit. It gives a premium to fraud, and strips honest labor of its scanty earnings, by paying to it half of its just recompense in the false and counterfeit name of the whole. Yet this power the secretary of the treasury claims to exercise, by delegation from the representatives of the people, and he has proceeded to the exercise of it, with consequences which are now spreading in a wave of destruction over the whole country. The secretary claims the power to remove the public deposits from the bank, if in any degree it tends to promote the convenience of the people, that is to say, if it so tends to his opinion; and his opinion, with this mighty lever of the public revenue, is, consequently, to sway the universal interests of this immense people. And what are the direct evidences that congress meant to give the secretary of the treasury any such power? He is not by law intrusted with the custody of a single dollar of the public treasure. His hands do not legally receive it, and cannot legally hold it. His duty is to prepare plans for the management and improvement of the revenue, to prepare estimates of the revenue and expenditures, to superintend the collection of the revenue, to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts, and to grant warrants in pursuance of appropriations by law. The notes of the bank of the United States, against which this battery is directed, he is bound by law to protect, by requiring all public collectors to receive them in all payments to the United States. The stock of the nation in the bank of the U. States he cannot sell, nor separate their interest, to the extent of seven millions, from that of the other stockholders of the bank. The payment of the interest and principal of the public debt must be made by and through the bank, as commissioners of loans. The military pensions must be paid through the same channel. And thus, while several permanent laws of congress, without any limitation in point of time, sustain the circulation of the bank, the relations between the bank and the treasury, and the control thus obtained over the currency of the country, the secretary of the treasury, under a provisional clause in the bank charter, to order that the deposits of the public moneys shall not be made there, claims the authority to break up the present system, and to substitute another, for regulating the currency and property of twenty-four states, and thirteen millions of people. The minority do not believe that a like attempt has ever before been made, with or without authority, and all present indications are inconceivably deceptive, if the result shall not afford a memorable warning against the like attempt again.

The secretary's plan is now called an experiment. The name is adopted, because it would seem only to defer, and not absolutely to destroy, the hope of ultimate safety. It is adopted, because it would seem to make those who prosecute it responsible for less, because they promise less. But the change of name changes neither the thing nor the responsibility for it. If it be an experiment, what law, what principle of our civil associations, authorises the treasury department to try such an experiment? What security does government afford to the property of the citizens, if the treasury may try experiments with it? If it be an experiment, what authorised its trial in a day of unusual prosperity, and when the only rational prayer to the Civil Ruler was, "let us alone?" What justifies its continuance, when the first test that has been cast into the crucible with the precious materials of human happiness, has nearly decomposed them all, and threatens to convert them into poisons that will corrode and canker the country to its very heart? It is no longer an experiment. It has been tried, exposed, and ought to be rejected. It is no longer an experiment, unless it would deserve the name of an experiment to try whether life can be supported without vital air, or the laborer and his children without daily bread.

It should finally happen, in the progress of the experiment, that a currency is created such as the secretary anticipates, what is that currency to be to the country, and what is the country to be by means of it? This question may be answered by our own history, as it might be answered without the aid of history. It is not to be a national currency, nor a currency partly local, and partly national, maintained every where in the condition of equality, by a universally pervading influence, but it is to be a variety of local currencies, subject to local influence only. The state banks, and the state banks only, are to furnish it. They are to furnish it under the patronage of the treasury, and with a full knowledge of the maxims which have been quoted by the committee, "that the borrower is the servant of the lender," and that "he who controls a bank, controls the debtors of a bank," maxims which will be found to lose none of their force when state banks shall feel the effect of their position as borrowers of the treasury, and debtors shall feel it also as borrowers of state banks that are under the control of the treasury.

It will be a currency wholly removed from that restraint which a national institution is alone capable of imposing in all parts of the union, that is to say, free from all banking restraint whatever; for, practically, there can be no restraint where there is no general and pervading power to enforce it. In some, perhaps in several, of the untrammelled and independent state banks, banking will be conducted upon judicious principles so far as it regards their own operations; and their own local currency may continue for a time locally sound. But where shall be the controlling cause that shall secure this result, where the principles of banking are unsound, and where the desire of large profits shall tempt state banks to extend their issues beyond that measure which experience has ascertained to be the only safe and accurate measure? Where is to be found the universal presence of a test that will instantly detect excess, and lead to its detection? That test is to be found in a national paper, based upon the precious metals, sustained by the law of the whole land, received in payment of all public dues, circulating every where, and furnishing a standard of comparison every where. Where, again, is to be found the necessity, as well as the power, of applying the corrective? This corrective is to be found in an institution which issues that national paper, and which, in self-defence, and in defence of the nation also, must repress the circulation of every bank that does not provide it with the means of disbursing the public treasure in all parts of the United States. The paper that is really sound, will be as good as its own, and will be received as such, and may circulate as such. But if the paper of any one of the state banks is not as good as its own, such an institution cannot receive it, because it cannot account for it every where to government, in an equal amount of its own paper or of specie. If it cannot be received by the national institution, it must return to those who issue it, and the corrective is at once applied.

The system of local banks, of which those to be employed by the treasury are to form a part, is, therefore, defective in this, that their circulation will be local. They will be constantly endeavoring, at least in a great many cases, to send out their paper to excess, and there cannot be the regular application of the corrective, that will as constantly prevent it. It may be repressed in some instances, in an irregular way, by sound state banks; it may also be partially repressed by demands from other states; but the effort to do it regularly, will be without inducement, and will not be sustained by the requisite ability. Excess will creep upon the country until it is universally diffused; and when an accidental state of the balances shall turn the excess suddenly back upon the banks which have issued it, disorder will come, and with it universal alarm and bankruptcy. This is the history of the past, and a lesson for the future. A confederation of state banks, sanctioned by the laws of the states, is a scheme which the minority do not think it necessary to combat, until some one shall propose it, and present its outlines. An attempt to regulate the currency by the operations of state banks, through private compacts, with each other, or with the treasury department, will probably fail, however often repeated, as it has failed already. A partnership of different corporations, for profit and loss, or of mutual guaranty, with independent boards of directors, is as strange a contrivance for the security of stockholders, as it is for the control and regulation of the currency. When the question of providing a regulation for the currency shall be deliberately considered, the minority have no doubt that the project of employing state banks for national purposes will be universally rejected as impracticable.

The hope of obviating all these difficulties by the final substitution of a metallic currency in exclusion of bank paper of every kind, is a mere delusion. No one who reflects upon the subject at all, can either see how it is to be effected, or what it is to do but harm, when it shall be effected. Through what process are the state banks to be extinguished, as well as the U. States bank? If they continue, how is their paper to be superseded? If their paper is to remain, who is to exchange a productive capital for specie to serve as currency, when paper, which costs nothing, will answer the same purpose? Who is to begin the traffic? For specie, like other merchandise, is to be bought and paid for; and it must be bought and paid for by something besides paper. And when there shall be a thorough abolition of every kind of paper from use, how will the gold and silver be better than the paper we have had hitherto, which gave us all the gold and silver we wanted, and did not compel us to take it when we did not want it? What will the country have gained, and particularly the industrious and enterprising, who are without capital, and must borrow it in order to use it—the men by whom this nation has been enriched and strengthened? What will the industrious and enterprising do, after a scheme shall have succeeded, which, by destroying paper, will infallibly destroy bank credit, and give to the man of capital a monopoly of the trade and industry of the country? The subject, however, need not be pursued. There is a power in the necessities of men, which will baffle all such designs, if they shall be seriously entertained; and this the minority do not, in the slightest degree, apprehend. If bank paper is not to be wholly extinguished, but only diminished by the substitution of metal for the smaller denominations of notes, this, indeed, is admitted to be an object of great importance, and mainly for the reason that, in case of an unusual call upon banks for specie, they may be able the more readily to repair their resources from the channels of the country. But, if this design is to be carried into effect at all, it is demonstrable that it can only be done by a national institution operating with the public treasury, and regulated by laws of congress, directed to the great constitutional end of equalizing and sustaining the currency. State banks and their operations are to be controlled, and not the controlling power, in the execution of such a design; and, consequently, the plan of the secretary, for extending the power and circulation of the state banks, is at the farthest possible distance from the object of either extinguishing or diminishing paper currency.

The minority do not deem it necessary to make any further remarks upon the reasons of the secretary for removing the public deposits, in order to prepare a currency in state bank paper.

VII. Another reason of the secretary for removing the deposits, is derived from the supposed pressure by the bank upon its debtors, including the state banks, in the months of August and September, 1833, to coerce a renewal of the charter.

The minority deem it an act of indispensible justice to the bank to say that if reductions have at any time pressed with unnecessary severity upon her debtors, of which they have seen no evidence, the bank stands excused before the world by the course of the treasury department. The act of removal has not only been an act of declared hostility, but it has been preceded and followed by all the customary practices of embittered war. The bank has never been directly apprised of any thing that the treasury proposed to carry into effect against her. If made aware of it, it has been through rumors in the streets, or hints in the newspapers, and never from the treasury department until the moment that the blow was given. The determination to remove the deposits has not, to this day, been made known to the bank by any official communication from the treasury; no evidence certainly of such a communication has been sent to this house. An order of the 28th September, 1833, by the secretary to the president of the bank, to deliver to the collector at Philadelphia all bonds to the United States, payable on or after the 1st of October, was the only announcement to the bank in Philadelphia; and this, by the collector's letter of the 28th, would seem to have been communicated to the bank on the 30th of September. Yet it is now known that the removal of the deposits was a foregone conclusion a considerable time before that.

The times and amounts in which the deposits were to be drawn by the treasury, were not only not made known, but were concealed from the bank. The treasurer had been for years in the practice of sending daily lists to the bank of every draught drawn upon it, stating both the date and the amounts, without the names of the holders; and he also sent weekly lists of the draughts, with the particulars in every point. These were the suggestions of amity to assist the bank, by the fullest information of the treasury purposes. But as soon as the policy of the treasury department was altered, and a hostile attitude assumed, the practice of daily and weekly lists was continued; but they did not speak the whole truth. Draughts to an immense amount were withheld from the lists, to be used according to contingencies, and at points where the bank might or might not be prepared to meet them; and the daily and weekly lists consequently became instruments of deception to the bank. The bank was left to ascertain and prepare for the treasury demand, with deceptive information as to its extent. The minority annex hereto the correspondence between the treasurer and the cashier of the bank upon this subject.

And even now, when the cry is still that the bank is oppressing the country, rumor gives out, with her thousand tongues, that it is the purpose of the treasurer to reject the whole mass of bank draughts at present in circulation, amounting probably to more than five millions, and to force them back upon the bank, by refusing to receive them in payments to the United States. The bank is left to ascertain the truth of this also, and to prepare for it as she may.

Can it be justly said that the bank has, at any time, done more than was necessary for her protection, when the treasury department has made it impossible for the bank to know whether any thing short of defence, at all points and in every form, would give protection.

What is the position in which the removal of the deposits has placed the bank of the United States? Before that removal, the bank collected and disbursed the public revenue, facilitated the domestic exchanges by means of it, and kept in order the currency of the country every where. The bank then owed these duties to the whole nation, and her obligations to the stockholders were secondary. She is now deprived of the means of performing them, and her obligations to her stockholders and creditors have become primary. The bank of the United States is now a private bank, forced to become so against the will of her directors and stockholders, not sustained but opposed by the treasury, and therefore left to sustain herself. What is to measure her loans to the community, but the sense of her own safety. What is to be the judgment she is to form of the experiment now on trial, but her own judgment? She considers, and, according to the report of the committee, she is bound to consider, that the sentence of death has gone forth against her; and if this be so, what principle compels her to put the capital of her stockholders at risk upon the issue of an experiment?

The alleged pressure by the bank in August and September, 1833, with a view to coerce a recharter, requires to be particularly considered, for two reasons: first, because it is believed that the reason of the secretary is not in this instance sustained by evidence; and, secondly, because it is also believed that what the bank has done, is doing, and will probably be forced to continue to do, is in perfect coincidence in all its parts with the plan which the secretary intended, by the removal of the deposits, to force upon the bank and the country.

1. The imputed design of the bank to coerce the renewal of its charter, is an inference from the mere fact of its reductions. There is nothing else suggested to justify the imputation, and its propriety is consequently not to be made either more or less clear by argument. If such was the design of the bank, it is impossible to imagine any plan that could more effectually have promoted it, than that of the secretary. The fact of pressure and distress in August and September, 1833, is however now known to have been assumed as a motive for the removal, without sufficient evidence or consideration. Pressure and distress are, it is true, terms which indicate comparative rather than absolute difficulty, and, therefore, it is not easy to prove that the payment of debts to a bank is not always the occasion of some pressure and distress to those who are compelled to pay. But such are sufficiently at ease to consider what was the condition of the country during the sixty days which preceded the removal of the public deposits, and to compare it with that which it has assumed in the course of the last two months, will admit that the state of the country, up to the hour of removing the deposits, was a state of comparative beatitude. In the now established sense of pressure and distress, the commercial cities and the country, up to the removal of the deposits, were wholly exempt from every appearance of either. That justification of the secretary's motive fails therefore entirely in point of fact. Had any such pressure existed, the intention to remove was so justly apprehended for months before it was executed, and the reductions by the bank of the United States in August and September were so indispensable to her safety, in the extraordinary relation in which the treasury was about to place her, that few persons, who consider the subject dispassionately, would be inclined to infer a purpose of coercion from that which could be so much more naturally traced to the motive of self-protection.

2. But the conclusive answer to the secretary's reason is, that what the bank did, is doing, and must continue to do, was, and is, and will continue to be, the inevitable effect, as well as the declared purpose, of the secretary's plan. That plan seems of late to have been put aside for the more satisfactory occupation of ensuring the bank. It deserves to be recalled to the consideration of the house. It is to be recollected that the secretary assumes as a postulate, that the notes of the bank, as soon as the charter expires on the 3d of March, 1836, "will lose the peculiar value they now possess, and the notes payable at distant places become as much depreciated as the notes of local banks; and if in the mean time no other currency is substituted in its place by common consent, it is easy to foresee the extent of the embarrassment which would be caused by the sudden derangement of the circulating medium." The secretary then proceeds to say, that "it is of the first importance to the interests of the public, that these notes should all be taken out of circulation before they depreciate in the hands of individuals who hold them; and they ought to be withdrawn gradually, and their places supplied as they retire, by the currency which will become the substitute for them." The secretary then immediately inquires, "How long will it require for the ordinary operations of commerce, and the reduction of discounts by the bank, to withdraw the amount of circulation before mentioned, without giving a shock to the currency, or producing a distressing pressure upon the community?" The secretary answers his own question—"I am convinced that the time which remained for the charter to run after the first of October, (the day on which the first order for removal took effect), was not more than was proper to accomplish the object with safety to the community; and if it had depended on my judgment at an earlier period, I should have preferred, and should have taken, a longer time." Here, then, is the secretary's plan distinctly announced. The bank was to be compelled to withdraw all her notes from circulation before the 3d of March, 1836, and was to begin forthwith, as the whole time that remained was not more than was enough. The secretary would have taken more if he could, and the bank, by taking the two months before the removal, did but assist the design of the secretary. The secretary himself perceives that the bank can effect the recall of the notes only by reducing the discounts. His plan, therefore, was to compel reduction forthwith by removing the deposits. This is demonstrably plain. It admits of no doubt whatever. The extent of reduction necessary to produce this effect, was consequently the very extent of reduction which the secretary meant to force upon the bank, and any reduction short of it is less than he intended. Now, it is equally clear that nothing could call in the whole circulation, but calling in all the discounts and closing the bank. With the first discount the first bank note went out. The last note may be expected to come in with the last loan that shall be repaid. The secretary's plan, to take all the notes out of circulation before the 3d of March, 1836, was therefore a plan to call in all the discounts before the same day; and in what way sixty-four millions of discounts, the amount in August, 1833, could be called in, in thirty one months, at a less rate than two millions per month, remains to be shown. It is impossible to show it. The bank has not, in fact, called in ten millions in six months; and more than what she has called in has been taken away from her by public and private depositors. The rate of reduction has been less, consequently, than the secretary's plan required, and there must be more reduction if the bank does not mean to defeat the plan of the secretary.

One alternative only is then presented to those who object to the reductions of the bank. Either the bank has not yet reduced enough, for she has not been able to reduce her circulation at all, or the whole scheme is exploded the instant it is subjected to practice. It is obvious that the only measure which the secretary deemed repugnant to the interests of the country was the extension of discounts by the bank, or the continuance of their amount as it stood at the time of the removal. Reduction was the agent and the only agent that he intended to see. If the plan of the secretary is to be defeated and maintained, complaints of reduction by the bank, far greater than she has ordered, will be without color of justification, since far greater reductions will be necessary to effect his plan. If, on the contrary, the plan is to be abandoned because it is utterly impracticable, it ought to be wholly abandoned, and the path of wisdom as well as of justice will then be found in a return to the point of departure. The fact unquestionably is, that the removal of the deposits, the reduction of discounts, and the consequent reduction of the bank circulation, have been considered without the slightest reference to the complex state of pecuniary relations existing in the country. The whole process has been regarded as a mechanical affair, of which all the details would quietly come out as necessary results of the first measure. No allowance has been made for the consequences of confidence broken up, of the interruption of that regular series of receipts and payments, by which the resources of the creditor and debtor are alternately repaired, of exposing to trial, or even to suspicion, the fragile virtue of those state banks that are able to live upon their reputation merely because it is not questioned, and of attempting to take out of a powerful machine, while it is in full operation, the wheel that balances and regulates the whole. No allowance has been made for any of these consequences, by those who have led to their occurrence; and now when we are surrounded by them, and cannot escape from them, even the plan which has caused them is forgotten in the course of the bank for conforming to it. The bank is but travelling in the path which the secretary prescribed, and to which the removal of the deposits, and the collection of the revenue through other banks, must inevitably confine her. Her resources for general relief have been taken away, and given to those who cannot use them. Her ability to secure the return of what she lends in the sound currency in which she lends, is also gone. The whole country perceives that what is wanted is security for the future; and while the plan of the secretary shall be prosecuted in any of its parts, the people will not believe that a single day of the future is secure. This universal distrust and apprehension, and not the operations of the bank, will be received by the dispassionate observer as the solution of the difficulties which now surround us; and whatever will remove this distrust and apprehension, and nothing short of it, will provide the remedy. The return of the deposits is, in the judgment of the minority, an indispensable part of this remedy, due by public faith to the bank, due also by public policy as a declaration of peace between the treasury and the bank. But they cannot regard the mere return as affording the promise of a radical cure. The eyes of the nation are now intently fixed upon the currency. If the present bank is not to be rechartered, something to regulate the currency must be provided in its place. The plan of the secretary gives over the regulation to state banks, which will themselves be promoters of the disorder. The country requires something which will regulate the state banks. Until this is effectually provided, the minority have no expectation that distrust and apprehension will disappear, however they may be diminished.

VIII. The remaining reasons of the secretary may be classed under two heads: acts by the bank in violation of its charter, and an act or acts of unfaithfulness in the execution of its duty to the treasury. Under the first must be included the constitution of the exchange committee of the bank, the alleged exclusion from that committee of the directors appointed by the president of the United States, and the expenditure of money for printing and circulating pamphlets. Under the second, no fact is particularly noticed by the secretary, but the case of the French bill.

1. In relation to all the operations of the bank included under the first head, it must be answered, that whether the bank has been right or wrong, her board of directors assert the legal right to do whatever has been done. Her American stockholders also, who, with the fullest knowledge of all the circumstances, have repeatedly elected the same directors, assert the same right, and approve the acts which have been done in execution of it. If these acts are not in violation of the charter, they are mere acts of administration or management of the bank, which the United States as a stockholder have agreed to commit to the discretion of the board of directors.

The directors appointed by the president have no veto upon the resolutions of the board. The president has no such veto. If the resolutions are lawful, the charter, and all the stockholders, public and private, as parties to it, must be considered as having committed to the directors the entire discretion to make and execute them. They may have been inexpedient, and if they have been, the corrective is to be sought in the annual elections. They may have been deemed inexpedient by the directors appointed by the president, but if they have been, the law has determined that they are legally bound by the voice of a majority of the board. Upon questions of administration within the legal competency of the board, there is no more justification of an attempt to tear the bank to pieces, by a part of the directors, or by the treasury department in support of them, because the voice of the minority is not respected, than there would be for an attempt by a state or states, for the like reason, to sever the union. All the parties to the compact have agreed that questions of administration within the lawful competency of the legislature, whether of the bank or of the union, shall be decided by a majority, and if they require correction, that they shall be corrected by a majority, and in no other way.

Upon the supposition, then, that these measures of administration by the bank have been lawful, the minority take it to be free from doubt, that the secretary's dissatisfaction with them is not one of the causes which authorised him to remove the deposits. The management of the bank has not been committed to the secretary. He has no right whatever to inspect its management, or even its condition, except in a limited way, for the purpose of ascertaining the security of the deposits. To have given him the power of removal in any case, in which he should deem the management wrong, would have been to give him effectually the management of the bank in every particular. The charter removes all such causes from his cognizance by committing the management of the bank to the directors, under such powers and restrictions as the charter and by-laws determine.

On the other hand, the acts thus questioned are violations of charter, the objections to the secretary's act are equally plain. In the first place, he is not the officer to whom the charter has confided the authority to direct a prosecution for a violation of charter; in the next place, it has expressly confided that authority to others; in the third place, the bank is entitled to be heard before any judgment of violation is pronounced; and lastly, that judgment is to be pronounced by the judicial department only.

The secretary's power to arraign the bank for violation of charter cannot be asserted. It is a power of the most delicate and critical nature, and the 23d section of the charter commits it to the president and to congress only. That the secretary should be impliedly authorised to decide the whole question, and to remove the deposits at once upon that ground, when the charter does not give him authority to issue a setra facias to have the question tried, cannot be maintained. Those who have authority to direct the prosecution, have no right to try it, or to give judgment on it. The judicial power is not in congress or in the president, and they cannot exercise it without themselves violating the charter of the bank, and the constitution also. The bank is not even charged with violation of charter. When charged, she will be entitled to a hearing; when heard, she will have the benefit of trial by jury; and when the first judgment shall have been rendered, she will be entitled, if it be adverse, to a review in the supreme court of the union. In the mean time, in the sight of the nation and the law, all her charter rights remain in their original vigor. If the want of sufficient time to try the question is a reason for deciding it without trial, it is one that prostrates all the barriers which the constitution has raised between the assertion of arbitrary power, and the life, liberty and property of the citizens. The spirit which grows up the temperate and deliberate inquiries of the judicial magistrate, and demands its victim in anticipation of the tardy and unaccommodating sentence of the law, is not the spirit of the constitution, nor of the law abiding people of the United States.

The bank then has a legal right to say, as her directors have said, that she has not been guilty of any violation of charter, and congress have not the legal right to adjudge the contrary. If they cannot adjudge the contrary, they cannot lawfully deprive the bank of a single privilege or benefit conferred by the charter, upon the ground that she has lost them by violation of charter. Every benefit of the charter is a right of property, and it would be infinitely better for the constitution and for the people, that congress should at once hold the public deposits to be removable without cause, rather than assign the cause of violation of charter, and enforce the sentence of forfeiture to the extent of a dollar, upon the ex parte report of a committee. The minority do not mean, so far as they are concerned, to impair the chartered rights of the bank, by attempting an investigation of the law and the facts before a body that is not constitutionally authorised to try them.

The exclusion of the directors appointed by the president is nowhere shown to have been ordered by the board, or by the president of the board. They have not been appointed on certain committees, and this is all that can be said, and the same may probably be said of many directors appointed by the private stockholders. It depends upon the pleasure of the board, and is a matter of administration. Whether there was any thing in the capacity or dispositions of the individual directors referred to, to make their appointment upon certain committees proper or improper, it might be deemed invidious in a paper of this kind to inquire, particularly as it is understood that the senate of the United States have not advised their re-appointment to office, and they therefore do not at present stand in the position of public servants, whose acts require further investigation.

The expenditure of money for printing and circulating pamphlets has not been questioned by the stockholders. They have been fully apprised of it, and they have more than once re-elected the directors who have authorised it. The right to print and publish is a constitutional right. It belongs to corporations as well as to natural persons. It cannot be previously restrained, and it cannot be subsequently punished, except by the sentence of a court, when it is proved to have been done in violation of law. If it has been necessary to defend the directors of the bank from aspersions upon their characters for what they have done as directors, or to prevent the credit of the bank from suffering by imputations upon its solvency, or the integrity of its administration, the charge of the expenditure belongs properly to the bank, because it is in vindication of the operations of the bank. As to such expenditures, the stockholders are the ultimate judges, and all the stockholders are bound by a vote of the majority ratifying the expenditure, as much as they would be by an order to incur it. The subsequent ratification, by the re-election of the directors who ordered it, is equivalent to an original command. Whatever printing or publishing has been done by the bank, has been done openly, without cover or disguise. It has been done in the assertion of a right, and the public have known it. Whether an influence equally public, and equally innocent, has directed and supported those attacks upon the bank, which have thrown upon the institution the expense of resisting them, it does not belong to the minority of this committee to inquire.

2. The case of the French bill, as upon a claim for damages by the bank, is not before the committee of ways and means. If the bank should make a claim upon congress for the satisfaction of that demand, it would probably be referred to a different committee. It is before the committee of ways and means upon the question whether the act of the bank in making such a claim to the secretary of the treasury, is a reason for dismissing the bank as a fiscal agent of the nation, and the majority of the committee have decided that it is. The minority are willing to leave this question to the decision of the house and of the country. It is a principle which, if rigorously applied, will possibly economize the time of the house, and the labor of the committee of claims. If it is understood to be the opinion of the house that every agent or officer of the nation, who makes a claim upon congress or upon the treasury, deserves to be dismissed from his office, it will probably put an end to all claims that are not thought to be worth more than the office, to the person who makes them. No one can by possibility do less than the bank has done in the prosecution of her claim, and therefore safety is to be found only, in not making claim at all. This objection does not unfitly close the test of the secretary's reasons. It is a case in which there was no agency in the bank, and no unfaithfulness in any one of her steps, from the time when the bill was bought from the treasury, to the time when it was returned under protest, and the treasury refunded the amount. The bill was bought, paid for, and duly forwarded by the bank, duly presented, duly protested for dishonor, duly returned, and duly notified to the treasury department. It was notified with a claim for damages, in the same manner in which the United States have for forty-five years notified similar claims to the drawers and endorsers of dishonored bills, and enforced them also without any exception. If this notification of a claim is sufficient to deprive the bank of her right to the public deposits, the minority are not unwilling that the character of the other reasons shall be inferred from that of their associate.

The minority are upon the whole of opinion that none of the reasons assigned by the secretary in his communication to congress are sufficient to justify the removal of the deposits. They are also of opinion that it is due to the bank to return them without regard to the sentiment of the house upon the subject of recharter. They are further of opinion that the situation of the country requires immediate action by congress, to restore public confidence, and to prevent a derangement of the currency. And they express to the house their settled conviction that these objects will not be attained if the public deposits are left in the state banks. They think, besides, that the universal voice of the country requires that something shall be immediately done for public relief, and that the resolutions proposed by the committee, will only aggravate the existing evils, instead of providing a remedy.

The reply of the Baltimore committee to Mr. McKim's address, published in our last paper, will be found in the present.

The proceedings of a great meeting held at New York a few days ago, with the report of the "union committee" raised on the 11th ult. fill a large part of our sheet. We had nearly resolved not to enter upon the publication of any more long articles on the subject to which this report refers—but the importance of the facts generally offered, and the power with which they are presented to the public mind, have caused us to regard it as a document of great value, for present or future use. It is the work of Mr. Gallatin.

On Monday last, 24th inst. the people of Baltimore were thrown into a state of high excitement by the publication of the following notice, in two of the morning papers of that day:

TO THE PUBLIC.

Bank of Maryland, 24th March, 1834.

The board of directors of this institution have ascertained, with surprise and deep regret, equal to any that the community will feel, that this institution is unable to proceed with its business, and they have resolved to transfer all its effects to a trustee, for the equal benefit of the creditors of the bank.

The board of directors hope and trust that the assets will be sufficient to discharge the debts of the institution, and their determination to stop its business at once, is from a conviction that to continue it longer would only be attended with loss to the community. Their advice to the creditors, founded upon the best judgment they are now able to form, is, not to sacrifice their claims. The debtors of the institution will have the privilege of paying their debts with the notes and certificates of deposit, and the open accounts due by the bank, and these alone they hope will enable the note holders and depositors speedily to realize nearly all if not the entire amount of their credits. By order, R. WILSON, cashier.

When this news reached the morning steambot for Philadelphia, some of the intended passengers rushed on shore, "as though she had been on fire," as a gentleman present remarked to us—and, by 8 o'clock, A. M. South street, (in which the bank of Maryland is, or was, located), was filled with an anxious and distressed multitude, some of whom were females! The crowd increased—but 9 o'clock arrived, and the door remained shut. This bank had heavy deposits on certificates bearing interest, and we think it probable that a larger amount of its notes were in the local circulation than the aggregate of all the rest of our banks, though its capital was only 300,000 dollars!—and it is very possible that from 25 to 30,000 dollars in its bills were paid away, in wages to working people, last Saturday evening, when they were offered and received in good faith! A large crowd remained before the door until even 10 or 11 o'clock at night, chiefly of the poorer classes of the people; and yet, to their lasting honor be it said, no act of violence was attempted, though "curses loud and deep" were uttered against "the experiment" which is now going on. As soon as the other banks opened, "runs" were made upon them all, for small sums in coin—which were promptly and good-humoredly satisfied; and hundreds of persons were seen in the streets carrying-off parcels of specie. The press at the Union bank was by far the greatest—there was a constant crowd before the door until about 4 o'clock, when, all who presented a claim against that bank being quieted, the doors were closed and the people retired, peaceably. This is the deposit bank; but, like the rest of the banks of this city, (except the Susquehanna and the Maryland, which have failed), had a small and well-guarded circulation; compared with its means; but a belief was generally, (though erroneously) entertained, that it had some close and intimate connexion with the bank of Maryland, and would be involved in a common fate. A few small deposits were also withdrawn—but the resources of the bank were ample. On Tuesday there were light demands on most of the banks, and a considerable press again at the Union—but the alarm rapidly subsided, and, perhaps, the specie in the banks, (generally) that evening, was greater than it had been before the "run" commenced, many persons who held quantities of coin freely depositing it—and the office of the bank of the United States behaved nobly, being willing to extend the use of its means on the emergency—for the demand on this bank was insignificant; and, at some of the other banks, "Uncle Sam's money" was preferred to coin! On Wednesday, though many gloomy faces were seen in the streets, there was no general excitement—extra demands for coin were still made; but many returned on deposit that which had been previously withdrawn. Some engagements were violated, however, that would have been kept, if the bank of Maryland had not stopped payment; but the amount was not large. On Thursday extra demands for specie were still made—but no new difficulty has since occurred, or is just now expected—so far as we are informed.

The bank of Maryland had an extraordinary circulation! and enjoyed an uncommon degree of the public confidence; perhaps, for one reason, that its stock, the par value of which being only 300 dollars, was steadily quoted in the newspapers at 500 dollars! This may become a subject for future remark—for it presented an appearance of things which had no substantiality in it. But this bank held a large amount of the money of widows and orphans, small dealers and thrifty persons, mechanics and others, for interest was allowed even on transient deposits; and the manners of the president were popular, and his accommodations liberal. Perhaps the failure of any other three of our local banks would not have so immediately affected the classes of society referred to—all the means of many being lost to present use, unless sold at fifty per cent. discount. We have heard of many cases any one of which is enough to make a man's heart ache—but "perish credit" is proclaimed in congress, and "the experiment" is to be persevered in by "the government." We lost nothing by this bank.* It was manifest to us that the circulation of its notes was violently forced; and, since the "experiment" began, we steadily, but quietly, acted towards that bank as though it might fail within the next twenty-four hours—and if one or two of our friends, to whom we confidentially, (and for their own use only), stated our fears, had acted upon them, they would have been better off than they are; but nothing had openly happened that could have justified us in throwing those fears before the public—and no disposition existed to injure the credit of the bank, or embarrass its operations. A good deal could be said on these matters, but we shall refrain.

The effect of this failure is yet to be seen. Those who have charge of its affairs ought to publish an exact statement of them as soon as possible, and, no doubt, will do it. The notes of the bank, and the certificates of deposits issued by it, is posted up at some of the brokers' offices, will be exchanged at 50 per cent. loss to the holders of them! But it is expected that all these, at least, will be ultimately paid; and more may be done, if the debtors of the bank do not give way.

There is a large amount of bills issued by the "Union bank of Tennessee," made payable at the bank of Maryland, in circulation. We think that the Tennessee bank cannot be held accountable for the amount of these bills unless they are formally protested, the demand at the bank of Maryland not being satisfied.† These notes, as *Being also sorry to say that we have but little "money," just now, to lose!

†The (Baltimore) American of yesterday says—We learn, from an unquestionable source, that large remittances from the Union bank of Tennessee have been received within a few days, well as those of the last named bank, have a wide range in the south and west.

We shall close this article by taking leave to say, that, in our serious opinion, the Baltimore banks, (with the exception of the Susquehanna bank and the bank of Maryland), are in as good a condition as those of any other city—and that we regard every one of them trust-worthy. If we thought otherwise, we dare say it—and, surely, would not mislead any one on this subject. We have a great stake in the soundness and uniformity, and sufficiency, of the currency; but no other particular interest in any bank than proportionally belongs to those who trap beaver in the regions beyond the Rocky Mountains. We do not hold one share of bank stock, nor feel ourselves under a sense of favor to any bank. Our little account has been kept in the Union bank of Maryland many years, without a single jar or hard thought, so far as we know, between the parties—and it will yet remain in that bank, only regretting that the balance on our side is very small, in this season of pressure, excitement and peril.

In the afternoon of Monday, the following was published—

At a meeting of the officers of the several banks of the city, convened at the Union bank of Maryland, in consequence of a notice received from the president of the Union bank of Maryland, to take into consideration the state of affairs arising from the closing of the business of the bank of Maryland, the following presidents and cashiers were present:

William Lorman, president of the bank of Baltimore.

Philip Moore, of the Franklin.

Wm. Bohn, of the Commercial and Farmers.

Nicholas Brice, of the Farmers and Merchants.

Wm. H. Murray, cashier of the Mechanics.

J. Bier, cashier of the Marine.

William Lorman was called to the chair, and N. Brice acted as secretary. Amongst other proceedings the following took place.

The president of the Union bank informed the meeting that the bank of Maryland had made a deed of trust, which they were prepared to deliver, conveying all the property of the bank to him in trust, for the general and equal benefit of its creditors—that he had not as yet read it, nor accepted it, and declined doing so without the advice and concurrence of the other banks interested in the distribution of the funds, and that this meeting was called to lay the subject before them for their direction concerning it.

It was then by the meeting, unanimously resolved by the presidents and cashiers present, that in their opinion it is advisable that Mr. Ellicott accept the deed of trust proposed by the president and directors of the bank of Maryland, and that they therefore unite in recommending him to do so. It being understood among other things of detail, that the different banks shall from time to time be informed of the progress of the trust, and that their several officers shall have free access to every information that they may require until its close.

And on Tuesday afternoon the following, addressed to the public by the president of the bank of Maryland, and to the editors of the newspapers by the trustee—both which had a cheering effect, especially the last:

TO THE PUBLIC.

In consequence of the extreme pressure upon the money market, and the unprecedentedly severe demands upon the bank of Maryland, I regret deeply, with my fellow citizens, that it has been compelled to stop its business.

The suspension has been sudden because it has occurred at the very first moment it appeared that the interest of the creditors of the bank required it—if efforts had been made to sustain the credit of the institution at the expense of heavy sacrifices of property, the result would have still been questionable, but the certainty of loss would have occurred. Under all circumstances, it has been deemed best by the soundest judgment to which we could have resort, to adopt the course which has been adopted, viz: to place in the hands of a suitable trustee, under the direction of the honorable Stevenson Archer, and the honorable Thomas B. Dorsey, or such person or persons as they may appoint, all the effects of the bank, to be kept together, collected and faithfully distributed among the creditors, as speedily as it can possibly be done.

My confident opinion is, that the bank is able to pay all its obligations, but to obviate any difficulty whatever, and to satisfy the holders of the notes and the special certificates of the bank, I hereby pledge my whole private estate, whether real, private, personal or mixed, to redeem any deficiency that the means of the bank may by any possibility be unable to redeem.

EVAN POULTNEY.

for the redemption of its notes made payable at the bank of Maryland, and that these funds have been forwarded to Philadelphia. It is probable that arrangements will soon be made for their proper application in Baltimore.

You are requested to state in your paper, for the information of all parties who have notes or other securities deposited for collection in the bank of Maryland, that they will have the same returned to them on application to R. Wilson, esq. cashier, provided that such notes or securities have not been deposited as security, or the depositors thereof are not indebted to the bank on notes, bills, or other responsibilities which have become due or otherwise—such notes not being considered as any part of the assigned fund. THO. ELLICOTT, trustee.

It would be well, indeed, if the enemies of the bank of the United States would agree upon some course for that institution to pursue! In the first place, its ability to meet its engagements was doubted by the highest authority—and now, by the same party, its power to maintain itself subjects it to be called by many hard names. In the second, when, because the business of the country was large, and the general price of commodities high, requiring a greater sum in money to carry on the exchanges, it was charged with a design to corrupt the people by the liberality of its accommodations—and, though four or five years ago, as appears by the president's messages, the time had arrived when it should look to a closing of its concerns, it is abused for causing the present pressure on the people by the curtailment of its discounts. In the third, it is said that such curtailment is wantonly oppressive, and yet the sober fact is that the reduction does not exceed the reduction of its deposits. In the fourth, it is blamed for making money scarce, though its circulation has been increased about two millions, which is as if added to the specie of the country, to enable the state banks to pay their debts! In the fifth, it is imperiously said that it must and shall wind up its affairs, and then it is denounced for retirements from its discount line which have a less amount than the retirements from the line of its deposits. In the sixth, it is threatened, in "high places," with "runs" for payment of its issues, and abused, in the same, because it holds on to its coin to satisfy all reasonable or unreasonable demands upon it! So we might pass to the fiftieth place, and present similar contrasts. Will it please those in power to lay down some course for the bank to pursue, that the people may be relieved of an oppression which we really fear may make them "mad?" For the old proverb says—"oppression maketh a wise man mad."

Considerable political importance has lately been attached to the ward elections for constables in the city of Philadelphia. At that held last year 11 "Jackson" and 4 anti-Jackson men were chosen; but at that held on the 20th inst. 13 anti-Jackson and 2 Jackson men were chosen; and similar changes have been made in some of the adjoining districts. For instance, the Jackson candidates were defeated in each of the four wards of Spring Garden. It would be difficult to describe the excitement which prevails in Philadelphia and its neighborhood. It may, however, be partially esteemed from the fact that, by the lowest calculation, 25,000 men of the city and county assembled with banners, in Independence Square in the afternoon of the 20th instant, and passed certain resolutions, &c. some account of which must be recorded; but we cannot make room for it this week.

We have recently heard a great deal about "panic makers;" but gov. Marcy, of New York, in our humble opinion, has done more than any other person to make a panic—by his message to the legislature of the state on the 23d inst. which, we regret, cannot now be inserted.

After speaking of the "rapid curtailments" of the discounts of the bank of the United States, and manifesting much hostility towards that institution, and assigning, also, several other reasons for the pressure on the money market, and saying that the safety fund banks have reduced their circulation three millions of dollars since the 1st of January last! he proceeds to the consideration of other subjects, and proposes, as the best means of obtaining relief, the creation of a state stock of four or five millions, to be loaned to the state banks in the city of New York (for which he thinks money may be borrowed in Europe), that these banks may relieve the other banks of the state, &c. which the deposit and use of several millions of the canal fund, with the deposits of the U. States, has not been able to accomplish!

With a resort to the trial of such remedies, the prospect a-head is really awful.

It is now understood that the United States deposits in the Girard bank, at Philadelphia, will be given up. At a late meeting of the stockholders, the noise being on one side, some sober citizens thought, and the shouting ones believed, that the question was doubtful, if not decided according to the uprightness of the latter party; but the other side took sure and quiet means—they opened a paper, and invited subscribers; and it now appears that 17,500, out of the 30,000 shares, have been signed for, to give up the deposits; and it is well known, (say the Philadelphia papers), that several thousand shares are not available for uses of this kind—being held, perhaps, in distant places, or in Europe. It is added, that the officers of the bank approve the measure, though they have not taken any part in bringing it about. From this it appears that a very large majority of the stock is in the hands of persons opposed to the removal of the deposits, though placed in their own bank—as was the case in Virginia—and, perhaps, would be elsewhere, if the matter was fairly tested.

The Philadelphia Gazette asserts that 8,000 shares are held by persons in Europe, and 2,000 by the directors, and 20,000 by the citizens—so that of those who have acted on the present occasion seven-eighths are for giving up the deposits.

The official "Globe" of Monday, speaking of the Girard bank, says—"That bank ought, and no doubt will, in pursuance of its contract, be required to pay every dollar of deposit on hand the moment it refuses to receive the accruing revenue. Not the indulgence of a day, nor an hour, should be given to an institution which deserts the post it has voluntarily assumed," &c. and then suggests that the deposits may be removed to New York or Baltimore, or locked up in the vault of the custom house. The spirit of this article is of a horrible kind. An exercise of the right of opinion, and by those most interested, is to be followed by swift ruin, if possible, for desertion! Why was not the bank of VIRGINIA so threatened? But the agreement between the secretary of the treasury and the new deposit banks, left each party free to retire from the contract, at discretion, the secretary being required to give reasonable notice of his intention to remove the public money. "Nous verrons!"

In our congressional proceedings will be found a brief abstract of a speech of Mr. Clay, in the senate, on the 25th inst. respecting the Union bank of Maryland, in which Mr. Taney is a stockholder, &c. with a copy of a note published by the directors of the bank appended. Intending to present all such things fully, we think it right to add, that the "Globe" of the 27th has an article saying, that, for some time past, Mr. Taney had held, and held when the deposits were removed, "six or seven" thousand dollars of stock of this bank—that, on this account, he requested the president himself to select the deposit bank in Baltimore, saying "however" that he thought the capital of the bank of Maryland was too small to make it a suitable depository—that he has not bought or sold any bank stock since the removal of the deposits—that he never was a director in the Union bank, though once elected, without his knowledge—that no treasury draught has been given to the Union bank since October last, and that this bank had not asked the aid of the department to sustain it—that the secretary has never doubted, and does not now doubt, that the Union bank is perfectly able to sustain itself against any attempts that may be made against it.

In the same degree of fairness it is proper to observe, that it was commonly said and currently believed, that Mr. T. held 25,000 dollars worth in the stock of this bank, and that the aid spoken of had been afforded.

Since the preceding was written, we have seen the following in the "New York American" of the 26th, as an extract of a letter from Baltimore, speaking of the "bank of Maryland"—and also an article of the same purport in the Commercial Advertiser of the same date—

"This bank has been circulating vast numbers of its notes in the west; last week a draught from the west for $150,000 was presented through the branch bank—the president, Poutney, asked one day. It was granted—an express was sent to Mr.

Secretary Taney, who drew on the branch for $200,000, thus the draught on the Maryland bank was paid, and the other $50,000 were deposited in the pet bank, the Union, which has done every thing in its power to sustain Poutney's bank, but all in vain, though aided by the government in the sum of $150,000."

And the "Commercial" observes—"There are circumstances connected with the failure of the Bank of Maryland, which will require an immediate investigation by the senate. The bank of Maryland was latterly a political bank. Having extended itself, through the patronage of the government, it has at last met the consequences of a dependence on executive wisdom and interference with the currency," &c.

We [Register] had not before heard any thing of this transaction—but, if the facts stated are true, it will only shew that the likeness of the names of the bank of Maryland and of the Union bank of Maryland, has caused another mistake—the latter having been charged with making a loan of $50,000 to Mr. Barry, P. M. G. which had been made by the former.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

March 21. After some other business—

Memorials were presented by the following members praying for the restoration of the deposits, &c. by Mr. Clay from upwards of 3,000 persons, clerks of mercantile men, and others engaged in trade, in the city of New York; also by the same from a large number of traders from ten different states on the valley of the Mississippi, who happened lately to be in Philadelphia, laying in their stock of goods for the season; five by Mr. Southard, one from three of the banks of New Jersey, and the others from the counties of Mountbath, Gloucester and Hurlingham; and three by Mr. Kent, from the banks of Frederick and Washington counties. All which were severally read, referred to the committee on finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ering submitted the following resolution:
Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to examine and report upon the present condition of the post office department, and that they have power to send for persons and papers to take testimony for that purpose; and that the secretary of the senate shall, on application of the committee, appoint a clerk to attend them.

[This resolve lies on the table.]

The chair communicated a report from the state department shewing the number of American seamen registered up to the last quarter of the year 1833.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the order of the day, being the bill to continue for a limited time, the charter of the United States bank; when

Mr. Calthoun addressed the senate at large upon the questions brought into view by the bill. After he concluded, Mr. Benton addressed the senate, until near 4 o'clock, when, without concluding, having yielded the floor, the senate adjourned.

March 22. Mr. Poindexter presented the petition of John Cummings, of Ohio, praying to be relieved from losses sustained by him in consequence of a fraud committed by one of the United States land officers; which was referred to the committee on public lands.

Mr. Webster presented the proceedings of a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Franklin county, Pennsylvania, also a memorial from the inhabitants of the same county signed by upwards of 1,800 voters, complaining of the distress caused by the experiment of the government, and asking a restoration of the deposits, &c. Mr. W. in presenting the above made some eloquent remarks descriptive of the character of the signers of the memorial, the productions of the county, and of their depreciated value, &c.; and amongst other things stated that it contained 10 or 12 forges; that there were upwards of 4,000 persons engaged in the manufacture of iron; that, in addition to these manufacturers, there were others engaged in paper making; that all had been compelled to disuiss or decrease their hands; that the agriculturists had also come in for their share of loss; that corn and rye could hardly be got rid of at Chambersburgh at any price; the loss on wheat, the great product of the county, was 30 cents per bushel; and that clover seed another great product, had fallen from $6 to $4 per bushel.

Mr. Forsyth presented the memorial of 300 citizens of Petersburg, Va. approving the removal of the deposits.

Mr. Leitch bore testimony to the respectability of many of the signers of the memorial, but doubted whether there were as many as 300 voters in Petersburg; he then presented the memorial of the citizens of Princess Anne county, Va.

Mr. Robbins presented two memorials against removing the deposits, one from Newport, the other from Smithfield, R. Island. The above proceedings and memorials were severally read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ering reported a bill to settle the boundary line of the state of Ohio, which was read and ordered to a second reading.

"Nor as yet (Friday evening) have we heard the statement either affirmed or denied. We have, however, reasons to believe that the whole is a mistake, as to time and circumstances, at least.

The senate then proceeded to the order of the day, being the leave on Mr. Webster's bill for continuing the charter of the bank of the United States, when

Mr. Benton resumed his remarks, and concluded about a quarter past 3 o'clock; when

Mr. White rose and said he wished to express his sentiments on this question, and would do so then, or on Monday next as might be the pleasure of the senate.

Mr. Wright stated there was much business of an executive nature before the senate, and expressed a wish that the senator from Tennessee would defer his remarks till Monday. After some remarks by Messrs. Clay and Webster, on motion of Mr. Wright, the senate went into executive business; and after the doors were reopened, the senate adjourned.

March 24. Mr. Webster presented a memorial signed by 900 inhabitants of the town of Lynn, Mass. remonstrating against the removal of the deposits, and praying for their restoration to the bank of the United States. Mr. W. said that the town of Lynn was beautifully situated, is highly industrious, and had been hitherto prosperous and flourishing. With a population of 8,000 souls, its great business was the manufacture of shoes; that 3,000 persons, men, women and children, are engaged in this manufacture. They make and sell ordinarily, two millions of pairs of shoes a year, for which, at 75 cents per pair, they receive 1,500,000 dollars; that they consume half a million of dollars worth of leather, a large portion of which was procured at Philadelphia and Baltimore. The largest number of votes ever known to have been given in Lynn was 1,050, and 900 had signed the memorial. He stated that the manufacturers of Lynn sent their articles to every state in the union; for the proceeds of the sales they draw their bills on time, discount them and receive the cash. They had heretofore found no difficulty in cashing their bills at three fourths of one per cent. though drawn on the most distant places. But the executive government has broke up all this, and these manufacturers sell their bills now at a discount of three per cent., thus losing two dollars and a quarter in every hundred by losing the former facilities of exchange. In the present state of things, the manufacturers are unwilling to buy stock, and afraid to enter into any new engagements. They cannot therefore employ labor as formerly, and a state of confusion and embarrassment has consequently ensued. Three hundred hands have been dismissed from employment, since the date of the memorial, and others must be dismissed. "When (asked Mr. W.) will this foolish experiment be abandoned?" All men may commit errors, but wise men, and candid men, will retract them, so soon as they see them to be errors. They will not adhere to errors in spite of experience, and grow more obstinate and more angry, in proportion as that error becomes more and more manifest. The country, said Mr. W. must be saved; and the people must save it by compelling those who have adopted ruinous measures to retract their steps.

The memorial was then referred, and ordered to be printed. The chair presented the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting held in York county, Pa. approving the conduct of the executive in removing the deposits from the bank of the United States. The chair stated that this was a printed paper transmitted to him by the committee appointed by the meeting; that it was the same paper which had been presented to the senate some days since, with the exception of the preamble which had been expunged, and which the senate had refused to receive. The committee, (the chair said) had expressed their regrets that they were not authorised by the meeting to make any alterations in the proceedings; and the senate would, therefore, be left to decide whether the paper was proper to be received.

Mr. Clay inquired of the chair whether the paper was couched in respectful language, and such as was proper to be presented to the senate?

The chair would not undertake to decide that question. The reception of the paper was then opposed by Messrs. Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Poindexter, Ewing and Southard, and seconded by Messrs. King, Wright, Preston and Kane.

The ground on which the reception of the paper was resisted was, that it was incumbent on every person, under the rules which govern deliberative bodies, in presenting a paper, to state that its language was respectful, and such as might be received; and that the chair had expressly declined giving any statement as to the contents of this paper.

On motion of Mr. Frelinghuysen the paper was then laid on the table.

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Webster's bill to continue the charter of the bank of the U. States, when Mr. White, of Tennessee, addressed the senate until half past 5 o'clock, without coming to a conclusion, when he yielded the floor and the senate adjourned.

March 25. Mr. Mangum presented a memorial from the village of Wilkesboro, in the western part of the state of North Carolina, complaining of the violation of law and assumption of power by the executive, in the removal of the deposits. On the authority of a letter he stated that nine-tenths of the memorialists had recently been the friends of the administration and in favor of general Jackson.

He also presented a similar memorial from the citizens of Halifax county, North Carolina. Both memorials were read and referred.

Mr. Clay rose and said that he had heard, and he presumed that every member of the senate had heard, that yesterday the bank of Maryland, situated in Baltimore, had stopped payment. He stated further, that he had heard, that, in consequence of a connection, supposed or actual, between that bank and the Union bank of Maryland, one of the banks selected by the treasury department as a depository of the public revenue, there was, yesterday, a run on the latter bank to obtain metallic currency for the paper in their hands. The connection between the two banks seemed so intimate, that great danger was apprehended as to the stability of the Union bank. He also stated that by the official returns made by the treasury department, it appeared that the secretary of the treasury was a stockholder to a considerable extent; that he had heard the stock held by the secretary in that institution constituted a considerable part of his property. He expressed a hope it would turn out that the Union bank was in a safe condition, and that there were no just grounds for the apprehension which existed as to its safety, and hoped it would also appear that the secretary of the treasury was not a stockholder in this bank to any extent which would authorise an impression that he had suffered his own interests to enter into the considerations which led him to select this bank as one of the depositories of the public money.

He had also heard this morning that a treasury draught or treasury draughts, to the amount of $150,000, had, in the course of a few days, been furnished to the Union bank of Maryland, by the secretary of the treasury. He, therefore, considered it the official duty of the senate to inquire into the facts, whether there was any danger to the public interests in that institution. And to that end submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union bank of Maryland, and on what account it was deposited; and whether any treasury draughts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, to enable it to meet any demands which might be made upon it.*

This motion to consider the resolution requiring the unanimous consent of the senate—

Mr. Forsyth objecting, it was laid over until to-morrow. Mr. Clayton presented certain resolutions of a large public meeting of silversmiths, watchmakers, jewellers, &c. of the city of Philadelphia, praying for the restoration of the deposits—which was read, referred and ordered to be printed.

The senate then took up the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the states of Ohio, &c. as in committee of the whole, which, after being amended, was laid on the table.

The senate next proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the leave asked by Mr. Webster to introduce his bill continuing the charter of the bank of the United States: when

Mr. White resumed his speech and concluded at 4 o'clock: when

Mr. Clay obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. Webster, who rose and said, that he had seen with regret a disposition to enter into a wide debate upon the whole merits of the conduct of the administration, upon a mere motion for leave to bring in a bill; the effect of which course of proceeding would be, to put off the vote on Mr. Clay's resolutions. He could not concur in promoting that object, and as he had now answered his own purpose, which simply was to present a specific measure for the consideration of congress and the country, he should move to lay it upon the table, that Mr. Clay's resolutions might be acted on, and accordingly moved that his motion

*The Union bank, on the 26th inst. after quoting Mr. Clay's speech, of which the preceding is a brief abstract, issued the following notice:

"There is no foundation whatever for the rumor that any other connection has ever existed between the bank of Maryland and the Union bank of Maryland, than has existed between the Union bank of Maryland and other banks in the city of Baltimore.

"It is not a fact that, in consequence of any (supposed) connection between the Union bank of Maryland and the bank of Maryland, a treasury draught or treasury draughts to the amount of $150,000 (or for any other amount), have, in the course of the last few days, been furnished to the Union bank of Maryland, by the secretary of the treasury? No such draughts having been received since October last. Nor has there been any occasion for such funds; the means of the Union bank being amply sufficient to discharge all the claims against it, as they may be demanded.

"The board feel reluctant thus to appear before the public; but find themselves compelled to do so, by a sense of duty to the stockholders, at a time when unfounded rumors are in circulation, in prejudice of the institution.

or leave be laid on the table, giving notice that he should again call it up on the first Monday in May.

Mr. Forsyth asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, King, of Geo. Mangum, Moore, Nau-dain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, of Alabama, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tip-ton, White, Wilkins, Wright—15.

So the motion was laid on the table.

Mr. Clay then asked if the senator from N. York, Mr. Wright, desired to say any thing on the subject of his resolutions, if not that he should say a word or two in reply to those who had spoken.

Mr. Wright answering in the affirmative, the senate adjourned.

March 26. Mr. Southard presented the proceedings of a meeting of 5,000 young men of Philadelphia, opposed to the course of the secretary of the treasury in removing the deposits.

Mr. Preston presented the proceedings of 4,627 young men of the same place, in favor of the restoration of the deposits.

The special order of the day, being the report of the committee on finance on Mr. Clay's resolution upon the removal of the deposits, was then taken up, and

Mr. Wright rose and spoke at large, sustaining the secretary. When he had concluded,

Mr. Clay obtained the floor, and intimated that if it was the wish of any gentleman to address the senate, he would yield the privilege. No senator rising, Mr. Clay moved an adjournment, but gave way to Mr. Poindexter, upon whose motion the senate went into executive business; and after some time spent therein adjourned.

March 27. Mr. King, of Geo. presented a memorial signed by about 400 persons, citizens of Augusta, Georgia, praying for the restoration of the deposits to, and for the recharter of, the bank of the United States.

Mr. Clay presented a similar memorial from the citizens of Lexington and the county of Fayette, Kentucky, signed by upwards of 1,200 persons.

Mr. Clay, in presenting the memorial, said, that the memorialists were composed of numbers of his friends and neighbors; some of whom he had known for forty years—by individuals embracing all the various callings of life, mechanics, manufacturers, farmers, merchants, and the great body of men of business of those places.

It was true that the memorialists did not speak of any great present pressure in their portion of the country; they spoke of the approach of great distress, and expressed their apprehensions that it would increase.

After paying them an eloquent compliment, he said they had their apprehensions excited by what they deemed an assault on the constitution and laws of the country. If, said he, there be a spot in the union likely to be exempt from the calamities that had afflicted the others, it would be that region about Lexington and its immediate neighborhood. Nowhere, to no other country, has Providence been more bountiful in its gifts. He stated that it yielded from 60 to 70 bushels of corn to the acre; but there were 6,000 fat bullocks remaining unsold because the butchers could not obtain the usual facilities from the banks to purchase—thus $100,000 worth of this species of property remained on hand.

The above memorials were read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster gave notice that he would call up his bill extending the charter of the bank of the United States, on the 21st of April.

Mr. Wilkins presented the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting of citizens of the town and county of Beaver, Pennsylvania, praying for a recharter of the bank, with certain modifications, for a restoration of the deposits, and disapproving of the late message of governor Wolf, commending the conduct of Mr. Duane, and censuring that of Messrs. Wilkins and McKean.

Mr. Wilkins said it gave him pleasure to present these proceedings, though they rapt him and his colleague over the knuckles, and though he dissented from their opinions.

The proceedings were referred and ordered to be printed. Mr. Wilkins, reported the army appropriation bill without amendment.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on finance on Mr. Clay's resolutions, when Mr. Clay arose and addressed the senate, and, after speaking two hours without concluding his remarks, he gave way to a motion that that effect, and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 21. Various bills of a private nature being reported and disposed of.

The bill to continue the Cumberland road from the Mississippi river to Jefferson, in the state of Missouri, and the bill to continue the same road from Vandalia, in Illinois, to the Mississippi river, were read, respectively, and referred to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

The resolution of Mr. Mardis was further discussed by Mr. Burges, until the expiration of the hour, and then the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, &c. was taken up.

Mr. Gilmer, of Geo. then addressed the house in opposition to a restoration of the deposits, and concluded at half past 2 o'clock, when no motion of Mr. Clay, the house adjourned.

Saturday, March 22. Motions were respectively made to suspend the rules of the house to take up certain bills, which failed, or were withdrawn.

The bill to return the duties on certain pieces of sculpture, the capitals of the columns of the exchange at Philadelphia, was then read the third time, and rejected by a vote of yeas 45, nays 135; and the house adjourned.

Monday, March 24. The order of the morning being the consideration of the Virginia resolutions, the house took up the same, when, Mr. Pinckney, who had the floor, being absent, the resolutions were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The chair then resumed the call of the states for the presentation of petitions and memorials; when

Memorials, petitions, proceedings of meetings, &c. were presented in favor of the restoration of the deposits and the recharter of the bank; by the following persons—by Mr. Hard from citizens of New York; by Mr. Selden from 600 citizens of Brooklyn, New York; by Mr. Fildmore from the citizens of Buffalo, New York; by Mr. Skinn from the president and directors of the state bank of Camden, the Cumberland bank of Bridgeport, and the Farmers bank of N. Jersey; and from the citizens of Gloucester county, and another county, in New Jersey; by Mr. Lee from a meeting of the citizens of Cumberland county, New Jersey; by Mr. Wagener from citizens of Northampton county, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Miller from citizens of Cumberland county, Pennsylvania; thirteen memorials by Mr. Heister from about 750 [additional] citizens of Lancaster county; by Mr. Chambers from a meeting of the citizens of Franklin county, Pennsylvania; from the inhabitants of the township of Washington in the same county, also from other inhabitants of the county, signed in all by upwards of 1,800 voters; by Mr. Binney from a meeting of building mechanics of the city and county of Philadelphia; by the same from a meeting of tin-plate workers, sheet iron workers and coppersmiths of the city of Philadelphia; by the same from a meeting of cabinet makers, piano forte makers, chair makers, upholsters, fancy finishers, fringe makers, carvers, gilders, varnishers, turners, lamp makers, coach makers, and others engaged in furnishing materials and labor connected with these arts, in the city and county of Philadelphia; by the same from authors, editors, booksellers, publishers, printers, book binders, paper makers, paper dealers, stationers, engravers, copper plate printers, type and stereotype foundry, printing press makers, and ink manufacturers, in the city of Philadelphia; by the same, the proceedings of a meeting of young men of the city and county of Philadelphia; by Mr. Banks from a meeting of inhabitants of the county of Beaver, in the state of Pennsylvania, by Mr. Henry King from farmers, iron masters, storekeepers, mechanics and others, residing in the lower part of the county of Schuylkill, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Wadnough from a meeting of citizens of Oxford, Lower Dublin, Byberry, Morand and unincorporated Northern Liberties of the county of Philadelphia; by the same from a meeting of the citizens of the third congressional district of Pennsylvania; by the same from another meeting of citizens of the same district. Mr. Wadnough presented, also, a memorial of citizens of the third congressional district in the state of Pennsylvania, complaining of a misrepresentation attending the presentation to the house, on the 3d of March, instant, of a memorial from certain citizens of said third congressional district, as to the number of signers, and representing that many hundred of said signatures were duplicates. The said memorials, so presented on the 3d, though stated by Mr. Sutherland to contain 4,000 signatures, upon strict examination were found to have but 1,497 names in all; of which, 467 were duplicates. So that the real number of signers, instead of being, as alleged, 4,000 was, in reality, but 1,050. Mr. W. laid a synopsis of these signatures before the house, and moved for its printing, together with the memorial he presented. Mr. Sutherland, having obtained leave to reply, gave the authority on which he had made his former statement, but admitted that there must have been some mistake. The duplicate signatures he accounted for from different copies of the memorial having been circulated, and the signatures to each, by accident, put together. To show how easily this might occur, he referred to about ninety names in the memorial presented some days since by Mr. Binney, which were to be found in similar succession in two different portions of the roll of signatures. Some further explanations took place, which we do not undertake to give in detail, but which resulted in a request from Mr. Binney that Mr. Sutherland would send to the clerk an exact list of the names he had referred to, as Mr. Wadnough had done in reference to the memorial presented by Mr. Sutherland. By Mr. Anthony, two memorials from Lycoming county, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Harper from a meeting of silver smiths, watch makers and jewelers of the city and county of Philadelphia; by Mr. Stewart the memorial of inhabitants of Brownsville and vicinity, in Pennsylvania; by Mr. Gaultcraft from inhabitants of Crawford county, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Barnitz, (a protest from 70 citizens of York county, against the proceedings of a meeting held on the 4th March); by Mr. Wise from citizens of Northampton county, Virginia; by the same from citizens of Accomac county, Virginia; by Mr. Mason from merchants, manufacturers, mechanics and other citizens of the town of Peterburgh, Virginia; by Mr. Loyall from inhabitants of Princess Anne county, Virginia; by Mr. Patton from inhabitants of the towns of Fredericksburgh and Falmouth, Virginia; by Mr. Cage from inhabitants of Wilkinson county, Mississippi; by the same from inhabitants of Adams county, Mississippi.

All the above memorials, proceedings, &c. were read, referred to the committee of ways and means and ordered to be printed, with the exception of the one presented by Mr. Barnitz from York county, Pa. which was ordered to be printed and laid on the table, and those by Mr. Cage, from Mississippi, which were simply presented and not disposed of.

Memorials, petitions and resolutions against a restoration of the public deposits to the bank of the U. States, and against a renewal of the charter of said bank, were presented as follows, viz:

By Mr. Page from inhabitants of the county of Otsego, New York; by Mr. McVean from a meeting of inhabitants of the county of Montgomery, New York; by Mr. Dickerson from manufacturers, mechanics, merchants and farmers of Paterson and its vicinity, New Jersey; by Mr. Lee from a meeting of citizens of Cumberland county, New Jersey; by Mr. Miller from a meeting of citizens of Carlisle and vicinity, Pa.; by Mr. Sutherland from citizens of unincorporated Penn township, Pa; by the same from a meeting of citizens of Philadelphia; by Mr. Galbraith from inhabitants of Crawford county, Va.; by Mr. Mason from inhabitants of the town of Petersburg, Va.; by Mr. Wise from a meeting of inhabitants of Matthews county, Va.; by Mr. Lytle from a convention of inhabitants of Hamilton county, Ohio; by Mr. Leacell two memorials from inhabitants of the state of Ohio; by Mr. Parker sundry resolutions adopted by the general assembly of New Jersey adhering to the resolutions passed by them on the 11th January last; by Mr. Barnitz certain resolutions passed at a meeting held in York, Pa.

All the above memorials, &c. were read, referred to the committee of ways and means and ordered to be printed, except the last which was ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. Peyton, of Va. moved a resolution calling upon the secretary of war for all the correspondence since March 4, 1829, relative to a removal or change of the pension office from the bank of the United States, and its several branches, to any of the local banks.

After attending to various other matters connected with post routes, or of a private and personal character, there being but forty-seven members present, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, March 25. Mr. Chinn reported a bill to complete the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. Ashley, of Missouri, having obtained leave, presented a memorial from certain merchants, citizens of the western states, convened at Philadelphia, praying for a restoration of the deposits and a recharter of the bank.

Mr. Burges, who had the floor on Mr. Mardis' resolution on the subject of the deposits, waived his right, in order that the states might be called for memorials and petitions.

The house having granted leave,

The chair resumed the call of the states, commencing with Mississippi.

Mr. Cage moved that the resolutions which he presented yesterday from certain citizens of Mississippi be laid on the table and be printed.

Mr. Plummer asked leave to address the house, in order to express his dissent to the doctrines of the resolutions.

Mr. Cage withdrew his motion to lay them on the table, when Mr. Plummer moved to commit the resolutions to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report adversely to the prayer thereof; but the resolutions having, by mistake, been sent to the printer, the motion of Mr. P. was laid over until the next petition day.

The chair laid before the house a letter from Lieut. Levy, of the navy, presenting to the U. States a colossal bronze statue of Mr. Jefferson, which on motion of Mr. Fulton, of Va. was referred to the committee on the library, and ordered to be printed.

The house then took up the order of the day, being the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means on the subject of the removal of the deposits, when

Mr. Clay, of Ala. took the floor and spoke till 3 o'clock, and then, on motion of Mr. Schley, of Geo. the house adjourned.

Wednesday, March 26. The resolution submitted by Mr. Mardis, of Ala. relative to the public deposits was taken up, and

Mr. Burges resumed and concluded his remarks on the subject, when

Mr. Chilton Allan obtained the floor.

At one o'clock the house proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions reported by the committee of ways and means, &c.

Mr. Schley, of Geo. took the floor and addressed the house in support of the secretary. When Mr. S. concluded,

Mr. Ellsworth obtained the floor, and moved that the house adjourn, which motion was negative; but the motion to adjourn being renewed by Mr. McComes, after some explanations, the house adjourned.

Thursday, March 27. The resolution of Mr. Mardis on the subject of the public deposits was taken up, when

Mr. Chilton Allan addressed the house, in opposition thereto, until the hour expired without concluding, when

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, and

Mr. Ellsworth, of Conn. took the floor and spoke in opposition to the secretary of the treasury's reasons until past 3 o'clock, and having concluded,

Mr. Choate obtained the floor, and the house adjourned.

THE BALTIMORE COMMITTEE AND MR. McKIM.

The delegation appointed to visit the city of Washington, to present the memorial of the citizens of Baltimore, in favor of the restoration of the deposits, who made their report at the meeting in Monument square on the 5th instant, have found themselves compelled to appear again before the public, in answer to an attempt that has been made by the secretary of the treasury and one of the representatives from the city of Baltimore, to discredit the statements contained in the report referred to.

The delegation, consisting of individuals who have never coveted the honors of political preferment, who have for the most part but little mingled in the strifes and contentions which have unfortunately so much agitated our country, and whose lives have been engrossed in pursuits that left them small leisure and less desire for public affairs, were not prepared to expect that the duties they had reluctantly assumed, in visiting Washington, were to be subjected to such harsh imputations, as would put the delegation upon the necessity of vindicating, before their fellow citizens, their personal veracity and honor. In the excited state of the times, they had, it is true, good reason to believe that party exasperation would supply much severe comment upon the motives of the memorialists and upon the conduct of the delegation; and as citizens charged with an important trust, they were willing to abide the spleen of those who might be offended. But they did not suppose that facts, solemnly asserted under the extreme, however, they have already encountered from various quarters, in forms so authoritative as to compel them in their own defence, to throw themselves before their fellow townsmen, with such a statement as they hope will, amongst all who are acquainted with the delegation, leave the question of fact, at least, beyond controversy.

The unusual circumstance of appointing a special delegation to visit the seat of government in order to present the memorial, indicated the deep and momentous concern which the citizens of Baltimore felt in the past and in the pending measures of the government. The memorial itself expressed the language of extraordinary present distress and of anxious fear for the future welfare of the nation. In every quarter the disturbed and dismayed condition of the people, the frequency of public meetings, the intensity of the public discussions, and the sad forebodings which the wisest and best men in the nation had openly expressed, showed, too clearly to be mistaken, that great interests were at hazard—interests that involved something more than the personal calamities of individuals, and related to the permanency and integrity of our government. In such a state of things, the delegation were selected to proceed to the city of Washington. It was their duty, as they understood it, not only to present the memorial with which they were charged, but, also, to ascertain, as accurately as their inquiries might enable them, what were the sentiments of the prevailing party, both in and out of congress, in reference to the increasing distress of the times, and what were the hopes of change. In this interpretation of the purposes of their mission they could not neglect the obvious duty of holding communication, not only with members of both houses of congress, but, also, with such portions of the executive, as might be supposed to be able to communicate the authentic views of that party in whose hands, alone, the power to redress the people resided. They felt that, as American citizens, representing a large and respectable portion of the constituent body, they had a right to this information: that the genius of our government defied the concealment of the principles by which the public functionaries were regulated; and that as the halls of congress were open to petition, so should the executive department be open to the access of every citizen who respectfully approached it to make known the actual state of the country, and the influence of the public measures upon the welfare of the people. With this persuasion the delegation felt no delicacy in holding an interview with the president and his secretary of the treasury; and having done so, they reported the result of these interviews to their fellow citizens, as accurately as they are able to recollect them. And here they take leave to observe, that they do not recognize the doctrine that any public functionary, in this country, can, consistently with the principles of our government, claim to consider his communications to a committee of the people, in matters relating to great and important public measures, in the light of confidential disclosures, which they are not at liberty again to repeat—and more particularly is this remark applicable to the representatives of the people, in their relation with their own constituents. Ours is a government which professes to move in the light of public scrutiny. To comment upon the principles of those who administer it, whether in or out of congress, is a boasted prerogative of the people; and if the representative entertain doctrines, or is governed by motives of which his constituents are ignorant, the concealment of them is unworthy of his station. If by he of evil tendency, he is not fit for his place—if they be good, there can be no private reason to withhold them.

With these preliminary remarks, the delegation proceed to examine a letter, addressed by the honorable Roger B. Taney, secretary of the treasury, to Upon S. Health, esq. of this city, dated the 10th instant, and lately published in the newspapers of this city; an answer to which, it is proper to say, would have been sooner laid before the public, but for the absence of two of the delegation from the city.

Mr. Taney, from the particularity with which he remarks, that four of the gentlemen of the delegation were not present at the interview with him, seems to infer that the report had conveyed a different impression to the public; but it will be seen, by reference to the report itself, that the statement there given is, that "a part of the delegation" only called upon him. He complains that, in the conversation to which he was invited by Mr. Brown, one of the four who visited him, he had no reason to expect that it was designed for publication. He then proceeds to detail the substance of the conversation which he held with Mr. Brown, and with Messrs. Crawford and Gaither, having previously remarked that Mr. Patterson did not come into the room until near the close of the interview.

That part of the conversation, as detailed by the secretary, in which he asserts that Mr. Brown expressed himself opposed to the restoration of the deposits, the latter gentleman has undertaken to answer for himself, and expressly denies, (what would seem to be sufficiently incompatible in itself,) that he who went to Washington to ask for a restoration of the deposits, should have declared himself opposed to such a measure. The contradiction may be reconciled by adverting to the fact stated by Mr. Brown in his separate publication, namely, that his opinion was, that the future deposits should be made in the United States bank, an opinion which the secretary's statement does not controvert, and which may be assumed to be the common wish of the great mass of the people of the U. States, who are at present petitioning for their restoration. The fact also that Mr. Brown desired to see the charter of the bank modified, or a new bank erected in its place, is conformable to the known sentiments of that gentleman, though a matter of no interest to the mission upon which the delegation proceeded to Washington. It is a fact, however, which may serve to show that the measure of restoring the deposits is not so insupportably concerted in the minds of the people with the renewal of the present bank charter, as the public have been taught at Washington to believe.

Thus disposing of such part of the secretary's letter, as refers to Mr. Brown, the delegation cannot perceive much difference between the statements of Mr. Taney and those given in the report; and it will perhaps relieve the secretary from his suspicion that the confidence invited by Mr. Brown, has been violated, when the delegation assure the public that they have reported nothing that was not uttered after Mr. Patterson came into the room. The object of the delegation was in no respect unfriendly to Mr. Taney, nor did they seek to cast a censure upon him, nor expose him, in any degree to public animadversion. His sentiments had been already given in an official form to the nation, and had been so largely canvassed that no one could be supposed to be ignorant of them. It was, therefore, not a subject of their concern, to repeat Mr. Taney's views as declared to Mr. Brown, in regard to his conceptions of the danger and abuses of the powers of the bank. The principal object of their visit to the secretary was to communicate to him their own knowledge of the public distress, of their conviction of the source from which it sprang, and to learn from him whether, with the evidences before his eyes of the unpredicted and fatal consequences of his own error of policy, this department of the executive still adhered to the determination of maintaining the unfortunate position it had previously assumed. His answer to this communication was all that it interested the signers to know, and it was to this point, accordingly, that they directed their attention. Mr. Taney was informed, by the chairman of the delegation, in what capacity they visited him, and they cannot but feel surprised that the secretary should have supposed that an answer so pregnant of interest to the nation should not be duly and faithfully reported. They have so reported it. Mr. Taney had spoken to them of the experiment—although his letter does not admit this phrase—and had said that it would be continued regardless of the present difficulties; upon which Mr. Patterson, conceiving this to be the great and paramount question before the people, addressed the remark to the secretary—"Sir, if this experiment should be persisted in; and some relief—such as we do not now anticipate—should not be given, a large portion of the trading community must fail." The secretary's reply was—"If all did fail the policy of the government would not be changed." To the verbal accuracy of this language, on both sides, the gentlemen of the committee present, now, after mature deliberation, give their most solemn declaration. And they beg again to repeat that all that is contained in their report was, in substance, communicated to them by Mr. Taney, at that stage of the conference at which Mr. Patterson was present—this gentleman now affirming to his recollection of all therein contained.

In making this communication, the delegation think the citizens of Baltimore will perceive that there is no substantial difference between their report, and the admitted views of Mr. Taney, as declared by himself—although the secretary has somewhat softened the import of the language used by him. He still, however, does not deny that he may have used the exact expressions imputed to him by the delegation—and with this explanation the delegation are willing to dismiss the subject; taking the occasion at the same time, to protest that they never supposed they were violating a private confidence, in reporting what they heard—and also, to assure Mr. Taney that they approached him and left him with sentiments of private respect unchanged by the interview—regarding the communication he had made to them, as the deliberate and approved course of the executive, guided, doubtless, by its own sense of the public good, and of the importance of its policy.

The delegation proceed to consider the letter addressed by Isaac McKim, esq. to the citizens of the fifth congressional district, dated on the 15th instant.

This letter, they are sorry to remark, indicates a degree of temper on the part of the writer, that has led him into imputations upon the delegation, which, perhaps, in a cooler moment, he will regret. The duty of a representative to submit to a scrutiny of his public character, conveys an obligation too vital to the liberty of the people, to justify the exhibition of resentment against any constituent who demands the inquiry. The representative is entitled to personal respect—to fair examination—and to impartial judgment—he is entitled to be protected, as in this community he most assuredly would be, against false accusations and misapprehension;—but he is not entitled to the veil of secrecy to cover his opinions, or screen his acts from public review. The people—and, especially, in times when it is important that their voice should be truly heard in the public councils—have a right to inquire, and to speak; and commensurate with their right to inquire, is it the representative's duty to submit to the investigation.

The delegation make these observations, because, in the part they have had to perform, it has been their misfortune to hear from Mr. McKim, the imputation of a design to bring in the enjoyment of social relations with that gentleman, which has won from them their private regard, and that it is doing violence to their personal sentiments, when Mr. McKim attributes to them any other motive or impulse, in making their report, than those which strictly belong to their regard for truth, and to their sense of duty to the citizens, by whom they were deputed to visit the seat of government. Their veracity, however, having been most unaccountably challenged by Mr. McKim, they feel no hesitation in encountering his letter with a statement which they feel assured the citizens of Baltimore will not discredit—and, in the beginning, they earnestly reaffirm the entire and scrupulous truth of the statement heretofore submitted to the public.

Before the delegation enter upon the examination of Mr. McKim's letter, they will pause to dispose of one objection which, from the phraseology used by him, would seem to imply an exception to the right of the signers of the memorial to expect from him either accountability to them as a representative, or his aid in presenting the memorial to congress. His letter is addressed to the citizens of "the fifth congressional district," including a portion only of the citizens of Baltimore; and he speaks of being "wantonly assailed by a committee opposed to the present administration of the government, deputed, in great part, from a neighboring congressional district, and that a public meeting convened without the limits of his district." It is scarcely necessary to say more to this objection, than that a very respectable number of his own immediate constituents had signed the memorial, and that two of them, Captains Graham and Mr. Hubbard, (the latter of whom was protected by his engagements in the city council from accompanying his colleagues), were appointed on the delegation. To this fact may be added, Mr. McKim's notification to the delegation that he was expected to present the counter memorial—and that he did subsequently present it, although that memorial was also signed, in great part, by citizens of "the neighboring district;" and the meeting of its signers was also convened out of the limits of Mr. McKim's district: a fact that at once refutes the sincerity of the objection intimated above. The delegation now purpose to examine the statements contained in Mr. McKim's letter.

By that document it will be perceived that Mr. McKim's interviews with the members of the delegation, are described as having taken place, first in his own parlor, and secondly, in the parlor of the delegation. The individuals of the delegation present at his own parlor interviews are stated by him to be Mr. Howell, on the night of the 10th, and Messrs. Birkhead and Graham separately on the morning of the 11th. By the same statement, his visit to the delegation in their own room took place on the night of the 11th and lasted about an hour, he says the person there present were Mr. Crawford, Mr. Patterson, Capt. Graham, Mr. Brown, Mr. Gaither and Mr. Slaw. To the two last of which gentlemen he was then introduced. The delegation will add, what Mr. McKim has forgotten, that Mr. Birkhead was also present and conversed with him some time, and that the visit of Mr. McKim lasted for upwards of two hours.

From the long detail contained in Mr. McKim's letter of the conferences held by him in his own parlor, with the members of the delegation who were his personal friends; from the frequent stress which is laid upon the proffered hospitality of his table; from his announcement that these interviews were in the presence of his family; from the emphasis with which he insists that he may be excused from relating the conversation that passed at dinner; and, above all, from the tenor of his concluding remarks, insinuating the private and confidential character of these disclosures, and his aversion to the "moral and social code" of the delegation—from all these circumstances, the inference intended to be raised by Mr. McKim is too plain to escape notice. They are all directed to convey to the public one conclusion—namely, that the gentlemen referred to approached him under the mask of friendship, artfully insinuating themselves into the secrets of his bosom, and whilst accepting the hospitality of his table, or the privileges of his family sanctuary, were conspiring to betray him, by the promulgation of falsehoods to the public. It will be seen before this reply is concluded, with what propriety these insinuations are thrown out.

Mr. McKim purports to give what he calls the "history" of what took place between himself and the delegation—meaning, of course, (as, in such circumstances, it was his duty to give), a faithful narrative of every thing that he could remember. It is upon this narrative that he invokes the public judgment; and, in the beginning of his letter, confesses that if the report of the delegation be true he is "unfit to be the representative of a free and enlightened people." It is upon this issue that the delegation now present themselves to the public.

The delegation take this occasion earnestly to remark, that, in the report made by them to the citizens of Baltimore, they have not stated one word, nor referred, by the remotest allusion, to one expression used by Mr. McKim any where but in their own room. Mr. Howell, who visited Mr. McKim in his parlor, was not requested to make that visit, nor was he commissioned to speak the sentiments of the delegation. No report was made by Mr. Howell to the rest of the delegation, except a casual remark, importing that Mr. McKim did not wish to present the memorial—a remark that was not repeated in the report. His visit was regarded by the delegation as entirely private, and he did not feel himself at liberty to detail, especially for the public ear, any thing that was there uttered by Mr. McKim.

It is true that Capt. Graham, being Mr. McKim's immediate constituent, was deputed with Mr. Birehead to call on Mr. McKim, on the morning of the 11th, and inform him that the delegation had arrived; but nothing that passed between these gentlemen and the representative was incorporated into the report. Indeed, so great has been the reluctance of the delegation to say any thing of Mr. McKim's opinions, except as they referred to the immediate subject of their mission, that they have in their report scrupulously omitted many particulars which, although properly subject to public remark, were of such a nature as to indicate a want of due reflection on his part, and for that reason alone were withheld from the report.

With this statement it cannot but be seen how very unjust is the attempt of Mr. McKim to enlist the public sympathy in his favor, by endeavoring to cast upon the delegation the implied offence of violating the confidence of his friends. He has, however, in his letter, broken this seal of confidence, and published to the world for the first time, the conversation he had held with Mr. Howell. As this conversation is now referred to, somewhat in the light of an official answer to an official communication—a character which Mr. Howell certainly never gave it, it is proper to say that it is in general a true statement, except that Mr. McKim (according to Mr. Howell's recollection), instead of saying that "he would risk his life and fortune rather than betray the trust which his constituents had delegated to him"—remarked that he would encounter this risk "rather than abandon the course of the administration"—a remark which he reiterated in the room of the delegation. The delegation repeat that no part of this conversation ever entered into the report.

From Mr. McKim's "history" of the case, it would seem that the only occasion on which he had any conversation with any members of the delegation regarding the immediate object of their visit to Washington, was in his own parlor; since he declares that when he visited the delegation in their room on the night of the 11th, (where he remained, according to his own statement, an hour, and, according to that of the delegation, upwards of two hours) he had only a general conversation about the state of the money market, the bank and the pressure—but not a word, that he can remember, "about presenting the memorial." If this be correct, it is a little strange that Mr. McKim should consider the communication he had in his own parlor relating to the presentation of the memorial, confidential, since it is, according to his own testimony, the only occasion on which the subject was opened to him by any member of the delegation. Mr. McKim, however, the delegation affirm, is altogether in mistake—and as his "history" is written to enable the public to decide the important issue which he himself has tendered, it might naturally be expected that a little more particularity should have been indulged as regards the conversations and events of this visit.

As it was at this visit to the delegation in their own parlor, that Mr. McKim expressed himself in the language ascribed to him in the report, the delegation feel themselves authorised to refer to so much of the conversation that passed there, as may be necessary to recall to Mr. McKim, more explicitly than they have heretofore done, the subjects that were then brought into discussion. And as Mr. McKim is not only silent in his letter as to what passed on this occasion, but also expressly negatives the statement heretofore made by the delegation, they take the opportunity to reaffirm, in the most impressive language, the perfect truth of that statement, and to declare that all there reported and much more, was uttered by Mr. McKim at this visit; and consequently that the visit was not of so informal and unimportant a character as the letter would leave the public to suppose.

When Mr. McKim entered the room of the delegation, he inquired for the chairman. It is true, as Mr. McKim states, that the chairman did not introduce the subject of presenting the memorial—because, from what Mr. Howell had intimated the night before, the delegation were led to believe that Mr. McKim did not wish to present it. But Mr. McKim himself introduced the subject, and gave the reasons for not presenting the memorial already detailed in the report. It may assist his memory to recall this circumstance, so strenuously denied by him, to refer to a fact, the announcement of which particularly struck the attention of the members of the delegation to whom it was addressed: Mr. McKim stated to the chairman, amongst other reasons for not presenting the memorial—that it was the custom, on such occasions to make a long speech—that this would be expected of him by the delegation, and therefore he would have to make one, which he could do, but he had been advised not to make speeches, because it would hurt his influence in the house. He further remarked, as an additional reason, that he would be called on to present the counter memorial, which he expected in a few days; and he said other things bearing on the same subject, which the delegation do not choose to repeat, being too confident in their own recollections, to allow themselves an instant of doubt as to the accuracy of their statement.

Mr. McKim has, by his silence, also denied his opposition to the policy of the removal of the deposits. The delegation, in addition to the statement in their report, say, that Mr. McKim had his attention drawn to this subject, when he candidly avowed his opposition to the measure, and said that he had written letters against it, which were read in the cabinet; and, moreover, that in Baltimore, he had urged Amos Kendall not to do it—at all events, until after his election. These remarks were followed by his declarations relating to his influence with the executive, as detailed in the report; and also of his own knowledge of the distress existing in Baltimore, which, he said, he had not made known, as he thought it might injure the city—illustrating his remark, at the same time, with a proverb which it is not necessary to repeat—and declaring, as a further reason, that he was not going to admit the distress to the Yankee members of congress. His expression, at this interview, in regard to Mr. Bibb, of which, "for the present, he contents himself with a positive denial"—the delegation now emphatically reassert, as made by him, on this occasion, to Mr. Patterson and the chairman Mr. Crawford.

These remarks were made by Mr. McKim during the interview, to portions of the delegation, as the conversation respecting the objects of the mission led to these topics; and although not all heard by each member of the delegation, yet they were sufficiently general to remove any pretext for the supposition that they were intended to be confidential, or to express any other than the public sentiments and opinions of the representatives, and too explicitly declared to admit of the possibility of misapprehension.

The delegation regret that they should be put so distinctly upon the defence of their own veracity, as to make it necessary to repeat assertions heretofore given to the world under their own hands. But they trust their fellow citizens will perceive that no alternative was left them but to take up the issue presented to them by Mr. McKim. In doing so, they have exhibited the case so strongly as, for the present, it is necessary to do. They have shown that Mr. Kim is entirely mistaken, in supposing any confidence of private friendship has been violated, that the interview with him was upon his own call, in the parlor of the delegation, and that he has not given in his letter any particulars of the conversation which occurred there, whilst he has filled it with conversations which the delegation did not report: that his memory, as to what occurred in the parlor of the delegation, is treacherous and cannot be depended upon; whilst the recollection of the several members of the delegation of such parts of the conversation as fell within their hearing, is accurate and fresh, and warrants them severally, in giving the most solemn avouch to the public, of the truth of their previous report, and of the facts herein added to it.

With this explanation they desire to take leave of the subject, confidently relying upon their credit and character with their fellow citizens, to whom they beg permission to add, notwithstanding recent attempts to discredit other parts of their report, that upon a deliberate review of the whole of that document, they are willing to pledge their honor and reputation for its entire and unexaggerated truth.

P. S. Since this reply has been prepared by the delegation, Mr. Brown, conceiving from the special manner in which he has been singled out by Mr. Taney for remark, and believing, from his being the only member of the delegation with whom Mr. McKim had no conversation, that he is the person referred to in that gentleman's letter, has thought it his duty to annex a separate reply in his own name.

For this reason, alone, Mr. Brown's name does not appear with the rest of the delegation, his separate reply being subjoined.

CARD.

In addition to the notice published on the 18th inst. of the statement made by Mr. Taney respecting the conversation referred to by him, as having taken place between him and myself at Washington, I consider it also my duty, under existing circumstances, to say, that so far as concerns my interview with Mr. McKim, if he alluded to me, he is correct in stating that I had no conversation with him—as I came into the committee room where he was when the interview between him and the delegation was nearly closed. But it is my duty further to state, that although I had not an opportunity myself to hear his remarks, yet from the representations of my colleagues immediately afterwards, and from my entire confidence in their veracity as gentlemen, I cannot entertain the slightest doubt of the statement made; and I do now, as I did when I signed the report, hold myself responsible in common with them, for the truth of every word therein stated. I have thought it necessary to make this separate statement, because I am the only person of the committee to whom Mr. McKim's remarks could apply, and I cheerfully submit my course to the public decision.

Baltimore, 19th March, 1834.

REPORT OF THE "UNION COMMITTEE" OF N. YORK
 Appointed by the meeting of the signers of the memorial to congress, held on the 11th day of February, 1834, at the Merchants' Exchange, in the city of New York.

The "union committee" appointed by the meeting of merchants and others (signers of the memorial to congress) held on the 11th day of February, 1834, at the Merchants' Exchange of New York, submit the following report: in which as the only means in their power of inducing a reconsideration of the subject by the state legislature, the committee have embodied their views respecting the removal of the public deposits and a national bank.

The committee, anxious in the first instance to ascertain the situation of the state banks and of the branch bank in this city, and the probable amount to which their accommodations might be extended, applied to them for that purpose. The banks have, almost universally, cheerfully complied with that request, although some delay has necessarily taken place; and the statement annexed to this report which exhibits their situation on the 1st of October, 1833, and the 1st of February, 1834, respectively, shows that, so far from any curtailment having taken place, the accommodations given by the banks have, during that period, been increased more than five millions of dollars, and on the 1st of Feb. amounted to almost forty millions of dollars.

On the 1st of October last the loans and discounts of the three banks, which have since been selected to collect the revenue of the U. States, amounted to	$0,189,593
Those of the other 16 banks, then in operation to	18,953,183
And those of the branch of the United States	6,180,833
	$34,323,609

On the 1st of February last those of the three selected banks amounted to	$13,769,552
Those of the 17 other city banks then in operation to	19,494,185
And those of the branch bank to	6,458,540
	$39,722,277

It was evident from that statement, that the city banks had extended their loans and discounts to the utmost extent consistent with their safety. The liabilities of the eighteen banks of which we have complete returns, including the aggregate amount of their circulation and public and private deposits, and deducting that of their own notes and checks drawn upon them, in the possession of the several banks, and not returned and exchanged till the ensuing morning, amounted on the 1st of February last, exclusively of the balances due to the banks out of the city, to $15,500,000; and the aggregate amount of specie in their vaults to 1,652,000 dollars. This proportion is known from experience to be sufficient in ordinary times, and will prove so now, so long as the amount of public deposits shall not be materially diminished; and especially at a time when there is not and cannot be any foreign demand for specie; but this amount of specie could not be sensibly lessened without endangering the safety of the banks.

Even if willing to encounter the risk of still further lessening the ratio of specie to liabilities payable on demand, it is not in the power of the banks to do it at pleasure; since the ability to extend their discounts beyond the amount of their capital, depends entirely on that of their circulation and deposits, and these are regulated by the wants of the community, and not by the operations of the banks. Should they, by a simultaneous effort, increase at this time their discounts by two millions of dollars, they must to the same extent issue an additional amount of bank notes, or open additional credits on their books (commonly called deposits) in favor of those whose notes they might discount; and by far the greater part of this excess of issues, or book credits, beyond the amount wanted to effect the payments of the city, would be almost instantaneously returned upon them, either by transfers of the surplus amount to other cities, or in some other way.

In the present state of public excitement and apprehension, the slightest incidents may produce fatal effects. An unfounded alarm as to the situation of the country banks, has shown the necessity imposed on those of the city to husband their resources. In that instance, we are gratified to find that the measures of relief which were immediately adopted have been attended with complete success; and that the banks of the interior by a salutary though painful curtailment of their issues, and by judicious measures for the redemption of their notes, enjoy now the same confidence as heretofore.

The preceding observations are strictly applicable to all the city banks which rely exclusively on their own resources. The late great increase in the amount of loans and discounts belongs almost entirely to the three banks selected to collect the public revenue, and is due partly to the increase of about one million of dollars in the amount of public deposits in this city since the first of August last; but principally to the fact that the selected banks have increased their discounts almost to the whole extent of the public moneys in their hands. Whether they will be able to continue their accommodations to the same amount depends on a contingency, which it is not yet in their power to ascertain, viz: whether their receipts derived from the United States revenue, which may be collected during the ensuing months at New York, will be equal to the amount of the treasury draughts for the public service during the same period.

The city of New York has had no reason to complain of the curtailments made here in its discounts by the bank of the United States. Notwithstanding a decrease of more than four millions of dollars in the amount of the public and private deposits in the New York branch since the first of August last, the loans and discounts here do not vary essentially from the amount allowed, either on the first of August or the first of October, 1833. But it was presumed that the same reasons which had induced the bank to strengthen this important place, had lost nothing of their force; and it was the opinion of the committee that the capital of two millions and a half, originally assigned to the branch of this city, which is but one-fourteenth part of the whole capital of the bank, was much less than is now due to the principal centre of the commerce and moneyed transactions of the country. Strong representations were therefore made for the purpose of obtaining from the bank positive assurances, that no diminution at least of their discounts, or in the purchase of bills of exchange, should take place in this city, and that the forbearance in calling for balances due by the city banks, should be continued to the same extent as heretofore, during the two ensuing months.

A disposition to comply with this request was early manifested, but an intervening incident induced the bank to postpone a definitive answer, which was not received till yesterday. It will be seen by this, that the bank of the United States accedes to the course proposed by the committee of correspondence, "that no diminution up to the first of May next, be made in the present amount of loans and discounts in the city and state of New York, and, if practicable, that an increase be made in the line of domestic bills of exchange, discounted at the office in that city, and that the bank will not call for the payment of such balances, as may become due to it by the city banks up to the first of May next;" it being understood that, in case the bank of the United States should become indebted to the city banks, a similar forbearance on their part is to be observed. The arrangement to be subject to be changed by the bank, in case of further hostile action of the executive, or any unforeseen event. Upon the whole, the committee entertain a confident hope that the accommodations now given by the banks will not be lessened during the ensuing months; but cannot hold out the expectation of any material increase. The only mode by which some relief can be obtained from that source, without increasing the liabilities of the banks payable on demand, which suggests itself, is some uniform plan for an increase of special deposits, bearing a moderate rate of interest, and not to be withdrawn before stated periods according to agreement.

The object of this measure must not be misunderstood. It cannot bring into action any considerable portion of inactive moneyed capital, since there is hardly any which is not at this time actively employed, either directly or indirectly, as ordinary bank deposits. Its only effect would be to substitute, for the private credit which from want of confidence is now withdrawn, bank credit in the shape of certificates of deposit, which the holders might negotiate. Post notes would be more convenient, but seem to be forbidden by law. That plan has been successfully adopted in Massachusetts, and several foreign countries. The city banks are the only proper judges of its practicability, safety and utility, here, and at this time; and they have accordingly been requested to take it into consideration.

In other respects the committee could recommend to them nothing more than to take also into consideration the propriety of the following measures:

An agreement between the several banks, founded upon equitable principles, not to demand from each other, for the present, payment in specie of the balances which may respectively become due to any of them; unless such balance should exceed a certain sum in proportion to their respective capitals.

A uniform and efficient plan for the redemption of country notes in this city, together with such means as may be devised for the purpose of facilitating, at this time, the country remittances.

An application to our representatives in congress, urging the necessity of passing immediately the bills now before that body, for making the silver coins of Mexico and the states of South America a legal tender, and for raising the value of the gold coins to their market price; suggesting, in reference to the last subject, that, for the sake of uniformity, and of avoiding delay, the same rule should be adopted as in the estimation of duties on foreign importations.

An application to congress for a moderate and permanent appropriation, which may enable the mint to pay in American coins, without delay or expense, for the gold and silver bullion, or uncurrent foreign coins which may be brought to that establishment.

Since it was obvious that the pressure on the money market in this city was not due to any curtailments in the usual accommodations by the banks, but to an increased demand for money, or, to speak more correctly, for credit, the attention of the committee was called to an investigation of the causes to which this state of things must be ascribed.

The causes which have been suggested as more specially affecting this city, are the effects of the tariff, and of the purchase of foreign stocks on its capital. Public opinion assigns the removal of the deposits and the entanglement by the bank of the United States, as the general and immediate causes of the present crisis throughout the whole country.

1. It was found impracticable during the last session of congress to arrange the existing differences on the subject of the tariff, by an act that should embrace all the details pertaining to that intricate subject. In order to remove a pressing and imminent danger, it became necessary to discard all the details, and resort to a compromise embracing only general principles. It could not but be expected that defects might be discovered, and consequences ensue, not perceived or contemplated at the time when the act was passed. It is believed that the great importance to one party, and the great sacrifice required from the other, by the conversion of duties payable at a distant day into cash, or short duties, were not estimated at their full value. That sacrifice falls most heavily on that city in which more than one-half of the revenue is collected. The duties did not, under the old system, become payable till about the time when the importer was paid by the consumer. At present, the New York importers not only collect as heretofore, but in fact advance to government one half of the whole amount of duties on importations, which is ultimately paid by the consumer.

Without entering into a critical analysis of the subject, it is sufficient to observe, that an additional amount of capital, equal to that of the duties, is now required, in order to carry on the same quantity of business in articles on which the duties are now payable in cash, or at much shorter periods than formerly.

The committee are unanimous in the opinion, that the principles of the tariff compromise ought to be strictly respected, and no modifications proposed but such as are consistent with its true intent and spirit. A warehousing system, founded on the principle, that the time at which the duties shall be paid shall be computed from the time when the merchandise is withdrawn by the importer from the warehouse, and not from the date of importation, the committee believe to be entirely of that character, similar to that adopted in every other commercial country, and absolutely necessary for the protection of commerce. As a bill having that object in view is now before congress, a sub-committee has been appointed, for the purpose of collecting all the information connected with the subject, and of corresponding with the representatives of this city in that body.

2. New York has become the principal centre of all the moneyed transactions of the United States. Large amounts of stocks, principally from the south west, have been purchased here, with a view, in a great degree, to their sale in the English markets. This has not of late answered the expectations of the contractors. They may indeed have been enabled to borrow abroad to a considerable extent on the credit of those stocks; but it cannot be doubted that a large amount remains on hand, and has absorbed a corresponding portion of the capital or credit of this city. For this there is no remedy. But a still greater evil has grown out of the speculations on some of those and several other stocks foreign to the city. Ceasing to be legitimate investments of money, frequent and large sales, on time, of stocks not held by the seller, and where the principal generally remains unknown, have degenerated into pure stock jobbing; a most pernicious species of gambling, the cause of artificial and sudden falls in the price of stocks, ruinous to innocent individuals, and generally to those engaged in it; and which has tended at this crisis to increase the want of confidence. The committee has thought it its duty to pass a resolution, earnestly recommending to the board of brokers to discontinue the practice, and has requested the co-operation of the banks to carry that measure into effect.

In approaching the subject of the removal of the public deposits, the first observation that occurs is, that the measure, considered only in its connexion with the fiscal arrangements, the currency, commerce and public or private credit of the country, was at least wholly unnecessary and uncalled for. Abstaining from the discussion of any question, either concerning the rights of the bank, or at issue between the administration and that institution, or relating to the respective powers of the executive, legislative and judicial departments of the government, it is only as they are of a commercial and fiscal nature that the committee intends to examine the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury for the removal.

The first reason was, that, judging from the past, it was highly probable that "the public deposits would always amount to several millions of dollars; and that it would evidently produce serious inconvenience if such a large sum were left in possession of the bank until the last moment of its existence, and then be suddenly withdrawn, when its immense circulation would be returning upon it to be redelivered, and its private depositors removing their funds into other institutions." It may be observed in the first place, that no inconvenience was felt in March, 1811, when the charter of the former bank of the U. States expired, from the fact, that as late as the first of January of that year, the public moneys in that institution exceeded six millions, and on the day of the termination of the charter amounted to two and a half millions of dollars. But the secretary of the treasury, in his annual report on the finances, estimates "the balance that would be left in the treasury, (that is to say, the whole amount of the public deposits), on the 31st December, 1834, at less than three millions of dollars; and that the receipts of 1835 will be less than those of 1834." The secretary could not, on the 28th September, when he removed the public deposits, have been aware that such would be the result of his further investigations, and that since the public deposits would naturally and gradually be lessened between the 1st of October, 1833, and the 31st December, 1834, from near ten millions to less than three millions of dollars, and would probably be liable to a still greater reduction during the year 1835, it was quite unnecessary to order an immediate removal, in order to avoid the danger of their magnitude in the spring of the year 1836. This single fact, thus officially announced—the natural and gradual reduction of the public deposits, in the course of the present year, to less than three millions of dollars—refutes all the arguments, of every description, urged in justification of that measure.

The second reason assigned is, however, of a more complex nature. The secretary is of opinion, that the superior credit of the notes of the bank of the U. States is occasioned altogether by the provision in the charter to receive them in all payments to the United States; that they will be subject to an immediate depreciation at the expiration of the charter, and ought to be previously and gradually withdrawn; and that the same engagement in favor of the notes of any state bank would give them equal credit, and render them equally convenient. And he considered the immediate removal of the public deposits necessary for the double purpose of preventing the inconvenience of the sudden withdrawing of the whole circulation of the bank of the United States, when its charter shall expire, and of preparing in time the substitution of an equally sound and uniform currency to be furnished by the state banks.

The committee is of opinion that the superior credit enjoyed by the notes of the bank of the United States is due principally to the general confidence in its management and solidity; that they have occasionally, in the interior districts of country, a greater value than the notes of specie paying local banks; not for local payments but as remittances to the sea ports; and that the principal effect of their being received every where in payment of debts due to the United States has been to enable the bank to increase the amount of its notes in circulation.—Those notes alone may, at the expiration of the charter, experience a depreciation, which being payable at distant places in the interior, may at that time be found in the sea ports, unless the bank, as is probable, should find it their interest to pay them wherever they are presented.

But the obvious mode to lessen the gross amount of these notes would be a repeal by congress of the provision which makes them receivable in payment of debts due to the United States. The removal of the public deposits, by compelling the bank to curtail its discounts, and only on that account, has an immediate effect on the amount of its private deposits, but cannot alone have the slightest on the circulation of its notes. We find, accordingly, that while the individual deposits of the bank have been lessened between the 1st of August, 1833, and the 1st of February, 1834 by a sum of near three millions and a half dollars, the net circulation, as appears by the following table, has remained the same.

	Loans and disc'ts.	public depos'ts.	individ'l depos'ts.	net circulation.
1833, 1 Aug.	$34,169,000	$7,600,000	$10,152,000	$18,890,000
Sep.	62,853,000	9,186,000	9,457,000	18,413,000
Oct.	60,094,000	9,869,000	8,009,000	19,128,000
Nov.	57,210,000	8,292,000	7,285,000	18,518,000
Dec.	54,453,000	5,162,000	6,827,000	18,651,000
1834, Jan.	54,911,000	4,230,000	6,735,000	19,202,000
Feb.	54,843,000	3,126,000	6,715,000	19,260,000

No effect whatever has been produced by the withdrawing, between the 1st of October, and the 1st of February, public deposits to the amount of $6,743,000. If the removal can in no way lessen the circulation, it was certainly unnecessary to resort to that measure for that purpose. But it is worthy of notice, that at the very time when the curtailments by the bank were alleged as a cause for the immediate removal of the public deposits, the attempt should have been made to justify that act, on the ground that it was necessary for the purpose of lessening the bank circulation; and thereby compelling it to lessen still more the amount of its discounts.

The committee will not discuss here either the propriety or the practicability of the substitution, for a national, of an executive bank, formed by the association of state banks, selected for that purpose by the treasury. But if, as the secretary asserts, the privilege of being received in payment of all debts due to the United States is sufficient to render the notes of state banks equally convenient, and entitled to the same credit, as those of the bank of the U. States, there was certainly no necessity for intermediate preparation. It was quite unnecessary to remove, for that purpose, the public deposits, which at all events must, within a year, according to the treasury estimates, have been reduced gradually and without effort to a very moderate amount. The state bank notes are always abundant and ready; and an act investing them with the privilege of being received every where in payment of debts due to the United States, and passed the month before the charter expired, would, if the opinion of the secretary of the treasury is correct, at once bring them into circulation, and effect the contemplated substitution. But if preparation were requisite, the removal of the deposits was still unnecessary. There is nothing to prevent, and the proper and obvious mode of effecting the object is, an early act of congress to the same effect. It is not quite certain that the executive is not of opinion that this may be done by his sole authority, and without any legislative action. An anxious wish and design to concentrate all the powers of government in that department, and to subject the public purse, the currency and the commerce of the country to the will of one man, is apparent through all the arguments and acts of the administration in relation to that subject.

The curtailment of its discounts by the bank of the United States, during the months of August and September 1833, appears to have been alleged in justification only of the immediate removal of the deposits. Those curtailments were evidently made in anticipation of the proposed removal, and would have ceased, of course, had the plan been abandoned. But it is necessary to observe that the pressure, which the secretary states to have become so intense before the 1st of October in the principal commercial cities, and the presumed curtailments by the state banks, had no existence in the city of New York. It appears by returns of the bank commissioners that the loans and discounts of the fourteen city banks, under the safety fund, amounted on the 1st January, 1833, to $20,742,000; and on 1st April ensuing to 21,180,000 dollars. On the 1st of October of the same year, they amounted to 21,766,000 dollars; and the increase of capital in operation between the 1st of January and the 1st of October was only two hundred thousand dollars, this being the amount added to that of the Butcher's and Drovers' bank. He was equally mistaken when he supposed that the balances due by the city banks to the branch in the city, would, on the 1st of October, amount to $1,500,000; and that it was apprehended that the immediate payment of that balance would be insisted on by the branch. The balances due on that day to the branch by the city banks amounted to less than $602,000; and the apprehension of an immediate demand for payment proved entirely groundless.

It must be kept in view that in all that precedes, the committee has assumed the position asserted by the secretary, that the bank could not be rechartered. It is in that view of the subject, and on that supposition, that the reasons assigned for the propriety or necessity of a removal of the public deposits, prior to the expiration of the charter, appear wholly insufficient.

It has indeed been suggested, that there was an intimate connexion between the immediate removal of the deposits and the non-renewal of the charter; and that to suffer them to remain in the bank implied an obligation of rechartering that institution. This assertion is purely gratuitous and altogether disproved by positive facts.

At this moment the state of Virginia expresses its opinion that the bank is unconstitutional, and ought not therefore to be rechartered, and improves at the same time, in the most explicit terms, the previous removal of the public deposits.

A president avowedly hostile to the whole of our banking system, and particularly so to the former bank of the United States, and whose term of office expired only two years prior to the termination of its charter, never intimated a desire that the public moneys should be withdrawn from it, although there was not at that time any law directing that the public moneys should be placed in that institution.

Those deposits remained in that bank to the last moment of its existence. This circumstance did not prevent the refusal by congress to renew the charter, and was not alluded to, by any of those who were in favor of a continuance, as a reason why the bank should be rechartered.

The committee can see nothing in that assertion, but an attempt to divert public attention from the true question at issue, and the admission that the removal of the deposits cannot be defended on its own merits.

A curtailment of its discounts by the bank of the United States was a necessary consequence of the withdrawing of the public deposits. The author of this measure is responsible for all the effects that may have flowed from the curtailments. It is idle to say that they have been greater than was expected, or made at a different time, or in a different manner from what had been anticipated. If it was impossible for the executive, or for any human being, to foresee what the bank, under those circumstances, might be compelled or inclined to do, and the effects which its acts might have on the currency and commerce of the country, that was a sufficient reason for not adopting with precipitation a measure in itself wholly unnecessary. But we are quite satisfied that the result which has taken place was not, and could not have been anticipated by the executive. And we believe, that although general apprehensions were entertained of the effect which might be produced by that change in the relations between the government and the bank, no one foresaw the extent of the evils which have ensued. In the act we only blame the boldness of having unnecessarily tampered with the paper currency and credit of the country. This important view of the subject seems indeed to have entirely escaped the notice of the executive. Among the inquiries which preceded the removal, we see none that might have elicited the opinions of practical men on the probable effects of that measure on commerce and on the community at large. The inquiry was confined to the laudable, but secondary object of ascertaining what conditions might be imposed on the state banks selected for collecting the revenue. But, if there is an excuse for want of foresight, no apology can be found for obstinately persevering in an erroneous course, after the error had been discovered, and the fatal effects of the measure had become undeniable.

The gross amount of curtailments made by the bank has not in the whole much exceeded the decrease in its public and private deposits. There are fluctuations depending on the season of the year and the course of trade. The fairest mode of computation is a comparison of similar periods of the year. The preceding tabular statement shows that the decrease in the discounts amounted during the year to $7,010,000 and the decrease in its public and private deposits to $8,322,000.

If the comparison is instituted between the 1st of August, 1833, when the discounts of the bank had reached the highest point and it began to curtail, and the 1st of February, 1834, the result will be

Discounts on 1st August, 1833,	$64,160,000
on 1st February, 1834,	54,843,000

Decrease,	$9,317,000
Public and individual deposits on the 1st Aug. 1833,	17,752,000
1st Feb. 1834,	9,781,000

-----------	-------------

But the curtailments of the bank commenced in August, and continued till the 1st of December, when its discounts had reached the lowest point; while the revenue did not begin to be collected by the state banks before the 1st of October; from which time the public deposits have been gradually withdrawn. The bank, therefore, did not decrease its discounts at the same rate and in the same proportion as its deposits were withdrawn. A comparison between the 1st of August and the 1st of December shows the greatest amount of difference between the respective decrease of each.

Its discounts were, on the 1st of August, 1833	$64,160,000
On the 1st December, 1833	54,453,000

Decrease	$9,707,000
Public and individual deposits on 1st Aug. 1833	17,752,000
1st December, 1833	11,989,000

Decrease only	$5,763,000

The bank had in fact curtailed their discounts more than four millions between the 1st of August and the 1st of October. It cannot be doubted that this measure produced a derangement in the business of certain sections of the country, and had its share in producing the distress which afterwards ensued. But that curtailment began only after the agent of the treasury appointed to make the preparatory arrangements for the removal, had commenced his inquiries. The object of his mission was one of public notoriety; and it was a natural course on the part of the board of directors, when they had lost the confidence of the administration and were threatened with an early withdrawing of the large funds belonging to the public in their hands, to prepare themselves for the event, and provide in time the necessary funds. It may be that the precautions were carried farther than may now appear to have been strictly necessary. The decidedly hostile attitude assumed by the executive, and the necessity of protecting twenty-four branches against attacks, which, if not intended, were at least threatened, under certain vague contingencies, and, at a later period, the contingent draughts and other circumstances, were calculated to impose on the bank the necessity of effectually providing for its own safety. The committee is perfectly satisfied that the executive is wholly incapable of having countenanced any plan for dishonoring any of the branches of the bank; nor do they know the circumstances which led to the sudden call of more than 300,000 dollars in specie on that of Savannah. But the fact is a matter of great regret; and they must be permitted to say, that if this blow had been successful (or if a similar one had been aimed one month ago, at the country banks of this state, and before they were prepared for the present state of things), it would have been most fatal and might have been attended with a general suspension of specie payments. Any premeditated attempt of that kind, on whatever pretence and by whomsoever made, must originate in gross ignorance of the system of credit which connects all the moneyed interests of the United States, and in the detestable maxim, that the end justifies the means.

The banks selected for collecting the revenue after the 1st of October, commenced immediately to extend their discounts; and from an examination of their returns, it appears probable, that the whole amount of discounts by all the banks in the U. States, including that of the United States, has not in the aggregate been lessened at any time more than four millions of dollars since the 1st of August, 1833. The committee is confident that there has been no very sensible diminution since the first of October, that it could not at any time have amounted to six millions, that there has been a gradual increase since the 1st of December, and that the aggregate of bank discounts and loans, including the purchases by banks of bills of exchange, through the United States, is at this time nearly, if not altogether, equal to what it was on the 1st of August, 1833.

These facts and all the symptoms of the present crisis clearly prove, that it is not in the amount alone of lessened accommodations of the banks, that we are to seek for the immediate cause of the general distress; and render it highly probable that the previous state of the commercial transactions and of commercial credit made it liable to be disturbed by what may appear comparatively slight causes.

Credit is indispensable to commerce, and to every species of active business. To the proper use of credit, in supplying the want of an adequate capital, the United States are in a great degree indebted for their truly astonishing progress in navigation, commerce and the manufactures; for their stupendous internal improvements; for the stimulus given to agriculture, and the price obtained for every species of agricultural produce; for the employment and adequate compensation of labor. But the abuse of one of the most powerful elements of its prosperity is, in this energetic and enterprising country, almost unavoidable. Successive years of prosperous enterprise hardly ever fail to produce a further extension of business beyond the actual capital; and it may be that this was the case during the period which immediately preceded the present crisis. There were, however, no apparent symptoms of what is generally designated by the term of "over trading;" and the state of the foreign exchanges has not given any indication in an excess in our importations. Still, and at all times, in no country, has the extension of credit, in all its forms, been carried farther than in the United States. The currency of the country, founded on a specie basis generally too narrow for the superstructure, rests almost exclusively on the confidence placed in the solidity of the notes discounted by near four hundred banks of issue. A similar disproportion is to be found between the actual capital of merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and of almost all men engaged in the active pursuits of life, and the amount of their business. All those men are at the same time debtors and creditors for sums generally far exceeding their respective capitals. All depend for the ability of punctually discharging their engagements, on the punctuality of each other.

The increased facilities of communication and inland exchanges have, within the last years, multiplied to an extent heretofore unknown, the transactions, contracts and responsibilities, between the several cities, and between the cities and even the most remote parts of the country.

The regularity with which the enormous mass of engagements resulting from those transactions spread over the whole country, and all intimately connected together, can be discharged, depends entirely on an uninterrupted continuance of the ordinary sales, payments, remittances and credits. The whole machinery, by which business in all its various branches is carried on, is credit extended to its utmost limits. Whatever lessens the general confidence, on which credit is founded, must necessarily produce a fatal derangement and interruption in every branch of business.*

It is with this state of things, that, without any necessity or investigation, the executive thought proper to interfere. The bank of the United States, from its capital and the ground it occupies, must, while it exists, set a prominent part in the commercial concerns of the country. The measures which that institution was obliged to take for its own safety must necessarily have caused some derangement in the ordinary operations of commerce. But the fatal injury inflicted by the executive measure, was its effect on general confidence.

The threat of the removal of the deposits, and especially their actual removal, created apprehensions of danger, immediately to the bank itself, and more remotely to all the moneyed institutions and concerns of the country. Retrenchment at all, and rigorous enforcements of its claims at some points, were presumed to be indispensable to the safety of the bank; and the extent being conjectural, was exaggerated by timid capitalists, who, as a class, are perhaps more fearful than men of less wealth. Men saw that the relations between the government and the bank were thenceforth to be hostile; that between it and the selected banks they were to be those of mistrust, and that without a national bank the stability and safety of the whole monetary system of the country would be endangered. This was the first instance in the history of our government of a direct interference of the president with one of its officers, in the performance of the duties which by law devolved exclusively on that officer. It was the more dangerous, as being made in defiance of a solemn vote of the late congress at their last session; and as if with the intention to forestall the opinion of that which must meet within sixty days after the interference was made, and as if to encroach on its legitimate rights. But nothing could be more alarming to men of business, who rely for the success of their operations, on that stability in those of government which can only be guaranteed by law, than unexpectedly to discover that the commerce, the currency and the moneyed institutions of the country, its credit, and their own credit and fortunes, were thenceforth to depend on the private opinions, the presumed wisdom, and the arbitrary will of one man. Other minor causes increased the apprehensions, and restricted more and more the use of private capital and private credit; and the alarm became a panic, not dependent upon, or to be explained as a matter of ordinary reason. The banks, indeed, protected by the impossibility of exporting specie without loss, have preserved their credit, and been enabled generally to continue their usual accommodations. It is private credit which has been most deeply affected; and the leading feature of the present distress is the consequent interruption, and in many cases, cessation of business.

The importers diminish greatly their orders and their purchases of foreign exchange. The intermediate wholesale merchants, fearful to contract new engagements, are only anxious about the remittances necessary to discharge those already contracted. Those engaged in the exportation of the produce of the country, doubtful whether they can sell the foreign bills on which that exportation depends, give but limited orders for it. The country merchants and the manufacturers are no longer permitted to draw as formerly in advance on the cities for the products of the soil or of their industry. Men with small capitals, if at all extended, when disappointed in the remittances they naturally expected, are crushed. New enterprises and engagements of every description are avoided, and, in many instances, workmen are discharged, or a reduction of wages required. We state only what we see and feel. If correctly informed, the effects of the distress are still more extensive in other places. The actual evils are aggravated by general apprehension, and the alarm may be greater than the true state of things justifies: in every aspect of the subject, the true and efficient remedy consists in restoring confidence and credit.

It is obvious that the most prompt and effective mode of attaining that object is to remove the cause of the evil; and that confidence would be almost instantaneously restored, by replacing the bank, during the remainder of its existence, in the situation it had heretofore occupied, and thus enabling it to resume its functions to their usual extent. It is in the power of the executive to do this at once; and the committee deeply regrets to find itself compelled to say that there is hardly any hope of relief from that quarter. Our reliance is on the representatives of the people in congress, in whom the power of ultimately deciding the question is clearly vested, and whose acts will not, we trust, disappoint the expectations of a suffering community.

In the mean while, the committee intreats their fellow citizens not to despair; and to reflect that there are limits to the injuries which any administration can inflict on the people. The usual channels of circulation are indeed obstructed; but the products of the national industry, though stagnated, are abundant: the actual capital of the country still remains unimpaired, though the nominal value of property is for a time lessened. There is no foreign pressure, and the skill and activity of our intelligent merchants must, after a while, renew that chain of operations which has been interrupted. The evil, through a painful process, is gradually working its remedy. In proportion as no new engagements are contracted, the whole mass is daily lessened, and we must, after a period of severe suffering unnecessarily inflicted, be placed in a situation better adapted to a new order of things.

Among the sources from which relief ere long may be expected, the attention of the committee has been naturally turned towards the bank of the United States. Since the object of the president was to cripple an institution which he considered as pernicious, he must have calculated the extent of the injury which that measure would inflict on the bank; and he might have anticipated that it would in one respect produce a result, the reverse of that which it was his object to effect. The extent of the injury to the bank was to lessen its discounts eight or ten millions a year, and to cause a proportionate reduction in its profits during the remainder of its existence; but it might have been anticipated, and it was predicted by calm observers, that, though the bank might be annoyed so long as it remained liable greater treasury draughts than it was convenient to pay, the power of the treasury would be exhausted whenever the process of withdrawing the public moneys should be at an end; and that the bank, though deprived of the public deposits, would still remain with great comparative strength, derived from its capital, its specie, its branches, and its superiority in facilitating inland exchanges. It might therefore have been justly apprehended, that, according to the opinion entertained of the bank by the executive, that institution, no longer restrained by the fear of losing the public deposits, and released from every obligation to government, might exert its power in a manner most injurious to the community.

But that power may also be exercised for the best of purposes, and as the means of affording relief. That such is the fact is now most clearly acknowledged both by the clamor incessantly raised against the line of conduct heretofore adopted by the bank, and by the repeated declarations of the president himself. It is indeed a most singular feature in the conduct of the executive; after a most express declaration, that one of the avowed objects of its measure was, to compel the bank gradually to withdraw its circulation and reduce its discounts, (in order to prevent the general distress that might ensue if this was not done in time before the expiration of the charter), that those who apply for relief should now receive for answer that their application should be made to the bank; that is to say, that it is not only in the power of that institution, but that it is bound to relieve the community by an increase of its discounts. Leaving to others the task of explaining this contradiction, the committee is of opinion, that the time is not far distant, when, after the remaining deposits shall have been entirely withdrawn, the bank will find itself in a state of perfect safety, which will enable it, though with far less efficacy than if they were restored, to resume to a certain extent its usual operations, and to afford considerable relief to the commerce of the country: The perfect safety of the bank must necessarily be the primary object of the board of directors. Our opinion, that a moderate extension of its accommodations, and a fearless application of its means within proper limits will, at no very distant time, be compatible with that object, is derived from a view of its liabilities and cash resources at this time, as compared with its situation prior to the removal of the deposits, and with that of the other banks at this moment.

The following statements exhibit the situation of the bank, on the 1st of February and 1st of Aug. 1833, and on the 1st February, 1834; that of the banks selected to collect the revenue at the last mentioned date; and that of a great portion of the banks of the Atlantic states north of the Potomac on the 1st of January, 1834.

N. B. Various items are so blended in some of the returns, that in attempting to separate them, some errors must have been unavoidable.

The views here exhibited affords on the one hand a conclusive proof of the solidity of the bank and of the safety of the public moneys while permitted to remain in its possession. But it also shows that the ratio of the cash resources of the bank to its liabilities payable on demand, was on the 1st of February last as 1 to 1.9-10; while the same ratio was on the 1st February, 1833, as 1 to 2.8-10, and on the 1st of August last, as 1 to 2.4-10; while the cash resources of the northern banks to their liabilities payable on demand is in the ratio of one to near 7.1-3; and the banks selected to collect the revenue, and in which all the power of the treasury is concentrated, are nearly as powerless, since the ratio is near that of 1 to 5.1-5.

We admit that in ordinary times and with the great uncertainty respecting the renewal of its charter, it would be expedient for the bank rather gradually to reduce than to extend its discounts; but the present crisis calls for extraordinary exertions, and the bank of the United States having, though unconnected with government, a common interest with all the other members of society in its welfare, and the same duties to perform towards the community which at such times are imposed upon every other moneyed institution, will most undoubtedly alter as far as practicable the course which prudence heretofore dictated, so soon as it shall see itself in a state of perfect safety; and provided that no new and unforeseen acts of hostility shall be committed by the executive against it.

It is, however, much less in the amount of increased accommodations by the bank of the United States, than in the confidence which the fact that is has resolved to extend its operations to a certain extent will inspire, that we look for some relief. The amount itself, so long as the bank continues to be deprived of the public deposits and until it shall be able to resume its ordinary functions, can be but moderate. It is evident that its discounts cannot be increased without a proportionate increase of its circulation, or individual deposits, or without lessening its stock of specie by an equal amount. The increase either of its circulation or of its private deposits does not depend on its own acts; and, in the present state of things, it is absolutely necessary, not only for its own safety, but for that of all the state banks, and as the ultimate means of sustaining through the crisis the general currency of the country, that the specie in its vaults should not be considerably diminished. The committee is informed that the bank has taken measures for increasing the amount through the means of its foreign funds. It does not appear from the situation of the banks appointed to collect the revenue, that any measures have been taken by the treasury with a view to that object; and we beg leave again to insist on the necessity, in order to render the whole amount of the precious metals in the country available, of passing without delay the acts intended to make all the American and foreign silver coins a legal tender, and to raise the gold coins to their real value.

The committee is aware that, in order to restore public confidence, more is wanted than temporary expedients, and is also aware of the anxiety which prevails concerning the prospective views of the administration in reference to the currency of the country.

Without dwelling on the danger of recurring to hazardous and premature experiments, at the expense of the community, we will only submit some cursory observations on plans hardly digested and which have not yet been developed in their details. Two have been suggested; a currency founded exclusively on the precious metals, or a paper currency consisting exclusively of that issued by banks incorporated by the several states.

It is not necessary at this time to discuss the respective advantages and inconveniences of a metallic and of a paper currency. It is evident that the first could be established but gradually, and at a considerable expense; since the purchase of sixty to eighty millions of dollars, in gold and silver, would be necessary to supply the place of the existing paper currency. But the banking system and its appendage of paper issues now pervades every district of the union; and a total change in the habits of the people must take place, before the plan can be carried into effect. The impossibility of attaining the object through the action of the revenue alone is palpable, and results from the immense disproportion between the mass of payments for the ordinary and current business of the country, and those which are effected by the general government.

It has already been stated that the daily payments in the banks of this city amounted to near five millions on the first of October, and exceeded four millions on the first of February last. This includes neither the payments made in each bank in its own notes, or in checks drawn upon it; nor any portion of the retail business of the city, or of any of the other payments made without the intermediate agency of the banks. The daily payments, in this city alone, amount to at least five millions of dollars a day, or near sixteen hundred millions of dollars a year. The annual revenue collected in New York cannot now exceed fifteen millions; and the action of government cannot extend beyond its receipts and its disbursements, that is to say, to more than than thirty millions of dollars, or less than one fiftieth part of the whole. All that government could do would be to accumulate an amount of specie equal to the permanent public deposits. It might, at most, establish a separate metallic currency for government, by compelling importers and purchasers of public lands to pay in specie, and by paying its creditors in the same currency. But this metallic currency would be used for that, and for no other purpose. It could have no control over the general currency of the country, nor prevent its depreciation, or a general suspension of specie payments. It might only enable government, if such a catastrophe should ensue, to preserve through the general confusion, the public faith towards the creditors of the public. We must only aim at what is practicable; and the only rational plan, for the present, must be, without excluding the paper currency, to restrict it within proper limits.

The objects and expectations of the administration, in the attempt to establish a sound currency through the agency of state banks, have not been distinctly explained, and are not thoroughly understood.

If we recur to the past, we may say that the experiment was already made in the year 1811, at the termination of the charter of the former bank of the United States; and no disappointment, though some inconvenience was experienced in carrying on the ordinary operations of government, so long as no untoward event disturb the ordinary state of things. During the two or three ensuing years, no loss occurred in the collection of the revenue, or in the safe keeping and transmission of the public moneys. But the currency had been left to the sole control of twenty different state legislatures; the mania of establishing new banks without restrictions, or under restrictions purely nominal, pervaded the whole country, and terminated in that suspension of specie payments, and the confusions incident to it, which indeed congress, in 1816, to recur again to a national bank, with what success, for the purposes intended, the event has shown.

The observation already made, with respect to the hard money experiment, is applicable to that of establishing a general, uniform and sound currency, through the agency of state banks, in the manner which seems to be contemplated. The action of the treasury is confined to the collection and disbursement of the revenue. Through those means, and supposing that the plan should succeed, its effect, at the utmost, could only be to regulate, by some special contract, the currency of the few selected bank; this could have no control over the general currency of the country, or to restrict its amount in the slightest degree. But to the plan itself there are two insuperable objections.

Although the terms upon which a contract shall be made with any state bank selected for the purpose, may be regulated by law, the selection of the banks from the necessity of the case, and, according to the views entertained by the administration, the removal of the public moneys from one bank to another, must be intrusted to the discretionary power of the treasury, or of the president. An executive will be substituted for a legislative bank, subject to the abuses incident to arbitrary power, increasing the patronage of the executive, and giving to the administration, not only a power over the public purse not intended by the constitution, but even if it chooses, that of interfering, in the most direct manner, with the private concerns and interests of men in business. To that concentration of power in one man we most decidedly object. It is no argument to say, that the power did formerly exist, and was not abused. Even then, it proved ultimately the cause of a loss the dead money in the treasury. We wish ever to live under a government of laws, and not of men. The provision in the act incorporating the present bank, which designated the place where the public moneys should be deposited, was in every respect proper and salutary; not less acceptable to the secretary of the treasury, who must always wish to be guarded by law rather than be clothed with discretionary powers, than beneficial to the public interests, by guarding against the danger of the control of the public purse being converted into an engine of power, if government should ever fall into improper hands. We have only to lament, that, in order to guard against an imaginary danger, the provision was expressed in such terms as to have permitted the act of which we now complain.

But while the selected state banks shall be under the executive control in the manner above stated, they cannot be regulated by either congress or the treasury, in any point connected with the currency of the country, that may interfere with their charters, or not be permitted by the laws of the state.

The state banks are artificial bodies, deriving their existence from the several states by which they have been incorporated, and subject to the laws and to the control of each state respectively. They may, or may not, be permitted to accede to the terms prescribed by congress, or by the executive, for becoming the collectors and the depositories of the public moneys. If any state shall think that a compliance, on the part of the selected bank, with the legislative or treasury regulations shall interfere with the banking system, or currency, which that state wishes to maintain, it will forbid the bank to accept those terms. Whether any bank may, on any terms, become a subordinate branch of the treasury of the United States, depends entirely on the will of the several states.

It has been asked, if the state banks were deemed necessary for carrying into effect the legitimate powers of the national government, whether this was not an admission that a national bank was authorised by the constitution? But without discussing the constitutional question, it is impossible to suppose that the government of the United States is so constituted, that it cannot perform its most legitimate functions through its own officers and agents; that, even for collecting its own revenue, it is compelled to resort to state institutions. Why not at once recur to the treasurers of the several states, and make them sub-treasurers of the United States? Should any one, startled with such a supposition, charge us with having stated an impossible case, we reply that this is not a supposition, but a fact.

Among the banks selected by the secretary of the treasury is the Mobile branch of the bank of the state of Alabama. Neither in that bank or its branches is there a single individual stockholder. All the funds are furnished by the state; the business of the bank is carried on solely for the benefit and at the risk of the state, whose credit is pledged for the ultimate redemption and payment of all notes issued, and all debts contracted by said bank; and it is managed by a president and fourteen directors, annually elected by a joint vote of both houses of the legislature. Whether the notes issued by that bank of the state are not to all intents and purposes "bills of credit emitted by that state" it is not our province to inquire; we only state the fact, that the secretary of the treasury has selected as an agent of that department, a branch of a branch of the treasury of one of the states.

It is principally because congress either has not, or will not exercise the power of regulating and restraining the currency issued, under the authority of the several states, that resort has been had twice to a national bank. Until a more direct and efficient mode shall have been suggested, we must look to that institution as the only means through which a sound and uniform paper currency can be issued under the authority of the national government, and as the best instrument for regulating, though indirectly and but partially, the whole currency of the country; but no substitute will answer the purpose, unless the power of congress to regulate the currency of the states should be admitted and exercised. We know from the experience of nearly forty years, that so long as a bank of the United States has been in operation we have had a sound currency; and that it was thrown into utter confusion, when left to the control of the several states, each acting according to its particular views of the subject. Experience has shown in what respects the powers with which the bank was invested may be abused, and what modifications may be necessary, in order to remove well grounded objections, and, without lessening its utility, to adapt it better to the wishes and the wants of the people. We abstain at this time from any expression of the views of the committee respecting the several modifications which have heretofore been suggested, as we believe the discussion would be premature, and the time unpropitious for a calm investigation of that important subject. In the mean while, and while the question whether congress shall ultimately charter a national bank remains in a state of uncertainty, the attention of the committee has been forcibly turned towards the banking system and the currency of this state.

It is incontestable, that the defects in the laws of the several states on that subject, the excessive issues of paper by some of the state banks, and the consequences felt or apprehended to ensue, furnish the strongest argument in favor of a bank of the United States. It is highly probable that if at the termination of the charter of the former bank, the several states, instead of indulging the mania which prevailed for multiplying unrestricted banks, had each passed the necessary laws for regulating and restraining their own paper currency, the present bank of the United States would not have been called into existence. We are ready to admit that even with a national bank, the cooperation of the several states would be highly useful, for the purpose of establishing a sound currency throughout the whole country, so long as the power of congress to regulate it by law, in a direct manner, shall be either denied or not exercised. In every view of the subject, it is highly important that the defects of our own system should be corrected. It is not judging by the result that we are disposed to think it worse than that of most of the other states. The disproportion between specie and issues is as great in Massachusetts and Virginia as in New York. But the affairs of our own state are our own concern; and we believe that, considering its population, geographical position, wealth and commercial connexions, its example would have a happy influence over the other states.

The first observation we beg leave to submit, is the propriety of repealing that law of the state which forbids every person or association of persons, other than incorporated banks, not only to issue any notes or bills and put them in circulation as money (a prohibition equally proper and necessary), but which extends the prohibition to the "keeping of any office for the purpose of receiving deposits or discounting notes or bills." This last restriction on the common and legitimate use of private capital, is, we believe, peculiar to the state of New York, and is not to be found in the code of the other states, nor indeed of any other commercial country. Instead of making the lending and borrowing of money for commercial purposes an exclusive privilege, it is the policy of every commercial country, and far more consistent with the spirit of our institutions, to set private capital free from any unnecessary restriction, as the best means of producing competition, and of reducing by natural means the price paid for the use of money.

We concur also in the opinion of the bank commissioners, that the number of banks ought not to be increased but with great caution; that the natural tendency of an increased number is to increase bank issues beyond what is necessary and proper; that if any additional banking capital is wanted it is for the purpose of increasing bank accommodations in favor of the community, and not for that of increasing bank issues and bank profits, and that for that purpose, the increase of the capital of existing banks, so as to equalize as far as practicable that of banks in the same locality, is preferable to the creation of new banks.

We must add, in reference to that equality of capital between banks in the same locality or placed under similar circumstances, that the only reason for giving to the bank of the United States its large capital was, besides the extent of territory over which its operations must be carried, the necessity of investing it with power sufficient to check and regulate the issues of the other banks. And the power was thus given, only because congress was presumed not to have the authority of restraining those issues, by laws directly applicable to that object. But the states are under no such restrictions. They have the full and unlimited power to regulate and restrain their own banking system, and the circulation of their own banks, to any extent and in whatever manner they please. There is, therefore, no necessity or reason for the erection by the state, of a bank with a capital superior to that of all its other moneyed institutions, enabled thereby to govern and oppress all of them, and obnoxious, without any apology for it, to all the objections which have been raised against the bank of the United States. Free competition as it now exists between the several banks, is highly useful; and there are few things more to be deprecated than a powerful moneyed institution, not merely regulated by a general law, but kept in its operations under the immediate control of government, and liable to be used as an engine by those who administer government.

The laws of the state contain many provisions well calculated to prevent and to punish fraud, and to ensure, so far as it can be done by legal enactments, the ultimate solvency of the banks. And the act, commonly called the "safety fund act," has provided for annual and intermediary investigations which we consider as salutary, and which we wish only to see accompanied by annual, clear and complete statements of the situation of every bank subject to the provisions of the act. We see indeed no reason why every bank in this state, without exception, should not be made subject to the same investigation and publicity, and, to all the general laws of the state respecting moneyed corporations, save only such as may impose the payment of any money, or render them liable to any moneyed responsibility, not within the purport of their respective charters.

But although gross mismanagement may produce some exceptions, it is not the ultimate insolvency of the banks which is to be apprehended. The great danger to be guarded against is, that general suspension of specie payments, which both immediately and afterwards when such payments are resumed, is attended with the utter subversion of existing contracts, and with calamities which effect every class, and none more than the poorer classes of society.

The fundamental and objectionable provision of the safety fund act is that which lays a yearly tax of one-half per cent. on the capital of all the banks, for the purpose of applying the proceeds to the payment of any part of its debts, which any bank, by its own misconduct, may become unable to discharge.

This tax is unjust, inasmuch as it renders banks responsible for others over which they have no control: and in that it offers a premium in favor of misconduct or unskillful management, at the expense of those which are wisely and cautiously managed. It is more particularly unjust in reference to this city; inasmuch as the tax is laid in proportion to the capital and not to the circulation. It will be seen by the report of the bank commissioners that the apparent circulation of the city banks amounted on the first January last to $4,900,000, and that of the country banks to 10,500,000 dollars; while the tax being laid on the capital, the city banks pay annually more than 63,000 dollars towards the fund and the country banks less than fifty-one thousand. The disproportion would, it is true, be considerably less, by including the deposits. But the report does not enable us to state the precise amount of the aggregate of the circulation and individual deposits in the city and country respectively.

What renders the tax still more unjust, is the total want of reciprocity. The notes of the city banks did not require the guaranty of those in the country; and, so far from their circulation being increased by that provision, it has, in fact, been lessened, within the city itself, by the introduction of country paper, to which the guaranty of the city banks has given an artificial value.

It is this last circumstance which, apart from its injustice, renders the system unsafe and dangerous to the community at large. Instead of suffering the circulation of each bank to rest on the confidence to which it was naturally entitled, each one has been enabled to extend its circulation as far as its local situation permitted, without regard to its capital, its resources, its management, and to the degree of confidence to which it is entitled by all those circumstances; and solely on account of the artificial confidence arising from the guaranty of more responsible institutions which has been created by the law. Hence the extravagant issues of some of them, the disproportion between their specie and their issues, and the imminent danger of suspension of specie payments which threatens the whole system, whenever any untoward event, such as must necessarily occur in the course of human affairs, may disturb the ordinary state of things. It is perfectly natural that every bank should avail itself of the advantages derived from its situation, whether natural or bestowed on it by the laws of the land. Each will naturally try to increase its profits to the utmost limits. We find, accordingly, by the report of the bank commissioners of the fifth day of March, 1833, that, while the average dividends of thirteen city banks amounted to little more than six per cent., those of seven of the banks in Albany and Troy were nearly at the rate of eight per cent. and the average of the thirty-two other banks, included in the report, was almost nine and a half per cent. on their capitals. It is not to be wondered at that, under such circumstances, perpetual applications should be made for new banks; that they should be at last considered less in reference to their utility to the community, than as special favors granted to the applicants; that there should be a perpetual and unnecessary increase of new banks, and that, as has been conclusively proved by the bank commissioners, this should have been attended with a dangerous and immoderate increase of the bank issues.

We think it, therefore, of the highest importance that those defects in the existing system, which endanger the soundness of the currency, and which may render the rechartering of the bank of the United States, on any terms, absolutely necessary, should be corrected; and the remedies for that purpose are most simple and obvious.

They consist merely in restricting the amount of the loans and circulation of each bank, by substantial, and not by nominal, restrictions. The suppression of notes of a less denomination than five dollars, we believe, is generally demanded. It will have, among others, the great advantage of causing all small payments, those for articles daily brought for sale at market, and those for the daily compensation of labor, to be made in specie, and of lessening the injury which the suspension of specie payments, or failure of any bank, always inflicts on the poorer classes. But this measure will afford but a partial remedy against the general danger. The amount is variously estimated—at one fifth or one fourth part of the whole circulation: but no inconsiderable portion of this would be soon again supplied by five dollar notes. We repeat, that the true and efficient remedy is only to be found in a substantial restriction on the issues and loans of the banks.

According to the existing laws, the loans are restricted to twice and a half, and the amount of bank notes to twice the amount of the capital. The first restriction is insufficient; and the last can hardly be called a restriction. There is no bank which may not divide more than six per cent. if its loans are limited to twice the amount of its capital. Under proper management a much smaller amount is sufficient. The total amount of notes issued by all the banks of the northern states is less than one-third part of their capital. It will be seen by the last report of the bank commissioners, that the gross amount of all the notes issued, that is to say, the whole of the apparent circulation of the banks under the safety fund, amounted to 15,400,000 on a capital of 22,700,000 of dollars. The disproportion between the liabilities and resources is to be found in the extraordinary amount of issues of some of the banks. It is not for the purpose of enabling stockholders to make extraordinary profits, but for the public good, that banks are instituted. We are perfectly satisfied, that a restriction which would limit the issues of every bank to two-thirds of its capital, would be amply sufficient to secure to each a dividend of six per cent. and, in a great degree, to the state a sound currency, independent of the acts of any other legislative body.

By the instruction given to the committee at the public meeting, by which they were instituted, it became their duty to endeavor to effect an union of the chamber of commerce and the board of trade. This subject has been committed to a sub-committee, and has been brought by them to the consideration of those associations. It is understood that no definite plan of union has yet been agreed upon; but the committee trust, that as there are so many objects of great and mutual interest, some plan may be devised by which an efficient action and united efforts of both may always hereafter be secured, without the loss of any distinctive powers which either may desire to retain.

Before the preceding report had been read and unanimously accepted, by the meeting (more than 3,000 in number)—

John A. Stevens, a member of the committee, came forward, and, in the name of Albert Gallatin, esq. their chairman, presented the report prepared by them. The advanced age and feeble health of Mr. Gallatin, he trusted, would be a sufficient apology for the absence of that gentleman, who was particularly desirous on this occasion to meet his fellow citizens, and, by his presence, bear testimony to the deep interest he took in the present momentous state of affairs. Philip Hone, after some preliminary remarks, read the report. Pelatiah Perit, esq. then offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That this meeting, concurring in the views and opinions of the committee on the causes of the present distress, its proper remedies, and the measures of alleviation they have suggested, approved and adopt this report.
2. Resolved, That the city banks be requested to take into earnest consideration the several propositions submitted to them by the committee, and to adopt all the measures founded on mutual forbearance and assistance, and on concert and harmony of action, which may enable them to afford the greatest relief to the community.
3. Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the board of brokers to discontinue, in compliance with public opinion, sales of stocks on time, in the manner proposed by the committee.
4. Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be given to the union committee for the faithful discharge of their duties to this time, and that they be requested to continue their patriotic labors and to report further to a public meeting, or otherwise, as they may deem expedient.

After some remarks by Mr. Perit, the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Then the following resolutions, sent to the meeting by Albert Gallatin, esq. were proposed in his absence by John A. Stevens:

1. Resolved, That the removal of the public moneys from the place where they were by law deposited and declared by a late vote of congress to be perfectly safe, in virtue of the sole order of the president, issued only two months before that body was again to assemble, and with the avowed object of being enabled thereby to interpose his veto, if congress persisted in its opinion;

The unexampled interference with the officer to whom the public purse is intrusted, in the performance of duties by law exclusively assigned to that officer;

The appointment, during the recess of the senate, of a temporary officer, for the special purpose of doing an act, which no secretary of the treasury regularly appointed with the advice and consent of the senate would have performed;

Are an abuse of the powers vested by the constitution in the president, and encroachments upon the legislative authority of congress, upon the laws and upon the constitutional participation of the senate in appointments to office, which, unless arrested, must give to the president alone, the exclusive control over the public purse, over the currency, and over private and public credit.

2. Resolved, That these acts, and others of a similar description; the frequent and indiscriminate use of the president's veto; his belief in his own infallibility; his fixed determination that his will alone shall govern; the avowal that, whatever that may be, he must at all events, be sustained; or, in other words, "that the king can do no wrong"; the substitution of the worship of a man for our ancient notions of entire freedom of opinion and love of liberty, are subversive of the principles of our Institutions, and tend, ultimately, leaving us hardly the name and form of a republic, to convert it substantially into a monarchy.
3. Resolved, That there is a redeeming spirit in our free and glorious institutions, which guarantee their perpetuity; and that, for the true and only remedy, and with a perfect conviction of ultimate success, we fearlessly appeal to "the people of the U. States," our and their own legitimate sovereigns.

All which were unanimously adopted.

Hundreds of meetings of the people are yet just held or holding to adopt various proceedings with relation to the state of the currency, and effect a return of the public deposits. They sometimes meet in huge masses. The anti-bank meeting at Albany was succeeded by what is said to be a much larger one on the other side; and the spirit of it is running through the west with extraordinary rapidity and force. Similar meetings are going on, especially in Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and a good many in Kentucky, Ohio, Virginia, N. Carolina, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, with some in nearly every other state. The movements of the people have no precedent in our country—nor perhaps, in any other; but we regret to believe, that, comparatively speaking, the pressure is only just beginning to be felt. There already has been some occasional relaxations, and others, it is to be hoped, will happen, else "credit must perish," and one wide ruin over-shadow the whole land—which ought to be bright and flourishing and happy, as it was until politicians meddled with the currency.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 6—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, APRIL 5, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,176.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ We publish this week a large collection of scraps, illustrative of the present state of the currency and of the times—useful for present notice, and important to the history of “the experiment” that is making.

An abstinence from the publication of any long article this week, has given to the present number of the REGISTER a great variety of articles, though most of them relate to the all-engrossing subject—the state of the currency, and the pressure on the money market. The special message of the governor of New York—the account of the great meeting at Philadelphia, and the letter of Dr. Macneven, will claim much attention. Dr. Macneven is among the last survivors of the grand rally of the Irish patriots, and of the associates of the Emmets, the Orrs, the Tandys, the Keoghs, the Currans, the Sampsons, the Tones, the Rovans and the Moorees, and others—a race of giants in intellect, with a purity of principle and firmness of purpose, worthy of leaders in a sublime contest for genuine liberty. In early life, we had the pleasure of being personally acquainted with three or four of those named, and considered them as among the most splendid specimens of the human kind that we had ever met with. But Dr. Macneven needs not our humble testimony of his devotion to democratic principles—and the power which he possesses to support them, will be seen in his letter.

It is added that counsellor Sampson, and others of like high character and standing, agree with Dr. Macneven.

Baltimore has met with two severe losses within a week. On Monday last, the remains of Talbot Jones, esq. were returned to the earth, and on Thursday night Alexander Brown, esq. died! These were two of our oldest and most valued merchants—persons beloved for their private virtues, and esteemed for their public conduct. The first was among the most extensive of our traders with the interior; the second of the most important in our relations with Europe. It was the house of A. Brown & Sons that took the late loan required by the state of Maryland of 500,000 dollars, and if he, the deceased, had not moved in that business, it is said that 1,000 poor laborers on the Baltimore and Washington rail road would have been discharged—and, at a time like the present, to suffer!

We present you, Marcy's special message to the legislature of New York, and submit it to the cool consideration of our readers whether he is not at the “head of the heap” of the “panic makers?” What is it?—to borrow money, in fact, on the credit of the state, in Europe [foreign money] to lend to the banks in the city of New York, that they may lend to the country banks, that they may lend to the people! If “all who borrow money ought to break”—here is a “pretty kettle of fish,” and a big one too! And what are the “four or five millions” proposed to be borrowed? As the “small dust of the balance!” The banks in the city of New York have lately increased their discounts 3½ millions, and the money-pressure increases! And it will, until CONFIDENCE is restored. We have money enough, and, with confidence, would soon have credit enough.

[We have since received the report of a joint committee of the legislature of New York, to whom the governor's message was referred, and shall insert it next week. It concludes with a bill providing for the creation of a five per cent. state stock, amounting to six millions of dollars, redeemable in twelve years. Four millions of dollars of this stock is proposed to be loaned to the banks in the city of New York, and two millions to be sent to the loan offices in different parts of the state, to be loaned when the supervisors of the respective counties determine that they are in need of such aid. It also provides for a board of officers, &c.

VOL. XLVI—Siz. 6.

This novel and very important measure has, probably, been already passed into a law!—for the first section of it was passed by the assembly before certain of the members had had time to read the bill. For whatever reason these things have taken place, we think that every reflecting friend of a sound currency will view them with alarm. The precedent is dangerous—the practice altogether unsound—in our opinion; and we think that this is a subject on which we have some right to have and express an opinion.]

We have received the officially published lists of names attached to the petitions from Baltimore, for and against the restoration of the public deposits. We observe many mistakes of the printer in spelling them—but they are unavoidable.*

These lists of names have been looked over, and we note the following facts: to the petition for a restoration of the deposits there are signed 183 business firms, of which number 176 are known to us: on the other there are only six business firms, of which only one is known to us.

Of the first hundred names on the petition for restoration, eighty-four are those of persons known to us—and of the remaining 16 there are several so misspelled that we cannot surely identify them. On the other list, of the first hundred names only twenty-two are identified as being known to us.

Of the last hundred names on the first list we know fifty-one persons answering thereto—of the last hundred names on the second list we can, in like manner, identify only seven persons.

Each page of the lists contains about 150 names. Let us see how this sort of knowledge extends to some of them, taken at random.

On the 2d page of the first petition we know one hundred and seventeen persons and firms, as they are put down: on the same page of the second list we know only eleven persons.

On the 7th page of the first list we know 66 persons—on the same page of the second list no more than 8 persons.

On the 12th page of the first list we know 93 persons—on the same page of the second, we cannot undertake to say that more than three persons are identified by us—though the name of “Martin Van Buren” is on this page!

On the first list one person has made his mark with an X, and six names were “illegible;” on the second, 24 are marked with a cross X, and 27 are reported “illegible”—six being in “German.”

The last petition has the names of “Geo. W. Freas, esq.,” “Stephen Gates, esq.,” and “John Freas, esq.,” We have not the pleasure of being acquainted with either of these esquires.

Such are the results of a hasty examination. We do not pretend to perfect accuracy, but are sure that no great mistake has been made.

We have been doing business in this city since 1798, and came hither permanently to reside in 1805, and have mixed much with the people since the latter period. We refer to individuals, in both cases, that are personally known to us, or whom we otherwise know are in the “land of the living,” and can be found.

If the decision of the question concerning the public deposits were left to the judgment of the business-men of Baltimore, at least seven-eighths would say, restore them! And if, with the knowledge obtained through experience, they were called upon to decide, shall the deposits be removed? we think that 49 out of every 50 would give a loud and emphatic negative. Indeed, we can sincerely say that we have not met with a single man who, when pushed to give an honest answer, that has not pronounced the measure an unwise one—a "mistake;" but, as it was done, why—it couldn't be retired from, some said; i. e. the party must not waver in a course admitted to be unwise, though ruin shall follow a perseverance in it! By business-men we mean merchants and other dealers, shop keepers, mechanics, of all sorts, employers and journeymen, artists and trades-people—property holders and rent payers, and all persons who have had a settled home and citizenship with us two years, excluding however office-holders, who feed at the public crib, and the misérables who hope to get their share of the fodder—for all these like "mother Carey's chickens," lean, lank and hungry, delight in the storm. It is their "glory" to be in the whirlwind!—they have every thing to hope for, and nothing to lose.

*It is impossible to decipher many signatures—for many, like ourselves, have acquired a wretched habit of making certain marks, standing for our names, that are unintelligible to persons not familiar with them.

Mr. McKim represents the 5th congressional district, which is composed of the five first wards of the city of Baltimore, and the county of Anne Arundel. At the late election the votes stood thus—

	McKim.	Stewart.
5 wards of Baltimore	2,049	1,678
Anne Arundel county	1,132	1,114
	3,181	2,792

Now an instruction has been forwarded to Mr. McKim that he shall vote for a restoration of the public deposits. The exact number is not known to us—but it has been signed by more than 3,300 voters of the district—not persons who appear on an election-day and are not thereafter at all to be found; but individuals who have fixed residences with us, and probably being not less than three-fourths of the business-men, with the same proportion of the stationary and regular working people, mechanics or farmers, &c.

The committee who had this matter in charge, are honorable men. They personally obtained most of the names subscribed, and declare, that, to the best of their knowledge, there is not one person on the list who is not a voter of the district—and, as the vote, as stated above, was a high one, (5,973) it unquestionably appears that there is a clear majority of several hundred votes in favor of a restoration of the deposits,* and yet several populous districts had been neglected by those who had them in charge. Indeed, we understand that in the 3,300 is not included any names from the city of Annapolis, and from a whole election district of Anne Arundel county.

[P. S. As this paper was going to press we are told that the signers of the instruction, compared with the whole number of votes shew a majority of 715! Others lists were expected.]

The New York papers are filled with accounts of ward meetings, and meetings of different trades, or callings, to bear upon the ensuing election of corporation officers. Never before were such movements made in that city! For instance, a meeting of the carters opposed to the removal of the deposits, &c. was called by 300 or 400 of them, the numbers of whose carts being attached to their names—and there has been such another call and meeting of landlords and scamen—another signed by one hundred and eighty stone cutters, &c. &c. Powerful committees have been appointed on both sides—for an example, the anti-Tammany carters have appointed a committee of twenty to attend the polls of each ward, (dressed in their frocks), during the whole period of the election; and it is recommended that the friends of a restoration shall close their stores and work shops that they may attend to the business of the election! The "Tammanies" are equally busy. They have the benefit of an old organization—the respect of party for "regular nominations," an army of officers of the U. States, and of the state and city of New York of about 1,500 men, who have many dependents, whose persons and purses are at the command of the party, and the "spoils" amount to a million of dollars a year! All these will be on "duty." Besides this the "Tammanies" have that powerful influence which proceeds from the possession of former majorities of about six thousand votes. Mr. Verplanck, late a member of congress from that city, is the candidate of the "independent democrats" for the mayoralty, and Mr. Lawrence, a member of the present congress, will be supported by the "Tammanies." Mr. Lee, the present mayor, declined a poll.

*Whole number of votes 5,973—the half of which is 2,986, or less by 300 than the number of the signers. The districts not heard from might have easily furnished from 4 to 500 good names.

The excitement is not confined to the city of New York. Great masses of the people have met at Albany, Troy, Utica, Rochester, and, indeed, in most of the chief towns, and warmly expressed their feelings against the removal of the deposits, &c., and the local elections held in Poughkeepsie, Hudson, Newburg, Seleneetady, Rhinebeck, Claverack, Lansinburgh, &c. shew the effect of this excitement. The first for example, had a "Jackson" majority of 150 last year, now of 144 anti-Jackson.

At one of the great meetings lately held in New York, fifteen associations of different mechanics, &c. connected with commerce, sent in resolutions against the measures of the general and state governments.

A friend has asked, why we fixed the commencement of the "experiment" as the period at which we supposed it possible the bank of Maryland might fail any day, as stated in our last—saying that its issues had long before been excessive. In return, we said,—“We also so believed—but until the removal of the deposits, money was 'plenty,' and confidence great; and, in case of a pressure, it was easy to obtain redeeming funds on good security offered: soon after the credit of the best of our citizens availed little, and money became scarce.” We reasoned on this subject as Mr. Duane had done in his letter to the president of July last—though then we knew not that such a letter had been written—but supposed that every one who had considered the nature of the currency held the opinions which we oftentimes freely expressed, and also acted upon, to a considerable extent. There are several who will bear testimony that we cautioned them against entering into new engagements to pay money, if rightfully to be avoided—until the effects of the removal of the deposits should become manifest to them.

The pressure on the money market does not arise from any real scarcity of money, nor has it any sort of connection with the management of the affairs of the bank of the United States—unless local. 1. The specie capital has, probably, been increased more than two millions since the 1st October last, and there is no demand for money abroad, exchange being really 8 or 9 per cent. below par; and besides, the reduced price of almost every commodity has lessened the want for money to make purchases, in the amount of tens of millions of dollars. For instance, a cargo of 1,000 barrels of flour may now be obtained for 4,000 dollars, which would have cost 5,000, a little while ago—and 1,000 dollars less of money, or credit, is needed to carry on this small operation; and when we regard the diminished value of cotton, tobacco, rice, lumber, &c. &c. it may be easily believed that many millions less are now needed than were required before the "experiment" began. This is a matter of considerable importance, and the political economist will easily appreciate it. 2. But—while the bank of the United States has increased its circulation, and the line of its discounts is not reduced so much as that of its deposits, it appears by the report of the New York committee, inserted in the last REGISTER, that the banks in that city (for an example) including the office, have increased their loans more than $3,500,000—Feb. 19, 1834 being compared with 1st October, 1833.

Why then is money "scarce?" It is because confidence, the corner stone on which a wholesome currency rests, has been destroyed by a wild "experiment," and the hostile attitude which "the government" of the U. States has assumed against the bank; whereby industry is paralyzed, new enterprises abandoned, the circulation of money rendered a sluggish one, and a thousand bankruptcies happened. And so it is—that though money is really more plentiful than it was in October last, and though much less of it is needed to carry on the operations of business, than before the removal of the deposits—there does not appear to be a circulating medium sufficient to satisfy the common wants of the people! We foresee these things—they appeared as plain to us as they appeared to Mr. Duane*—and on this principle it was that we thought a failure of the bank of Maryland might happen on any day since the 1st October, 1833.

By the vote in the senate on the 25th ult. see page 83, it will be seen that Mr. Taney's reasons for removing the deposits would have been pronounced "unsatisfactory and insufficient" thirty to eighteen, had Messrs. Bell and Chambers been present, in the senate! We are inclined to believe that never before since the organization of the government of the United States, has so large a majority appeared in the senate against any leading measure of the executive branch of the government. And the present senate has a decided majority of those who were among the powerful supporters of the first election of general Jackson to the presidency.

The history of the existing administration bears an extraordinary character—one that has no parallel in our

*The 4th letter of Mr. Duane addressed to the people of the United States contains a letter from him to the president dated July 10, 1833, from which we make the following brief extracts—a part of which we have taken the liberty to present in italics. "Credit, like female fame, is of such a peculiar nature, that its blossoms may be blighted even by the breath of inquiry; what then, might not be the consequence of the blast of the indignation of government against an agent, in whose interest it was itself so deeply concerned? Much more trivial changes than that proposed by the president, have produced great commercial convulsions. Such a measure, as is urged, would be regarded by the bank, so decidedly hostile, as to afford it an excuse to shake the fabric of credit, for the purpose of throwing odium on the government, and producing a persuasion, that in the extension of the charter would be found the only remedy for the mischief. That it would not hesitate to do so, the president believes—that it ought not to have an excuse for doing so, the undersigned is certain.

"It is, indeed, mentioned, in the letter of the president, that the United States bank will not be able to effect any such purpose. But the undersigned is not satisfied, that an institution with so large a capital, with branches at so many important points, acting with one accord, and for a single end, with specie equal to half its circulation, has it not in its power to affect the operations of local banks, with specie equal to about a sixth of their circulation only. If the bank is really so harmless as this part of the president's letter supposes, then the alarm that the undersigned has at all times entertained, at the existence of such a power, is unfounded, and one of the most serious objections to the renewal of the charter is obviated. But the undersigned is not able to arrive at such a conclusion; he is convinced that it is in the power of the United States bank, so organized and so secured, grievously to affect the local banks and the community; the undersigned thinks that the trial ought not to be made.

"Beyond doubt, the power of the United States bank to control the local banks, and, through them, masses of the people, and through those masses, some of the constituted authorities of the country, is of such a character and tendency, as to excite alarm. But the very existence of such a power teaches extreme caution—such an adversary should gain no advantage from an abortive experiment to limit its influence.

"The struggle to be made, is not to see, which can do the other the most harm, the government or the bank. The government has but one duty to execute, to inform the people and their representatives of the apprehended danger. It is not called upon to maim the bank, lest the bank should master the country. In any attempt to maim, the agents of the bank would be those likely to escape: the wound would be felt in the cottage of the farmer, rather than in the palace of the banker.

"On the other hand, if the suggestion of the president is sound, that the United States bank dare not operate oppressively, because the state banks having government deposits, might run upon the branches, then there is a check at all times, in the hands of the government; and the bank, during its legal existence, will be careful not to do or omit, what might warrant a total removal of the deposits.

"So that the United States bank is represented by some of the local banks as an engine so powerful as to be an object of universal alarm; and, the next moment, so utterly feeble, that by the simple operation of a treasury order, the entire branches may be broken up one after the other, and the paper flung upon them in masses, which they will not be prepared to redeem! Which of these is the true picture? If a treasury order has such talismanic influence, can there be a better pledge for the safety of the public deposits? But, if it has no such power, is it discreet to commence the war? In all such calculations, as those referred to, the flinging back masses of bank paper, and breaking up the branches, are items, that seem to have caused no compassion for the ultimate sufferers. It appears to have been forgotten, that a large portion of the good and pure people of the land would be ruined—and why ruined! because the government of their country had put the power to ruin them in the hands of corporations, intent alone upon their own aggrandizement!—Whether it is wise to make such experiments, the undersigned, with confidence respectfully submits."

annals. The vice president, with the secretaries of state, war, navy and attorney general, and we think, also, the postmaster general, (which takes in all the "cabinet proper," except the secretary of the treasury), were of those who most decidedly rejected the "pretensions of Mr. Jackson" in 1824—but the latter supported them out of opposition to Mr. Adams, because that he, in the opinion of Mr. Taney, had deserted the federal party; and, if we are not mistaken, there is not, in what is called the "kitchen cabinet," more than one "original" friend of the general! The "eleventh hour men" have gathered the "spoils of the victory" gained. And of the eighteen senators who voted on the occasion above stated, we can count up five or six, and, perhaps, there are more, (for we do not know the original opinions of several of them), who stood in the same hostile position, even at the election of 1824.

And again—with the exception of the "force bill," which depended on other considerations than such as related to the support of the executive, (for it was carried by the votes of the opponents of the administration), only one favorite measure of the executive (the Indian bill) has been sanctioned by congress, and that by a weak majority (obtained we shall not say how), though in both houses there were large majorities of loud and lusty professing friends of the president. The exercise, however, of the hateful and despotic power of the veto, a power which a king of Great Britain has not dared to exercise for centuries, has placed the will of the senate and house of representatives at defiance, with respect to certain of the most important acts ever passed upon by these legislative bodies;† the first representing the states and the second the people.

Every one may make for himself reflections of the simple, but singular, facts presented. Never since constitutional government began has the like happened before—never will they happen again.

With the result above stated, will Mr. Taney restore the deposits, or retire from the place which he holds?

It is stated in the official "Globe" that the president will not receive any more committees, sent by the people to carry their petitions to Washington, praying for relief from sufferings inflicted by the acts of "the government." And on this subject the "by authority" paper, at Philadelphia, the Pennsylvaniaian, observes—

"Would not the uses to which the bitter enemies of the president pervert every thing which falls from his lips, justify him in closing his doors against the intrusion of the vulgar herds that daily infest his apartments?"

Who is the editor of the "Pennsylvaniaian?"—a foreigner or a native? We must suppose the former, and of a fresh importation, and hardly naturalized—certainly not civilized. "Vulgar herds" of the people!‡

†All the great Pennsylvania measures have gone by the board—

1. Internal improvements;
2. The protection of the national industry;
3. The bank of the United States;
4. The public land bill, as proposed by Mr. Clay.

All which had had the almost unanimous support of the politicians, as well as of the people of the state.

The 1st, 3d and 4th were put down by the veto of the president—the 2d partially yielded because of a justly entertained belief that the party in power would wholly destroy it.

‡Doctor Franklin in his historical review of Pennsylvania, holds the following manly and spirited language, in relation to the refusal of the proprietaries to receive "deputies from the people who asked for a redress of grievances.

"No king of England, as we can remember has ever taken upon himself such state, as to refuse personal applications from the meanest of his subjects. Even sultans, sophies and other eastern absolute monarchs will, it is said, sometimes sit whole days to hear the complaints and petitions of their very slaves; and are the proprietaries of Pennsylvania become too great to be addressed by the representations of the freemen of the province? If they must not be reasoned with, because they have given instructions, nor their deputy because he has received them, our meetings and deliberations are henceforth useless, we have only to know their will and to obey."

Dr. Franklin concludes his review with the following advice to the proprietaries, "that if they follow the advice of Rehobam's counsellors, they will, like him, absolutely lose, at least, the affections of the people. A loss, which, however they affect to despise, will be found of more consequence to them than they seem at present to be aware of."

We are not disposed to find fault—but claim, and will enjoy, the right of uttering the thoughts of our heart, in respectful terms, on all occasions. "Truth is a victor without violence."

Is it true that the acting secretary of state, and acting secretary of the treasury, have not yet been nominated to the senate? Did it ever happen before, that a congress had been four months in session, and two appointments by the president, of officers of such high dignity, remain in office, unapproved by the senate? We think not—and one of these important appointments, at least, would have been promptly ratified, by the concurrent power, if it had been offered for approval.

If we regard the power of the president, in the recess of the senate, to appoint persons to office, as being absolute—it is not less clear to our mind, that, while the senate is in session, such appointments are only acting, unless they are ratified. Such was the principle and practice of the old "democracy."

The reduced price of commodities and of wages, with the discharge of thousands of persons from employment,* have a powerful tendency to relieve the pressure of the money market on business-men—but at the cost of producers, farmers and other working people, in great sacrifices of private comfort and of the public good. Wheat, at Zanesville, Ohio, was 44 cents per bushel, on the 26th ultimo—at Batavia, Ohio, 37½ cents—flour at Cincinnati 275 @ 287½; and the Hudson, (N. Y.) Republican says that two of the cotton factories at Kinderhook have stopped work—that a large quantity of butter which had been sent to New York from Poughkeepsic, had been brought back, because a market could not be found for it—and that hay had been sold in the city of New York at "two shillings and six pence," that is, 31½ cents the 100, equal 6½ dollars the ton—adding that a quantity shipped from Catskill and Athens, (towns on the Hudson river), had been brought back. Bring back hay one hundred miles? But such things must reduce the amount of money wanted—at whose cost?

The state of things at Providence and its neighborhood may be partially estimated from the following brief notices of a memorial about to be presented to congress from the mechanics and artisans, a convention of whom (298 strong) was held a few days ago:

50,000 spindles are already stopped, and so have many of the machine shops—as for example, 2,475 tons of iron was used in the last year, but the present rate is less than 350 tons per annum—300 men were employed in the furnaces—now only 50. At this time last year, contracts for lumber amounting to $70,000 had been entered into—now only 1,400 dollars. The master builders are now without contracts, and so forth.

A profligate idea has been thrown out that if the senate and house of representatives shall not agree on the time of adjournment, the president will dissolve the "refractory" body! If so—this is the last congress that will be held under the present constitution. †

A Canada paper says—"Under the monarchy of England, the right of petition is held sacred. However tumultuous, or even dangerous the crisis, the avenues to the throne are kept open that the voice of complaint may be heard. In Denmark, we have been recently informed by Mr. Wheaton, the American charge, where the government is an absolute monarchy, the king holds open court every Monday, where he receives petitions and applications for redresses of grievances from every class of the people, from the lowest to the highest. All approach his majesty freely, and are received with the utmost courtesy and attention."

* They were often discharged by hundreds at a time.

† Mr. John Quincy Adams, in some late remarks in the house of representatives, said, among other things:

"It has, indeed, been freely surmised around this capitol, and circulated in whispers within this hall, that congress itself is not to be indulged with a session unreasonably long; but, when the deliberations of the house shall be sufficiently matured, according to the judgment of the chairman of the committee, then, by his fiat they are to cease, and as we have not had examples sufficiently signalized with arbitrary power, a disagreement is to be gotten up between the two houses of congress, in the result of which this house—the immediate representative body of the whole people of this union—is to be made the servile instrument of ministering to another exercise of royal prerogative."

The Philadelphia papers say—We understand that the Girard bank redeems the notes of the Union bank of Tennessee made payable at the bank of Maryland; and that funds amounting to 100,000 dollars have been received for that purpose.

We lately published an article on the circulation of values; and see it mentioned that at the Suffolk [Boston] bank, the exchanges were eight millions in the last year, of country notes only.

In former times, the fashion of bank-making was, that those who had money associated that they might lend it; but the fashion has latterly been for those who have not money to make banks, that they borrow its credits! Indeed, in times not long past, associations of knaves were made, who, among them all, had not money enough to pay for the paper and the plates for the purpose of making it, until they had in circulation a sufficiency of their own manufactured rags! As the beginning of such banks was rags, so will the end be. Are we not to have another huge crop of "rag barons?" Well—if so, we are ready to fight them again!

In 1826, Martin Van Buren, W. L. Marcy, B. F. Butler, C. E. Dndley, N. Sanford and others, the chiefs of what was called the "regency," very earnestly petitioned the bank of the United States to establish a branch at Albany; and, among other inducements, said that the local situation of that city "would, in a great measure render the bills of a branch established there the circulating medium of the extensive regions whose produce would be brought to that market!" If the bank is an "unconstitutional monster," these gentlemen, surely "committed" themselves wofully.

A letter from a gentleman of Ohio to the editor of this paper, after speaking of the general distress, says—"I will state to you a single fact with regard to myself (and I am only one of thousands in the same situation)—I am, and have been for several years, doing a considerable business, and have now on hand 5,000 dollars worth of wheat, at its average cost to me of 57 cents a bushel—but the best offer that I can get for it is 40 cents. The spring season has arrived, and my means to continue business are vested in wheat. Now I must submit to a loss of 850 dollars on my wheat, for which I have paid out my money for no other reason than to gratify the _____ of persons in power; for no man of common sense can deny that this state of things has been brought about by the attacks of the government on the currency. But for this, my business this season would have been as prosperous as ever."

Letters from Mr. Black, a senator, and from Mr. Cage, a member of the house of representatives of the United States, both from Mississippi, are published in the Natchez papers, and shew the determination of both to oppose the administration in its projects concerning the bank and the currency, &c. but neither of the gentlemen hold out a hope that relief may be expected from congress.

It is mentioned in the Pittsburgh papers, that reports prevailed in Baltimore prejudicial to the credit of the Merchants & Manufacturers bank. We had not, before seeing the Pittsburgh papers, heard of any such reports. The credit of the bank stands fair in this city.

rogative. I am not disposed to give credit to idle rumors, of which, there are, no doubt, now, as at all times, many in circulation without this house, and sometimes within it; but, from what I have seen and heard this morning, I cannot but cast, within myself, ominous conjectures upon the humiliating uses, of which this house is to be made the submissive instrument."

Mr. Wile, said—"In the opinion of his honorable friend from Missouri, (Mr. Ashley), that we ought to proceed to the appropriation bills, he could not concur. The moment these bills were passed, congress was no longer necessary to the "government," and there was a measure—which might be resorted to—which had been mooted—and which would effectually preclude all further discussion, as the favorite remedy of the majority for that great evil, freedom of debate. He need not be more explicit. Every one understood him."

We have astounding accounts of the product of certain of the gold mines in Virginia! Some of the rock ore of Mr. Boocker's mine is said to be worth from 250 to 300 dollars a bushel; other parcels weighing 100 lbs. worth 1,000 dollars! The mining business is also said to be good in North Carolina, as a regular employment.

The extra allowances made by the postmaster general to contractors for carrying the mail, though often slightly spoken of, have not yet excited much attention—the public mind being filled with other and more immediately important matters. The committee of the senate, however, will soon present as full a view of the affairs of the department as circumstances will permit.

The "Telegraph" of the 28th ult. gives a list of ten or eleven different contractors in Virginia, who have received about $60,000 for extra allowances, on contracts which amounted to only about $90,000! One of these, Mr. W. Smith, editor of a paper published in Culpepper, has three contracts, for a compliance with which he was to have received 8,100 dollars—but the extra allowances made him are presented in the sum of 9,550 dollars, or nearly 120 per cent. for extra services!

It will be seen in the proceedings of congress, that Mr. Blair, of the house of representatives from South Carolina, is dead. He shot himself, in a fit of insanity. He was one of the stoutest men that we ever saw.

A young Baltimore mechanic named James Mills, made a beautiful ascent from Federal Hill on Wednesday evening last. It is thought to have been a more splendid one than either of Mr. Durant's—but we are rather "used" to such things. The balloon, and all the preparations for the voyage, were made by Mr. Mills himself. He ascended a little before 5 o'clock, and landed at the Bodkin—16 miles, in 70 minutes after his balloon was let-go, without accident or injury.

Canada remains in a very agitated state—the representatives of the people resisting and protesting against the acts of the governor-general, against whom they were also preparing articles of impeachment.

Two Austrian frigates have arrived at New York with 245 Polish exiles. They have come to us in evil times. Thousands and tens of thousands of our own people are hard put to it to get a living, and make heavy claims on those yet able to do deeds of charity. The Poles at Harwich, in England, and Havre, in France, and also 212 who lately arrived at Portsmouth, Eng. on their way to the United States, have obtained liberty of the French government to settle in Algiers. There is a great field for honest labor in that country—as well as military employment, if preferred.

At a great riot among the Irishmen employed on the canal making near New Orleans, they had the presumption to resort to force, and to fire upon the city-guard sent out to restore them to order! They were quickly fired upon in return, and some of them wounded—and 23 leading ruffians were made prisoners. They had committed very great excesses. Such poor men, made mad by oppression at home—too often have to be brought to the necessity of submitting to the law in America. It is a misfortune that they are employed in masses. Separated, they soon learn to reason—if disposed to listen to its dictates. The time was when every good American citizen considered himself as a special constable to preserve the public peace. We hope that that time will return to us!

THE BANKS—THE CURRENCY AND THE TIMES.

Among the curiosities of the present times is the publication of a letter signed Reuben M. Whitney, in which he denies a statement made concerning himself by WILLIAM J. DOANE!

Meetings of the people, because of the embarrassments of their business and on account of the general ruin which seems to impend, are yet holding, in undiminished numbers, and in many cases attended by persons who were among the most ardent supporters of the present administration. They assemble in multitudes. More than three thousand attended a meeting at Newark, N. J. and great movements have lately been made in the rich and populous western counties of New York. The truth is every where becoming manifest, that it is the war of politicians against the bank of the United States, which has caused the oppression under which the people "groan."

Petitions have been presented to the legislature of Pennsylvania, praying for the interference of the state to prevent Gen. Jackson from assuming despotic power!

The best flour was recently sold at Maysville, Ky. at 24 dollars per barrel. Great consternation among the business men of the west prevails, on account of the embarrassments and reported bankruptcies at New Orleans.

A committee of the common council of Philadelphia, appointed to inquire into the effect of removing the deposits on the interest of the city, shew a loss of the large sum of 312,304 dollars—the cost of various bank and canal stocks in charge of the city for different public purposes, being compared with the present prices of them. They also speak of the depreciated value of the real estate left them by Stephen Girard. They advise that the city councils shall petition congress, praying for a restoration of the deposits, &c.

We hear of many more manufactories that have stopped work—in others a part of the working people are discharged, and those who remain have submitted to reduced wages, which are paid rather in a good feeling on the part of the employers, than in a hope of profit.

The rates of exchange are rising. "Virginia money" is at 4 and 5 per cent. in Baltimore, southern and south western 8 to 10. New York (country notes) 6 to 8 per cent. Ohio (good banks) 10 per cent. Pennsylvania (inferior) from 2 to 5. New England 2½ to 3. District of Columbia 1 to 2—unequally.

These rates of sharing are extensively paid, for the people must have "Baltimore money" to pay their notes, unless of the bank of the United States, which is "current," though issued at Portland, in the north, St. Louis, in the west, or New Orleans in the south.

In an interview of one of the committees, the president, on the authority of "Henry Horn," of Philadelphia, who, as he said, "could not lie," declared that John A. Brown, esq. of the city just named, had been "bought up by the U. S. bank, with a million dollars." But the matter charged being totally false, and without a shadow of foundation, has given rise to a sharp correspondence which will, probably, be soon laid before the public. Somebody has "fied."

The following are among the names signed to a petition presented by Mr. Cambreleng, approving of the removal of the deposits:

Billy Cahill,	Nick Corshoar,
Tom Niles,	Peter Goircrow,
Jim Crow, jr.	Bull Burk, jr.
Teddy O'Rooke,	Port Levi,
Duff Green not ded,	Bryon the Brave, king of Leinster,
Col. Pluck,	James Twaedle,
Black Hawk,	Jim Cannon,
Hurrah for Jackson,	Tim Floodily,
Peter Pocuek,	Hugh Toughy,
Peter Parley,	Peter Scrap.

A Harrisburg paper says—"The state loan, of a little more than $75,000, was taken on Tuesday, by Mr. Moss, of Philadelphia, acting as agent of the Rothschilds, of London. The premium given, is one fourth of one per cent. or two dollars and fifty cents for a thousand dollars. The premium promised by Dr. Burden on the same loan, was thirteen and fifty-one hundredths per cent. The premium now received, is about $1,833; making a loss to the state of more than thirteen and a quarter per cent. or a portion more than $96,564. It is said that the Messrs. Allens, who purchased the loan of Dr. Burden, will pay the difference to the state. Whether they are obliged to do it we do not know."

It is added, that the same party has offered to take the two million loan which is required at one mill above par—that is, one dollar premium on 1,000, or 2,000 dollars in two millions! The same, at this time last year, would have been gladly taken at 130 dollars on the 1,000, or 260,000 dollars premium on the two millions. So works the "experiment"—for which the politicians of Pennsylvania have changed one of the late most cherished principles of the people of the state, and thrown up their hats. The difference is nearly 350,000 dollars against the people of the state in one year. And yet, on the 21st ult. the following resolutions passed the senate of the state:

"1. Resolved, That he present bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered by congress.

"2. Resolved, That the government deposits which have been withdrawn from the bank of the United States ought not to be restored."

The first of these was adopted by a vote of 19 to 13—the second by a vote of 18 to 14. A resolution offered as a substitute, to the effect that a bank of the United States ought to be established during the present session of congress, was lost 11 voting for, and 21 against it. Two other resolutions for the re-

*Mr. Forsyth, of Geo. lately said in the senate, when speaking of the committees who had visited Washington—"Certain gentlemen who come here complaining of the public distress may well be compared with a Methodist preacher exhorting his congregation groan! sinners! groan!"

charter of the bank and against the removal of the deposits, were rejected—ayes 10, nays 22. Another for making the bank the depository of the public funds, was negatived by 20 votes to 12.

The project of establishing a ten million bank has, however, been promptly put down in the house of representatives of Pennsylvania.

The "pressure" is only just beginning to be felt, as it were, in the south-west; and many doleful letters are published from Louisiana and Mississippi. A considerable amount in draughts of the Planters bank of Natchez, on one of the banks of New York, have been dishonored and returned—the solvency of the drawer was not then doubted, but an instant regard to means forbade accommodations. "Save himself who can," is the principle on which the banks most commonly act, and now must act.

With respect to the petitions presented to congress, Mr. Forsyth lately said in the senate of the United States! "Our tables are loaded with miserable petitions, got up by miserable means and for miserable objects, and organized in pot houses."

A large part of our trade with China has been carried on by bills of the bank of the United States, drawn on London, which were better than dollars, even at Canton, without considering the risk and trouble and cost of their exportation; and with this advantage also, that if the ship, with all on board of her, goes to the bottom of the ocean, or is captured by pirates, &c. the amount of such bills are still safe for the rightful owners. Such was the credit of an institution which has been denounced as an unsafe depository of the public money!

The effect of the "experiment" on real property may be appreciated from the following—It is mentioned in the Lancaster (Pa.) Examiner, that a two-story brick dwelling house in that city, within a few doors of the court house, was offered at public sale a short time since, and not a single bid obtained! A year ago it would have sold readily for five or six thousand dollars. The like has probably not occurred before since Lancaster was a town.

It is stated that the work on the fortification, at Newport, Rhode Island, has been suspended, and a great number of workmen turned adrift. While the work went on, there was a monthly disbursement of about $12,000, a great part of which went into immediate circulation in the town.

From what we see in the various papers received by us, it would appear that tens of thousands of dollars in draughts, drawn by certain of the local banks or others, have been protested, within the period of the past month. We frequently see the notice of fresh incidents of this kind. The state banks cannot carry on the exchanges of the country. The "experiment" has already most miserably and oppressively failed.

From seven to eight thousand spindles have been stopped on Fall River.

The economical and, heretofore, thrifty state of Vermont is in a high degree of excitement, on account of the general distress produced by the measures of "the government." The late three parties in that state are rapidly uniting into one, in a sense of common danger.

The official "Globe," lately speaking of Mr. Duane, as secretary of the treasury, and with relation to the public deposits, called him a "REFRACTORY SUBORDINATE," for not doing, at the command of the president, that over which the law gave him the sole discretion! This is the ne plus ultra of impudence—a submission to power that a Russian boor might blush at.

It is supposed that 35,000 bales of cotton less than in the last year, will be consumed in New England, in the present.

The petition from the 3d congressional district of Pennsylvania for the restoration of the deposits, &c. contained 4,672 names, and was 240 feet 9 inches long.

One to two per cent. premium is paid in Ohio, in exchanges of coin for the bills of the bank of the United States, and four per cent. in north Alabama!

BANKS AND THE CURRENCY—MISCELLANEOUS. [Deferred items.]

A late number of the Providence Journal contained ninety-nine applications, to the court of the county for the benefit of the insolvent laws.

In the present emergency, many of the wholesale dealers of Boston have entered into an agreement, not to sue for, or take security of their debtors, except in cases of clear necessity, and then only for the benefit of all the parties so associated.

The "Boston Courier" with reference to a letter published in the "Globe" as if written at Boston, which says the "money pressure is very much exaggerated," observes—"No account can exaggerate it. The types are not yet cast, that can represent things worse than they really are."

Many and heavy failures are taking place. We have no heart to give detailed accounts of them. There is another "sign of the times." It seems that the individual frauds of 1819-20, are about to be revived by persons in whom much confidence has been reposed.

Seventy protests were recorded in one bank of New York, on the 3d ultimo.

The importation of foreign goods will, probably, be very small, this spring—many orders have been countermanded, and some large lots actually sent back, rather than pay or secure the duties upon them, in the "prospect before us;" and yet all sorts of goods are very low, because of the appreciated value, and prevailing scarcity of money. Bills on England are  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. "below par," as it is called—that is 438 cents for the £ sterling, the legal par being 480, and the average real par, for many years past, about 458.

In corroboration of the above, a letter from Manchester, Eng. recently published in a New York paper, informs, that "an immense number of countermand orders" have just been received there. "These orders forbid the shipping of another piece of goods and direct the sale of those that are ready for shipment. And adds that, as money is plenty in England at 3 per cent. the writer hopes that it may be employed through private bankers in the United States. This would be a thriving business just now. Several millions sterling might be loaned out on the best possible security at 12 per cent. per annum, or more.

Ten new banking institutions with an aggregate capital of $4,400,000, were incorporated at the late session of the legislature of Ohio. The bank of Kentucky, just incorporated, is to have a capital of five millions. Indiana has also established a state bank. Very strict conditions appear to be provided for the good and safe management of these institutions. A friend has transmitted to us a very interesting view of the organization of the latter, which we shall yet endeavor to make a place for, at a future day. A ten million bank is asked to be incorporated in New York—half of the stock to be held by the state. "The project is said to embrace a borrowing of money from foreigners. Ought not such a bank to "break?" But if all persons who trade on borrowed capital should break, how many dealers would stand firm? The members of the first congress and president WASHINGTON, were the fathers of the credit system in the United States, by allowing time for the payment of duties on goods imported, and the avowed object was to furnish a borrowed capital to favor the merchants and dealers. And even yet, though the period of the credits on duties has been considerably reduced, the United States is a great lender of capital—for the duties pass into the value of the goods when sold by the merchant, in the same manner as his own original investment of money in them.

It is said that the safety fund banks are rapidly reducing their discounts.

At Boston the tariff of bank notes was as follows on the 10th ult. Bills of the banks of New England (generally) par—of New York city 1 per cent. discount, others of New York 3&5; New Jersey 5&10; city of Philadelphia 2; of Baltimore 2; of the District of Columbia 4. The eastern bankers deserve great credit for keeping their own notes at par all over New England. It is not so in any other district of country in which there are many banks, though "specie paying."

A very large public meeting of the citizens and merchants of New Orleans was held at the Planters' hotel, in that city, on the evening of the 19th ult. S. W. Okey, esq. presided. The resolutions, which were adopted with great unanimity, state that the "people of New Orleans, from a state of high prosperity, are reduced to one of misery and distress, by the pressure on the money market, which has depressed the value of produce and of real property, and increased the rate of interest to 18 and 24 per cent. per annum, which is grinding every portion of the community, and, unless relief is soon afforded, must be productive of the heaviest calamities"—and attribute this condition of things to the unfortunate collision between the government and the bank of the United States, and more particularly to the removal of the public deposits. The New Orleans Bulletin states that the assemblage was overflowing, and without distinction of party.

And a late letter says that some loans had been negotiated at five per cent. a month! And adds—it is reported that the payments to be made in this city, on or before the 3d day of April next, will exceed two millions of dollars, and that one million of dollars are due on real estate in the city or suburbs.

A letter from Pottsville, Pa. published in the Philadelphia papers, dated March 10, says—"I have been in business for many years, but I never saw such times. There is no business doing here. About two thousand men are looking for work, and every thing is at a stand. A great many men with their families have to go to the house of employment to keep from starving. Hands can be got for their boarding."

The bank committee in the senate of Massachusetts have reported that, in their opinion, it is inexpedient to grant any new bank charters during the present session.

It is stated that "one bank in N. York is in possession of two hundred and forty houses that have suspended payment since the removal of the public deposits.

The Philadelphia "Commercial Intelligencer" observes—"we have never been the apologist or champion of the bank of the United States; but now that we are struck with surprise at the blindness of those who prefer one hundred United States banks, equally corrupt, and, as organized, far more powerful. Such an engine will be enabled to rule the country with a rod of iron; and it will be in the hands of those who will not leave it unemployed."

The cotton planting states are beginning to feel the pressure, and are holding many meetings, and petitioning for relief; say in Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, and some in North Carolina and Georgia.

The N. Y. "Journal of Commerce" has the following paragraph—We understand that specie has been imported from France, which cost in Paris five francs and a quarter per silver dollar, and has been paid for in bills of exchange purchased here, at a fraction less than five francs and three quarters for a dollar. This calculation exhibits the actual rate of exchange as nine per cent. in favor of this country. A favor however which costs us rather too dear. At this rate a bill of exchange on Paris which costs one hundred dollars in New York, will purchase one hundred and nine just such dollars in Paris. After deducting all expenses of freight, interest, insurance, &c. there is good room for profit on the importation. In France at this time, money is cheap and every thing else dear. Here, the opposite is the case; money is near and almost every thing else cheap; especially all manufactured articles, whether of our own or other countries. But few articles in all the range of fabrics of wool, cotton or silk can either be made or imported at this time, and sold by auction, without a loss of ten to twenty-five per cent.

It seems to have been agreed, that the "pressure" was much less heavy on Baltimore than on her sister cities—but a great deal of "unquestionable" paper was exchanged, on Saturday the 22d ult. in this city, for "money," at the rate of SIXTY per cent. per annum; and the demand was far from being satisfied at that precipitous usance. Vires acquirit eundo!

Doctor Franklin, in his will, providing a fund for loans to industrious young men, remarks:

"Having myself been bred to a manual art, printing, in my native town, and afterwards assisted to set up my business in Philadelphia by kind loans of money from two friends there, which was the foundation of my fortune and of all the utility in life that may be ascribed to me, I wish to be useful, even after my death, if possible, in forming and advancing other young men, &c.

"[Franklin was a fool! The moment a man borrows money that he may make money, he "ought to break." It is the "unpardonable (political) sin" to doubt this—and the proof is, that no small number of the honorable ones who "glory" in this principle, have acted upon it, and "punished" those who befriended and confided in them!]

"Hundreds of manufacturing establishments have much reduced, or altogether stopped their operations. There would be a great rise in the price of goods in consequence of such proceedings, if the people had the usual supply of money to pay for them.

There have latterly been many arrivals of specie in the United States, and more may be expected, so long as bills on London are nine or ten per cent. below par, and millions may be safely invested in the United States at from one to two per cent. per month, or 12 a 24 per cent. a year! In this condition of the country, specie will not be exported—nor will it do us much good. Of what consideration is ten millions in specie, compared with the wreck of confidence and embarrassments of the banks? The chief part of the arrivals of specie has been at New Orleans—but the want of money is severely felt in that city and its vicinity.* And even treasury draughts on New Orleans have been sold at 2 per cent. discount at Louisville and other places on the Ohio; and notes of the bank of the United States are worth from 3 to 4 per cent. advance at sundry places on the western waters. One could hardly believe in this degraded state of the currency, unless in the certainty of its existence.

If all who do business on a "borrowed capital ought to break," the canals of New York and Pennsylvania should be filled up, as having been dishonestly made—on borrowed capital, and not yet returned. Let the wrong be quieted! Nay, the United States ought to surrender up their sovereignty to his "most gracious majesty," William IV.—for that sovereignty was won by the aid of borrowed capital. "Perish credit!"

The state of Maryland five per cent. loan of $500,000, being the state's proportion of the capital required for the construction of the Washington rail road, has been taken, at par, by the house of Alexander Brown & sons, of Baltimore; and will, most probably, fall into the possession of foreigners, unless prevented by the want of confidence in American stocks. Ought Maryland to break, for thus borrowing money?

A gentleman residing near Carbondale, Pa. in a letter to the editor of the REGISTER dated March 5, communicates the following:

About six years ago, the Delaware and Hudson canal company commenced operations in this valley—at that time there only stood a solitary log-house where now stands Carbondale, which, last summer, had a population of 3,000 souls; and all things were lively, and continually pressing onward. To the enlarged and enlarging business of the coal company, was added a great business doing in lumber, &c. Now the prospect a-head is oppressive in the extreme, and hundreds of laborers, miners and mechanics are wandering about, totally idle, and many of them penniless. The merchants cannot collect their debts, for the reward of labor is no longer to be found. Would that those who have caused this changed aspect of things, (says the letter) were present to witness the effect of their meddlings with the currency of the country.

*The "Globe" of the 10th has a paragraph which says that the deposit banks at New Orleans, "in connexion with the branch of the bank of the United States," have increased their loans in the sum of 3,189,666 dollars! Why is money "scarce?"

The various trades connected with the manufacture and publication of books are suffering very severely. This has been a great business in the United States; and beginning with the rag-gatherer and ending with the bookseller, probably employing not less than 40,000 persons—chiefly adult males—and, perhaps, subsisting 60,000 free people.

We recently made two walks through Baltimore, and in each proceeded beyond the closely-built parts of the city—the distances, going and returning, (by different routes), being about five miles, in the whole of which we observed the building commenced of only one good house this season, and the cellars preparing for four small ones. One walk was to the east, the other west. It is well that there is a good deal of work yet to do before the houses commenced in the last season will be finished.

The secretary of the treasury has reported, in consequence of the call made upon him in Mr. Poindexter's resolutions concerning the transfer of certain deposits from the Planters' bank of Mississippi. It appears that nearly a million of dollars had accumulated in that bank, and that the secretary thought it best to transfer 250,000, each, to the Commercial bank at New Orleans, and Union bank of Tennessee, at Nashville, to be disbursed for the removal of the Indians and other expenses in the west.

The London Morning Chronicle of January 29th, speaking of the commercial distress in the United States on account of the president's hostility to the bank, observes, "while the question remains under agitation the most serious injury is inflicted on trade. Correspondents of mercantile houses here intreat them not to make any shipments whatever, as it was impossible to foresee to what extent the failures would be carried, and that it was impossible to give the usual credit to those parties who stood high in public estimation."

The Manchester (Eng.) Chronicle, in allusion to the laborers employed upon our canals, rail roads, &c. observes, "thus many of the gigantic undertakings, which gave employment to immense numbers of laborers, have been suspended. As no certain calculation can be formed of the possible extent to which matters will be carried in the United States, the export trade has almost ceased, whilst, on the other hand, the natural anxiety of the American merchants to turn their goods into money has occasioned a considerable increase in the amount of their consignments to England."

[We hope that the spread of this news by the Manchester Chronicle, may have effect to prevent the emigration or exportation of papers to the United States. We may have quite enough to do to find employment and food for our own working people.]

Mr. Beardsley, one of the representatives in congress from New York, recently said in his place—"Sooner than extend the existence of the bank of the United States, let it perish, and in its fall carry down every bank in the union. I say for one, perish credit, perish commerce, perish the state institutions. Give us a broken, decayed, worthless currency, rather than the ignoble and corrupt tyranny of an irresponsible corporation."

It is stated that one of the members of the house of representatives of Pennsylvania, had openly said—"I would sooner see every constituent I have reduced to be worth but 24 hours provisions, than to see the United States' bank rechartered."

And that a person holding one of the most lucrative offices in the gift of the United States, at Boston, has declared—

"Were a torch applied to the whole line of cities on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and each one razed to the ground, the loss to the country would be of little consequence compared with a relaxation of the measures of the executive against the bank."

The favorite argument of those who advocate the killing of the United States' bank is, that it is dangerous so much commotion and distress to wind it up, it is a dangerous institution, and ought not to be permitted to exist. Now, we all know we must die, and that when the time comes there will be a great deal of grief, and perhaps distress: But who would commit suicide to avoid these consequences? No man in his senses, certainly.

Seventy notes were lately protested in a bank in Philadelphia in one day.

[If the condition of things is not speedily changed, Mr. Beardsley may be pretty nearly gratified, in the fulfilment of his imprecations.]

—•••••
TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.
SENATE.

March 28. Mr. Webster presented a memorial signed by about 2,800 of the citizens of Albany, New York, ascribing the pecuniary embarrassments of the country to the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States, praying for their restoration and for their recharter of the bank.

Mr. Webster accompanied the presentation with some appropriate and forcible remarks.

Mr. Wright, of New York, expressed a wish to reply to the senator from Massachusetts, in case the senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Clay), who was entitled to the floor, was willing to postpone the continuation of his remarks to another day. He held in his hand another memorial adverse to the one just presented containing the signatures of 1,700 of the citizens of Albany.

Mr. Clay said he felt some reluctance to interfere with the remarks of the senator from New York, but as he was confident he shared in the anxiety to go on with the debate on the resolutions which were the order of the day, if it met with his entire approbation, he would move to lay the memorial on the table, in order to give him an opportunity of making his remarks to-morrow. Mr. C. then made a motion to that effect, which was carried.

Mr. Forsyth then suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky to take up his resolution on the subject of the Union bank of Maryland.

Mr. Clay said he had intended to call up that resolution yesterday, but as the gentleman from Georgia was not in his seat, who he understood wished to address the senate on the subject, he declined doing so; and that he now proposed to call it up on Monday next.

The chair then called the order of the day, being the report of the finance committee on the removal of the deposits, &c. when

Mr. Clay rose and concluded his remarks.

Mr. McKean rose, at the moment when the question was about to be put, and said he should vote against both resolutions because they were censorious; but that his votes on these resolutions were not to be taken as evidence of what his course would be when a distinct proposition, granting relief to a suffering community, should be presented.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the first of the above mentioned resolutions, in the following words:

Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States, deposited in the bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to congress on the 4th day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

And the question upon agreeing to this resolution was taken as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, King, of Geo. Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, of Ala. Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—18.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Clay, then, at the instance of some of his friends, modified his resolution, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.

And the question being taken on agreeing to this resolution, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Ala. King, of Geo. Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—20.

So this resolution also was agreed to.

[The absent senators were Messrs. Bell, of N. H. and Chambers, of Md. both of whom would have voted with the majority, in either case.]

Mr. Waggaman moved that, when the senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday; but the motion was negatived—ayes 21, noes 23.

The senate then adjourned.

March 29. Mr. Webster presented two memorials; one from the borough of Muncey, Pa. and the other from the township of Muncey creek, in the same state, against the removal of the deposits. Which memorials were read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster also presented the memorial of 312 inhabitants of Watervliet, New York, of the same character, and praying that their memorial may be considered as united with the one presented from the citizens of Albany, (the day before).

Mr. Webster said he would not ask for the reading and reference of the Watervliet memorial until the one from Albany should be taken up.

Memorials of a similar nature were also presented by Mr. McKean from the citizens of York, Pa. and by Mr. Tyler from about 300 citizens of the county of Culpeper, Va. which memorials were read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Kent, of Md. presented a resolution passed by the legislature of Maryland, uniting upon the senators from that state to use their best exertions to obtain from congress such a liberal appropriation of the public funds, in aid of the further construction of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, as shall insure its completion.

Mr. Kent, in presenting the resolution, said he took great pleasure in laying it before the senate, because the legislature of Maryland have not approached congress before they had done something themselves to the purpose. They have not prayed to Hercules without first putting their own shoulders to the wheel. They have made a further subscription to the great work, and they rely on the government of the United States, who is a joint stockholder with Virginia and Maryland, to do so likewise, and he looked forward with confidence, that when the proper period arrives, the senate would not disappoint them.

The resolution was read and referred to the committee on roads and canals.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Ewing, calling for information relative to the post office department; and

The resolution relative to the lands acquired by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, were severally considered and adopted.

Mr. Benton submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the house of representatives, to consider and report to the senate and to the house respectively, what alterations, if any, are necessary to be made—

1st. In the value of the gold coined at the mint of the United States, so as to check the exportation of that coin, and to restore it to circulation in the United States.

2d. In the laws relative to foreign coins, so as to restore the gold and silver coin of foreign nations to their former circulation within the United States.

3d. In the joint resolution of 1816, (for the better collection of the revenue) so as to exclude all bank notes, under twenty dollars, from revenue payments after a given period, and to make the revenue system of the United States instrumental in the gradual suppression of the small note circulation, and the introduction of gold and silver for the common currency of the country.

Mr. Wilkins, from the committee on foreign relations, reported a bill extending the time for settling the claims of American citizens under the late treaty with Naples; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Preston presented the memorial of the city authorities of Charleston, S. C. praying for the establishment of a naval hospital—referred.

Mr. Hendricks presented the petition of the officers of the army stationed at Fort Dearborn, remonstrating against the passage of the bill before congress for the creation of a provident pension fund, &c.—referred.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and when the doors were opened the senate adjourned.

March 31. Mr. Bibb offered the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the secretary of the department of state be requested to lay before the senate, as soon as practicable, all the information which has been obtained under a resolution of the senate of the 26th February, 1833, touching the population of the United States, of all kinds, native and alien, the militia, and such other statistical information as the secretary might deem useful and expedient. And particularly that he lay before the senate all the information which has been obtained under the circulars issued by Mr. Livingston, propounding queries to obtain information, as well on the subjects particularly mentioned, as upon the subjects confided to his discretion by that resolution.

Memorials in favor of the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented by the following persons: by Mr. Mangum, from citizens of the town of Wilkesborough; by the same from citizens of Mountsville, by the same from 500 citizens of Beaufort, North Carolina; as also the proceedings of a meeting of the county: by Mr. King, of Ala. from citizens of Mobile, who complain grievously of the embarrassment and losses sustained by them.

All which were read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. King introduced a bill for the better organization of the district courts of Alabama, which was read a first and second time and referred.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the resolution moved some days since relative to the Union bank of Maryland, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. Clay then modified his resolution to read as follows: Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union bank of Maryland, when or on what account it was deposited, and also whether any treasury draughts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, or at any time heretofore, to the bank of Maryland, for any and what purpose. And that he likewise report what amount of stock in the capital of said Union bank was held by R. B. Taney, esq. when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive in deposita the public money, and what amount of the said stock he now holds.

The resolution, as modified, was then agreed to.

Mr. Poindexter offered the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioner of the general land office be directed to communicate to the senate the number of patents in his office prepared for the signature of the president of the United States, which have not been signed, and the number of final certificates filed in his office on which patents have not been prepared for signature.

Mr. Poindexter offered the following resolution, which lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That one thousand copies of the journals of the old congress and of the senate, including in separate volumes the confidential proceedings, with a compendious index to the whole, in each volume, be printed for the use of the senate, and that the same be retained, subject to the further order of the senate.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the memorial of the citizens of Albany, in favor of the restoration of the deposits, presented a few days since by Mr. Webster.

Mr. Wright rose and replied to Mr. Webster, and was followed by Messrs. Ewing and Clay. The memorial was read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Wright then presented the memorial of 1,700 citizens of Albany in favor of the removal of the deposits, which was also read, referred and ordered to be printed.

The senate then took up in succession thirty-eight bills for the relief of private individuals, which were severally read a first and second time and referred; and the senate then adjourned.

April 1. Mr. Wright asked leave to present to the senate a report from the minority of the select committee on the subject of the contested election of Messrs. Robbins and Potter, each claiming a seat as a senator from Rhode Island.

After some conversation between Messrs. Wright, Poindexter, Frelinghuysen, Sprague and Ewing, on motion of Mr. Ewing it was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Frelinghuysen, the senate took up the bill making appropriations for the repair and completion of the Cumberland road.

Mr. Hendricks moved an amendment, to apply a portion of the appropriation to building toll gates and toll houses on the road.

Mr. Poindexter opposed the application of the money to any purpose but the repair of the road.

Mr. Hendricks proposed the amendment because the act of the legislature of Pennsylvania contemplated the taking of the road when the toll gates and houses were up.

Mr. Clayton was opposed to the whole bill on principle. The internal improvement system, was designed as a national system; and the proposed cession to the states through which the road passed, would be destructive of this great principle.

After some further remarks favorable to the amendment, by Messrs. Ewing and Frelinghuysen, Mr. Hendricks withdrew his amendment, when

Mr. Preston offered an amendment, proposing a conditional cession of those parts of the road passing through the states of Maryland and Pennsylvania, to those states respectively.

Mr. Wilkins opposed the amendment, on the ground that it would defeat the bill.

After some further remarks by Messrs. Clay, Ewing and Kane, the amendment was disagreed to.

The question on ordering to be engrossed, and read a third time, recurring, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Clay, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kane, Kent, Linn, Morris, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Silsbee, Southard, Tipton, Wagman, Wilkins—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Forsyth, Hill, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Preston, Shepley, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, White, Wright—22.

The senate adjourned.

April 2. Mr. White, one of the majority, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday on the rejection of the bill making appropriations for the repairs and continuation of the Cumberland road; and after a short and desultory debate, in which Messrs. White, Clay, Poindexter, Ewing, Sprague and King, of Alabama, took part.

Mr. Preston called for the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, Ewing, Grundy, Hendricks, Kane, King, of Ala., Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, White, Wilkins, Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Hill, King, of Geo. Leigh, Moore, Preston, Tyler—8.

The bill was then recommitted to the committee on roads and canals.

The following message was received from the house of representatives, by Mr. Franklin, their clerk:

In the house of representatives, Wednesday, April 2d, 1834.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the senate to notify that body of the death of JAMES BLAIR, late one of the representatives from the state of South Carolina, and that his funeral will take place this day, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, from the hall of the house of representatives.

The message having been read—

Mr. Preston said—I am sure the senate will sympathise with us on these emotions of profound sorrow with which I rise to propose the customary resolution upon such an event. The sudden death of general Blair, in the vigor of life, and in the midst of its most strenuous pursuits, cannot fail to impress all minds with the most solemn feelings—which to us are enhanced by his association with us in the same pursuits, and by the fact that this is the second instance this session of such an awful and sudden dispensation of Providence. We, his colleagues of the South Carolina delegation, lament his loss not the less that he has differed with us in some points of public policy. Such differences have never extended to personal separation; for each has expensed the zeal of the other, by a mutual and equal acknowledgement of zeal; and God forbid that any such difference should impede for a moment the sad current of feeling which now passes through my heart. To whatever the deceased addressed himself, he brought uncommon force of character, firmness of purpose and vigor of intellect. His country and his constituents have to mourn the loss of these qualities at this important juncture of our affairs; and upon me devolves the melancholy duty of moving the following resolution:

Resolved, That the senate will attend the funeral of the hon. James Blair, late a member of this house of representatives from the state of South Carolina, at the hour of 4 o'clock this evening; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was then unanimously adopted; and, on motion of Mr. Preston, the senate adjourned.

April 3. The chair laid before the senate a message from the president of the U. S. enclosing a communication from the governor of New Jersey, on the subject of the adjustment of the boundary line between that state and the state of N. York.

Memorials, &c. praying for the restoration of the deposits, were presented as follows—by Mr. Prentiss, from inhabitants of Chittenden county, Vermont; by Mr. Sprague, from the citizens of Bath, Maine. Read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Benton presented certain resolutions adopted at a meeting held in Boston, adverse to the restoration of the deposits, &c. Read and referred, &c.

The special order, being the report of the judiciary committee on the pension funds in the U. S. bank, was taken up, when on motion of Mr. Clayton, it was postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. Wright then moved that the senate go into executive business, which motion was negatived.

The bill to repeal the force bill was then taken up, but on motion of Mr. Calhoun was laid on the table.

Several bills of a private or local character being attended to, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 28. Mr. J. Q. Adams asked leave to offer the following:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to lay before this house, copies of the charters of all the banks selected by him, as depositories of the public moneys in the place of the bank of the United States and its branches—together with the names of the presidents, directors and stockholders, in the said selected banks, with the amount of stock in said banks, held by each stockholder, and the amount of debt due by each president, cashier and director, of each of the banks, to the said banks, at the time when it was selected as a depository, and at this time.

Mr. Polk said, as the information was already before the house, he must object.

Mr. Adams insisted that it was not, and he moved the suspension of the rule of the house to enable him to offer it.

Mr. Williams called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Polk then said, that he would withdraw his objection.

The resolution having been read.

Mr. Ewing rose for the purpose of submitting an amendment, calling for information whether the deposit banks had lawyers and solicitors employed.

Mr. Wayne said as the resolution must stand over one day the amendment was not in order.

After a few remarks from Mr. Speight—

The chair explained the rule; when

Mr. Adams accepted Mr. Ewing's amendment as a modification, and the resolution lies over until to-morrow.

James W. Bouldin elected in the place of Thomas T. Bouldin, deceased, from Virginia, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. McKintley, the house agreed to meet, henceforth, at 11 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. Patterson submitted a resolution, which was agreed to, instructing the committee on Indian affairs to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing the Wyandot Indian reservations, in the state of Ohio, and removing the Wyandot tribe of Indians west of the Mississippi.

Mr. Polk asked and obtained leave from the committee of ways and means to be discharged from the consideration of the petition of certain sugar refiners of Boston, praying a reduction of duties on sugar.

The house proceeded to the consideration Mr. Mardis' resolution, when

Mr. Chilton Allan, resumed and continued his remarks until the expiration of the hour.

The house took up the report of the committee of ways and means on the deposit question, &c.

Mr. Choate then rose and addressed the house in favor of the restoration; when he had concluded—

Mr. Dickerson, of New Jersey, rose and spoke at considerable length in support of the resolutions of the committee.

Mr. Hardin expressed a wish to speak on the question, and, as he was not prepared with certain documents, moved that the house adjourn.

Mr. Mercer requested him to withdraw the motion, in order to take up the bridge bill.

The motion not being withdrawn, the question was taken upon it, and was rejected 40 to 56.

The speaker stated that there was not a quorum, and directed the sergeant-at-arms to invite the members to attend.

Mr. Hardin then moved that the house do now adjourn, which was agreed to without a count, and the house adjourned.

Saturday, March 29. Mr. Adams, of Mass. asked consent to take up the resolution moved by him yesterday, calling for certain information relative to the deposit banks.

[Mr. Foster, of Georgia, objecting—Mr. Adams moved to sustain the rule, to enable him to call up his resolution. On this motion Mr. Williams demanded the yeas and nays—whereupon Mr. Foster withdrew his opposition.]

Mr. Adams then modified his resolution by adding the following clause:

"And that the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to this house, a statement of all the sums denominated in the treasury accounts unavailable funds; specifically designating the several banks, or individuals indebted to the treasury therefor; the time when each debt first became due—the time when failure of payment thereof first occurred; the security, if any, which the public have for payment thereof at any time, and the prospect of such eventual payment."

Mr. Harper, of Penn. objected to the adoption of that clause of the resolution which called for a statement of the debts due by the respective presidents, cashiers and directors of the banks referred to.

Mr. Adams should be entirely willing to acquiesce in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if such had been the measure meted out on other occasions. The ground taken by the gentleman was precisely that which he, Mr. A. had taken two years ago, on the occasion of an investigation into the affairs of the United States bank; but he had been overruled. And, aside from this, one of the resolutions reported by the committee of ways and means, proposed a similar investigation on a much more extensive plan, in relation to the bank of the United States.

That measure, which had been meted to one institution, Mr. Adams was for meting out to others. If in the one case, all the accounts of individuals, of every description, especially of persons connected with the government, members of congress, printers and editors, had, in the one case, been subjected to scrutiny, (as the affairs of the editors of the National Intelligencer had been, and subjected to numerous public comments); then there was nothing but fairness and equity in permitting the same scrutiny in relation to the CRACK BANKS, (which he considered a better name than that of pet banks.)

Mr. Wayne acquiesced with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Harper), in his objection to one of the clauses of the resolution; besides which it contained two calls which were unnecessary. The charters of the banks, and the names of their stockholders had already been reported. He contended also that the resolution called for certain information, which, while it might essentially injure individuals, could effect no public good. The secretary had no power to demand such information; and, if he had, it ought not to be exerted.

Mr. McKinley took similar ground.

Mr. Speight was willing to allow the largest latitude of inquiry. He was particularly surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Wayne), who had said, if he understood him, that the house had no right to inquire into the affairs of the banks selected to receive the deposits.

Messrs. Wilde and Mann addressed the house, the latter gentleman concluding his remarks with a request that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withdraw his objection.

Mr. Harper expressed his willingness to do so.

Mr. Beardsley rose to address the house, but the hour allotted to resolutions having expired,

Mr. Polk moved that the rules of the house be suspended for the purpose of taking up the general appropriation bill, which motion was negatived.

The house then took up several bills of a private or local character, which being severally disposed of, the house adjourned.

Monday, March 31. The house took up the motion of Mr. Plummer, of Mississippi, for referring the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Natchez in that state, in favor of the restoration of the deposits, to the committee of ways and means; when

Mr. Plummer addressed the house adversely to the views of the meeting, and being replied to by his colleague Mr. Cage, withdrew his motion, and the proceedings were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Memorials, petitions, &c. favorable to the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented, as follows—by Mr. Kananagh, from Bath, Maine; by Mr. Evans, from 450 citizens of Somersworth, constituting a majority of the voters; by Mr. Briggs, from 370 citizens of Adams, Berkshire county, Mass.; by Mr. Baylies, from 2,429 inhabitants of Bristol co. Mass. (4 towns in the same county had already memorialized congress); by Mr. Choate, from 900 inhabitants of Lynn, Mass.; by Mr. Burges, from 450 out of 700 votes of the town of Paterson, New Jersey; by the same from the villages of Smithfield and Cumberland, R. Island; [Mr. Pearce presented a letter from certain citizens of R. Island in reference to the above memorial, which led to a succession of speeches, replies and rejoinders between these gentlemen, of quite a personal character; in the course of which Mr. Burges pronounced the paper presented by his colleague to be a forgery;] by Mr. Burges, from inhabitants of Newport, R. Island.

Mr. Osgood presented certain resolutions, passed at Faneuil Hall, Boston, in support of the removal of the deposits.

The house then adjourned.

Tuesday, April 1. A communication was received from the secretary of state, on the subject of the prevention of the counterfeiting of foreign coin.

After attending to several matters of a private character, the house proceeded to the consideration of the bill providing for the settlement of certain revolutionary claims; when

Mr. Marshall resumed his speech commenced several weeks ago, and spoke until the expiration of the hour.

The consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means on the removal of the deposits was then resumed, when

Mr. Harden, of Ky. spoke in opposition to the removal until a late hour. In the course of his speech there were motions for adjournment successively made by Messrs. McComas, Chilton and Clarke. On the motion being made by the latter gentleman, the house agreed to adjourn by a vote of 82 to 80, and so the house adjourned.

Wednesday, April 2. As soon as the sitting of to-day was opened—

Mr. McDuffie rose, and in a feeling and proper manner, announced to the house the decease of the hon. James Blair, of South Carolina, one of his colleagues, a member of this house, and moved the customary resolutions of respect to the memory of deceased members, and also that a message be sent to the senate, informing them of his death and the time of his funeral; which being unanimously concurred in, the house adjourned.

Thursday, April 3. Mr. Elisha Whittlesey reported a bill to provide for the payment of claims for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, during the late war with Great Britain, and the Indian wars subsequent thereto; which was twice read and made the special order of the day for the 11th instant.

Mr. Edward Everett reported a bill making compensation for certain diplomatic services and for other purposes; which was twice read and committed.

The resolution of Mr. Mardis on the subject of the deposits, was then taken up; when

Mr. Chilton Allan resumed and concluded his remarks, in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. White, of Lou. moved that there be a partial suspension of the rule of the house, so as to allow the states to be called for memorials between the close of the morning business and the hour fixed for the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, and to invert the usual order of calling the states, so as to begin at the extreme south, instead of the extreme north. The motion, after an objection by Mr. Parker, of New Jersey, was lost.

Mr. Marshall resumed and concluded his speech on the communication bill; and the hour having expired,

The report of the committee of ways and means on the deposits was taken up.

Mr. Harden resumed the floor and concluded his speech in opposition to it.

Mr. McDuffie next rose and addressed the house on the same side for about half an hour, when, on the motion of Mr. Arctley, the house adjourned.

DR. MACNEVEN'S LETTER.

New York, 29th March, 1834.

Dr. Wm. J. Macneven,

Sir—Having seen contradictory statements in two of the daily papers in relation to your political opinions as to the present course of the executive of our country, the vigilance committee of the independent republicans of the fourteenth ward, have deputed the undersigned most respectfully to request, that you will be pleased to make known to us, your sentiments on the leading political question, which at present, so deeply agitates the nation; and it is particularly desirable, that if consistent with your views, you should frankly give your opinion as to the removal of the deposits, and whether you are or are not in favor of a national bank.

It is also desirable to know if the nomination made at the Broadway house, of William C. Wales for alderman, and Lambert Stuydam for assistant, to represent this ward in common council, for the ensuing year, and of Gulian C. Verplanck, as a candidate for mayor, meets your approbation.

The importance of affairs, at this crisis, must plead for the liberty we take upon the present occasion. Very respectfully,

MOSE WANZER,
J. K. HAMILTON,
P. W. ENOS,

AUSTIN BALDWIN,
CHESTER CLARK.

New York, 31st March, 1834.

Chester Clark, Austin Baldwin, P. W. Engs, James K. Hamilton, Moses Wanzler—

GENTLEMEN—The statements in the papers to which you refer, were certainly unauthorised by me, and appeared to my surprise. They must have been derived from casual conversations and promulgated by party spirit, which too often infringes upon delicacy in its zeal. Rather than take a different side from old associates, who still profess to find those measures right which I deem wrong, I wished to hold myself aloof, and where I could not approve to refrain, if possible, from opposing. But called upon now officially by so respectable a body of my neighbors and fellow citizens to declare my sentiments unequivocally, I cannot be deemed forward in stating them, since compliance is a duty.

I supported general Jackson's election, and I continue to feel the highest sense of gratitude for his eminent services in the field. Though perhaps disappointed in some of the expectations I had formed of the benefits to be derived from his administration, still preferring him far before those who were brought as candidates against him, I have sustained him as long as I could do so conscientiously. In relation to the great question which agitates and engrosses congress and the people, after having examined his course with every disposition to find it justifiable, I cannot possibly approve it.

The fiscal reasons which have been assigned for the removal of the public deposits are so futile, that they hardly deserve an answer. To say in the same breath that the necessary demands of government will reduce them in one year to little or nothing, and yet that they must be removed at once, lest they should be so greatly accumulated by the time the charter will expire, as to compel congress to renew the charter, is really too absurd to be deemed serious. When I am told that the public moneys were not safe in the United States bank, and looking at the public documents, I find that just before the removal, they amounted in the whole to less than ten millions, while the bank had eleven millions in specie; but now that they amount in this city alone to five millions, while the banks in which they are placed have only eight hundred thousand dollars in specie, I cannot see what has been gained in point of safety.

The true and indeed avowed motive was a political one. The object was to cripple, nay to crush an institution deemed dangerous, and which is said to have set itself in opposition to the will of the people, and to have improperly interfered in the election of our chief magistrate. But the folly of the attempt of the bank, if it really was made, has been fully demonstrated by the result of the elections. We are not, thank God, governed by wealth, but by numbers. The bank was proved to have no political power. Out of the city of Philadelphia, it was every where a dead weight on every candidate who attempted to support it. It lay prostrate as a political body, and there was no necessity, on that score, for further attack. If, indeed, the president, by removing the deposits, could at once have strangled that which he thinks a monster, there might have been some sense in doing the act; but since he could not effect that, far better would it be to leave the bank undisturbed to die its natural death. The fact cannot now be denied that more efficient means could not have been devised to cause a reaction, and give a chance of a recharter to the bank, than those which were employed for annoying it and exercising a useless revenge. It is thus that uncontrolled passions ever blind the understanding.

Since there was no sufficient motive, fiscal or political, for the act, it was unwise and unstatesmanlike. It required no great sagacity to foresee that it must cause a derangement in the commercial operations and credit of the country; and where no good could ensue, it could only be under the dictates of passion that any executive officer would run the risk of subjecting the country to the evils that attend any such derangement. After those evils had actually occurred, and could no longer be denied, a magnanimous mind would have retracted, instead of persevering in the error.

Yet it is not simply because an unwise and unfortunate measure has been adopted and is obstinately maintained, that I feel myself called upon to express my dissent. Though an humble individual, I may be permitted to say, that I am actuated by much higher motives. I have looked at the law which is said to warrant the deed, and I see that by it the public moneys were ordered to be kept in a certain place, unless the secretary of the treasury thought it necessary to remove them, in which case he was bound to lay before congress his reasons for so doing. To the president no power is delegated on the subject. He may, indeed, remove the secretary if he thinks him dishonest or incapable; but this does not imply the power to remove the officer for the express purpose of having the act of which that officer is by law the only judge, done according to the will of the president. That would be uniting in one person the powers of both the president and the secretary of the treasury. Had this been the intention of the law, the power of removing the deposits would have been given to the president alone. Had it been intended that the president should have any control whatever in the case, it would have been provided that the secretary might remove the public moneys with the approbation of the president. Instead of this, not to him but to congress alone is the secretary made responsible by law for the act. It would be pure mockery to suppose, that the obligation to assign his reasons to congress is a matter of form, and means nothing. Either the legal provision is an insult to our understanding, or it renders the act invalid, unless approved by congress. The conduct of the president in this is greatly aggravated by the circumstances by which it was accompanied. It was done after congress had passed judgment on the acts ascribed to the bank, and declared it to be a safe depository of the public moneys. It was done without waiting for the opinion and action of the new congress, in the recess of the senate, by an officer not confirmed by that body, and selected for one express purpose.

I cannot sustain such a measure. It is a palpable infringement of the laws. It is equally contrary to the spirit of our constitution, to the principles of genuine liberty, and of republican institutions. The executive magistrate is necessarily vested with great powers, and liable to imposition. He has the exclusive direction of all negotiations with foreign nations, and the exclusive right of nomination to all offices. No treaty can be made, no officer be appointed, without his previous approbation. He exercises the power of removing by his sole authority every officer, the judges only excepted. He is commander-in-chief of all the armed forces of the nation, by sea or by land. He executes, and at times interprets, the laws and treaties. He has a qualified negative on all laws, and exercises it freely.

Against the dangerous abuse of those powers centered in one man, we have, heretofore, been protected by the constitutional check of the senate, which has now been evaded; by salutary legal barriers, which have been overleaped; by that admirable temper and moderation which had characterised our former presidents, and on which my reliance is now greatly lessened.

This is the only quarter from which encroachments that might gradually undermine our liberties and subvert the principles of republican government, can be apprehended. And let it not be forgotten that the danger is never greater than when that high functionary happens to enjoy an excessive degree of popularity; capable of inducing the people to sustain all his pretensions; and that the attempt to establish a fatal precedent is never more likely to succeed, than when the object of the attack happens to be an unpopular institution; when those circumstances are combined, public attention is but too easily diverted from the true state of the momentous question at issue. Should the attempt now made be sanctioned by the people, the purse and the sword would be placed in the same hands, and the first visible effect will be a corrupt influence introduced into our government. Six months have not elapsed since the executive transfer of the public moneys was made, and what is already the result in this city alone?

The three respectable banks selected for the purpose have a capital of six millions of dollars. Their discounts before they had the public deposits, amounted to 9,200,000 dollars, and they made with one another, an annual dividend of six and a half per cent. But with the aid of the public moneys they are now able to discount near 13,800,000 dollars, or four millions six hundred thousand dollars more than formerly, giving an additional profit of four and a half per cent. a year on their capital. Thus we have forty bank directors endowed with the power of distributing four millions and a half in loans, beyond the natural resources of their banks; and two thousand stockholders whose income is at once raised from 63 to 11 per cent. This might not give much influence to the grantor if the boon was irrevocable. But on what tenure is it held? It depends on the sole will of the secretary, who has reserved the power to annul the contract whenever he pleases, and who for any such change is no longer bound to assign reasons. Or I should rather say, it depends on the all controlling will of the president, since the secretary of the treasury has ceased to be the officer of the law, and is a mere puppet moved by the chief magistrate, who remains himself legally irresponsible for acts, which, according to law, must be performed by the said secretary. If this uncontrolled and irresponsible power to grant, aid, at will, to shift favors to that extent, is not an improper, and, prospectively at least, a corrupt and most dangerous species of influence, I am at a loss to know how a worse kind can be devised.

The democratic party was founded on the purest principles; and, whilst adhering to, and bound by these, it had a right to require personal sacrifices from its friends—namely, that they should yield their opinions to those of the majority, on unimportant points, not affecting those principles; or in the selection of candidates of equal qualifications. But where the principle itself is called in question, I must preserve my independence of opinion, and, with regret, yet without hesitation, dissent from those who, under color of adherence to the usages of party, may require a sacrifice of all that is dear to us, and thereby subvert the fundamental principle of our institutions. This, as I understand it, is, that the majority, not of any party, but of the people, must govern. I cannot subscribe to the test now imposed, of approving in the mass at all events, and whatever they may do, of our national and state administrations, or of sanctioning even the most dangerous measures, because they have originated with our chief magistrate. Loyalty to his king is, indeed, the pretended virtue of the subject of a monarchy. To live under a government of laws, and not of men, is the boast of the citizens of our republic.

To you, my friends and fellow citizens, who know me, I need not say that I am not one of the rich, that I derive my means of existence from the moderate profits of my professional industry, that I am, and cannot cease to be, a democrat; that I have lived a friend of liberty, and have once suffered for that cause. For my zeal in its defence I became a proscribed exile from my native land. Here, in this asylum of the oppressed, I have now lived almost twenty-nine years. I have, you well know, no other country. I am identified with its interests, its prosperity, its glorious institutions. These I cannot desert. On their preservation depends our happiness and that of our posterity. They are the boast, the model, and the hope of the friends of liberty throughout the civilized world. I admire my fellow citizens not to blast those hopes and the high destinies to which this nation is called; to preserve those institutions inviolate; to defend and protect them against every attack, and every attempted infringement from whatever source, or from whomsoever they may come; to bring back the administration of our government to its native purity, and to leave to their children entire, unslacked and unblemished, the sacred inheritance, such as they received it from their fathers.

To sum up in a few words, gentlemen, my answers to your questions: I disapprove of the removal of the deposits, and am in favor of their restoration forthwith.

I am opposed to the continuation of the present bank of the United States, but am in favor of a national bank that shall possess the advantages of this, and distribute them as equally as may be for the public accommodation, without prejudice to liberty.

I am opposed to constructive versions of the constitution, whereby the executive shall take powers by implication or evasion, instead of applying to congress for authority.

[We follow a paragraph which relates to the local election in New York, which is omitted for the reason that we do not interfere with such things. It may be mentioned, however, that the doctor says he will support Mr. Verplanck, for mayor, and the candidates of the independent democrats for aldermen.]

In compliance, gentlemen, with your request, I have candidly opened to you my sentiments, and I respectfully submit them to your judgment.

WILLIAM JAMES MACNEVEN.

GREAT MEETING AT PHILADELPHIA.

On Thursday, the 20th March, agreeably to notice, the democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, with "all others who are resolved to defend the constitution and laws against executive usurpation," assembled in Independent square, at four o'clock.

Before three o'clock, the processions of different kinds began to enter the square, as nearly as we could ascertain, in the following order:—

The citizens of Manayunk, with a handsome flag—they formed a very long cavalcade, composed evidently of the bone and sinew of the country. They were preceded by a golden eagle dressed in black crape as an emblem of mourning.

The citizens of Southwark, a large and highly respectable body.

The citizens of Moyamensing, to the number of several hundred, preceded by a flag with the inscription of "Washington our guide and monitor."

The Moyamensing weavers, preceded by a loom out of gear, and mounted on a cart, on which was legibly written "no work." On the banner, "American industry the road to independence."

The merchants and traders of the city and county. The number of this very respectable body in the procession exceeded five hundred, and certainly a more respectable body never made their appearance in our streets. Among them were recognized many who had but lately been the president's warmest supporters; but who, on the present momentous occasion, were proud to show themselves in the ranks of the free. Their motto was appropriately inscribed on a flag, "supporting the constitution and laws." All the shipping in the port had their flags at half mast—so that the occasion may be said to have been sanctioned by the entire body of our merchants.

The tailors and clothiers, preceded by a modest flag—but this was attended by a large class of men who are never missing when the country is in danger.

The cabinet makers and furnishers, with a flag containing the motto, "the constitution inviolate—the laws triumphant."

The booksellers and bookbinders, with two banners; the first, which was an elegant one of blue silk, had the sentence, "we bind and preserve the literature of the present age for the benefit of the future;" the second bore the inscription, "our country and the constitution."

The printers, with a banner inscribed "our country and its constitution—truth is great and must prevail." It is declared on good authority that it has been ascertained that seven-eighths of the two latter professions are opposed to the removal of the deposits.

The coal dealers, and others interested in the trade of the Schuylkill, a respectable and numerous body, who were preceded by a banner with a view of a canal lock, and coal cars drawn on a rail road. Passing through the canal was the fine boat "Constitution." This body also had a banner inscribed "united we stand, divided we fall." A very great number of dealers, hatters and others were in attendance.

The painters and glaziers, with a banner, the inscription of which was forcible and striking—"GO TELL HIM!!! FREEMEN WILL NOT BOW NOR WEAR THE COLLAR!!!"

The hatters, displaying an appropriate banner, surmounted by a cocked hat, inscribed all round "seventy-six."

The builders, to the number of several hundreds.

The cordwainers, with a plain white banner, inscribed with the name, &c. of their profession.

The marble masons, with a bright flag bearing the motto "we defend the constitution from present and future violence."

The gold and silver artists, with a flag bearing the head of Washington.

The ship builders, stevedores, sailors, &c. flag inscribed, "don't give up the ship," "labor is wealth."

Farmers and millers, in great numbers, carrying a flag with the inscription "our country and the constitution."

People of Germantown. This most truly respectable and numerous body was loudly cheered on all hands on entering the square. The best feeling seemed to prevail towards them, and they walked in excellent order; their countenances spoke as plainly as words could have done—"We are determined to resist oppression." On their flag "the constitution and laws."

The sugar refiners, whose banner said—"support the constitution and laws."

The tobaccoists, with a suitable banner, representing Washington receiving the calumet of peace from an Indian, and the motto, "flourish the plant."

The next that entered, was a very long procession of citizens from the townships of Blockley and Kingsessing, headed by a banner inscribed "we do not despair of the republic."

These were followed by the young men of the city and county, a truly interesting procession, which was hailed by all as it passed in, with loud acclamations. There were at least 4,000 of them.

But perhaps the most interesting incident of the day was the circumstance which occurred, on those young men passing by the house of the firm and independent secretary of the treasury, William J. Duane. His person was discovered at the window of his house, overlooking Independence square, and no sooner was he seen than a loud and universal shout rose from the enthusiastic multitude, exclaiming most forcibly their approbation of his course. Mr. Duane bowed repeatedly to the crowd, and we saw his handkerchief more than once wiping a courting tear from his cheeks, at this demonstration of their affection for a man displaying independence in the cause of the constitution, which they were now assembling to avow their intention to vindicate, and keep "unsullied from a spot."

Mrs. Duane was so much affected by this sudden and unexpected demonstration of public respect, that after one full and hearty cheer, she was compelled by her emotions to leave the window.

The young men also displayed a flag inscribed, "Our country, not party—principles, not men."

The iron workers, with a picture representing an anvil and a sledge-hammer.

The black and white smiths, iron masters, hardware merchants, tin plate workers, copper smiths, &c. with a plain white banner; motto, "our country and constitution."

The coopers made a considerable turn out, but as far as we could see bore no banner.

The citizens of Kensington district.

The citizens of the Northern Liberties and Spring Garden.

The tanners and curriers and leather dealers.

The Citizens of Lower Dublin and Byberry.

We have given only a part of the movements—the crowd in the state house yard was so dense that it was impossible to note the entrance of all the different processions.

A capacious rostrum was erected against the south front of the state house, facing the Independence square. On this, the officers of the meeting, the orators and the committee of arrangements were placed.

A few minutes before 4 o'clock, the hon. John Sergeant entered the rostrum; his presence was hailed by the multitude with enthusiastic shouts.

N. Foster, esq. called the meeting to order, and nominated—
President—DANIEL GROVES.

Vice presidents—William Wagner, Northern Liberties; Alexander Cook, city; Benj. Naglee, Northern Liberties; gen. A. M. Provost, city; John Britton, Blockley; John Green, Germantown; gen. John D. Goodwin, Northern Liberties; Alexander Quintin, Roxborough; Henry H. Miller, Spring Garden; John Boileau, Lower Dublin; Charles Peurose, Southwark; Arundis Tiers, Kensington; John Leutz, Passyunk; Jacob M. Thomas, Moyamensing; Peter Castor, Oxford; John M. Ogden, Spring Garden; Dr. George De Benneville, Germantown.

To which are added the chief marshals of the various trades and processions.

Secretaries—Charles J. Jack, city; William M. Kennedy, Northern Liberties; Thomas Ronch, unincorporated Northern Liberties; D. Henry Flickwir, Southwark; Franklin Comly, Moreland; George Myers, Spring Garden.

Peter A. Brown, esq. moved the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

We, a portion of the free people of the United States, having met together with no object but the public good, and with a fixed determination to preserve the constitution, and defend the liberties of our common country—do solemnly resolve and declare—

1. That in us, and our fellow citizens of the United States, the sovereignty of this nation abides, that from us and our fellow citizens, all lawful power must proceed, and that it is equally our duty and our right, to watch over the agents whom we have entrusted with power, and to rebuke them when guilty of negligence, misconduct or usurpation.

2. That Andrew Jackson, as president of the United States, has evinced a settled disregard for the constitution and the laws, that he has broken the national faith, trampled on the rights and interests of the people, and endeavored by the overthrow of all other departments of the government, to unite all power in his own hands.

3. That the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States, was an assumption of power not confided to him by the people, an usurpation dictated by passion and executed to gratify his vindictive feelings.

4. That to this unlawful and unnecessary act, to the course which he and his government and his banks have since pursued, and to the consequent destruction of public confidence, we attribute the unexampled distress now pervading the community, the disarrangement of the currency, the depression of commerce, manufactures and the mechanic arts, the low price of agricultural products, and the almost total suspension of our public improvements.

5. That we have neither faith in the motives, nor hope from the result of the president's experiment, to substitute a number of scattered banks for a single national institution. It has already failed of its ostensible objects; and we fear it is a means by which the whole moneyed power of the country, may be placed at the disposal of a corrupt executive.

6. That public confidence cannot be restored, nor the national honor kept sacred, without an immediate order for the restoration of the deposits to the bank of the United States.

7. That the veto power, now claimed and exercised by the president of the United States, is a gross perversion of the original design of the framers of the constitution, in conferring a veto power upon the chief magistrate of the nation.

8. That the conduct of the president and those who support him in congress, or elsewhere exhibits a determination to place his will above the opinions or interests of the people, and thus to convert our once free and happy republic into an absolute and oppressive despotism.

9. That looking to the practice of men, and not to their professions, we cannot recognise the Jackson party, a party ruled by the will of one individual whom they consider born to command, as the democracy of the country.

10. That in the independent portion of our fellow citizens who have arrayed themselves against executive usurpation, who compose a large majority of the bone and sinew of the nation, and with whom we are proud to be numbered, we recognise the true friends of the people, and therefore the only real democratic party.

11. That the present crisis demands of every citizen, who loves the constitution, and would preserve the liberties of his country, the utmost firmness and devotion in the common cause. When the highest and dearest interests of all are threatened, none can refuse his labor and his voice—where all is at stake, every thing must be periled—every thing dared to save it.

12. That as a means of concentrating the efforts of all who agree with us in opinion throughout the state, and making that opinion felt hereafter at the polls, we approve cordially of the proposed convention to be held at Harrisburg on the 22d day of May next.

13. That to the present congress we look for an exercise of independence worthy the crisis, and of the trust committed to its care. Of that congress we demand the safety of the republic.

14. That it is the right of the people to have access at all times to their servants, however high their stations—that to deny such access, savours of royalty, and does not comport with the plain manners and republican habits of a republican people.

15. That in the opinion of this meeting, the congress of the United States ought not to adjourn until they shall have provided effectually for the relief of the distresses of the country, vindicated the constitution and laws so wantonly violated, asserted the dignity and authority of the representatives of the people, and secured the constitution and the currency against the lawless tampering of the executive, so that hereafter the well defined boundaries of our republican institutions may be respected in practice, and the happiness of the nation not be made the sport of the will or passions of one man.

After an address from Samuel W. Rush, esq. col. C. J. Jack offered the following resolutions, which were adopted.

Resolved, That as members of a great confederacy, we abjure all sectional jealousies, but that as citizens of Pennsylvania, we behold in the present conduct of those who rule the executive of this country, a plan to destroy the present bank of the United States, and after the term of service of Gen. Jackson shall expire, the certainty of establishing another bank, to be located out of the state, whose stock will be divided among the members of an ascendant regency, whose management and direction will be made subservient to the ambition and intrigues of political aspirants, and whose consummation will finally complete the experiment of trying to unite the purse and the sword in one hand.

Resolved, That this meeting firmly believe that the citizens of this commonwealth have been perfectly satisfied with the paper currency, existing in Pennsylvania, since the establishment of the bank of the United States; that they have desired no change in it; and that if any change shall be made, they do most earnestly deprecate the substitution of the New York safety fund system, by which a bank is authorised to issue notes to the amount of $349,470, while it possesses in specie in its vaults no more than the sum of $6,558 dollars! to redeem all the notes issued by it and circulated in the community, as the representatives of a solvent and specie paying bank.

Resolved, That we do solemnly protest against the friends of Gen. Jackson, assuming to themselves the title of the Pennsylvania democracy, when they have avowed that they will support the opinions of one man, "whether right or wrong," and we do conscientiously believe, that if general Jackson should this day publicly announce his determination to return the deposits to the bank of the United States, that the Jackson representation of this state in congress, would instantly support the measure; that the Jackson portion of the legislature of Pennsylvania would add their hearty concurrence; and that the whole Jackson party throughout the United States, would rejoice in their release from their present dilemma; and as instantly proclaim this last act of their chief, the most disinterested and noble deed of his life.

It was resolved, that the president of this meeting have power to appoint a committee of correspondence.

The following resolutions were presented by the different trades:

By the painters of the city and county.
Resolved, That Martin Van Buren deserves, and will receive the execrations of all good men, should he shrink from the responsibility of conveying to Andrew Jackson, the message sent by the honorable Henry Clay, when the builders' memorial was presented to the senate. I charge you, said he, go to the president, and tell him—tell him if he would save his country—if he would save himself—tell him to stop short, and ponder well his course—tell him to retrace his steps, before an injured and insulted people, infuriated by his experiment upon their happiness, rises in the majesty of power, and hurls the usurper down from the seat he occupies, like Lucifer, never to rise again.

By the builders of the city and county.
Resolved, That the amount of present and prospective employment for all the branches of industry connected with the erection of buildings in the city and county of Philadelphia, has been affected to the extent of 75 per cent. compared with last year's business, by the present disastrous and ruinous measures of Andrew Jackson.

Resolved, That it is the solemn and deliberate conviction of those whose employment depends upon the erection of buildings, that the immediate restoration of the deposits, and the recharter of the United States' bank, are the only means by which confidence can be restored, lost faith recovered, and the late cheering prospect which animated and diffused its blessings throughout the whole community, regained.

Resolved, That the declarations of the representative to congress from Montgomery county, that the mechanics and laborers have hitherto been too highly favored—that their prosperity has been too great—that the bank has afforded them too many facilities—that they have been adding house to house and that it is time they were put down, merits and should receive the scorn and contempt of freemen, and indicates a mind so sordid, narrow and selfish, and so disgraceful to the feelings of humanity, and revolting to every sentiment of the heart, that we are almost constrained to ascribe them to the ravings of a maniac, rather than to the expressions of a sane and thinking mind.

Resolved, That we now earnestly call upon all our fellow citizens to aid us, e'er it is too late, in our endeavors to put down, as speedily as possible, the alarming power claimed by the present chief magistrate, and to prevent, if possible, the prostration of our interests being consummated to satisfy the unbounded ambition of a military despot.

The committee take occasion to say, the foregoing expressions ascribed to Joel K. Mann, of Montgomery county, were used by him to a part of the builders' committee, late on a visit to Washington.

By the hatlers.
Resolved, That it is degrading to freemen to wear the collar, or drag the chains of any man, whatever may have been his claims upon the veneration and gratitude of the people.

That we behold in the blind servility of the supporters of Andrew Jackson, and his unprincipled warfare upon the currency of the country, not only a surrender of the dignity and the rights of freemen, but also, a basis on which some political aspirant may erect a despotism which shall crush the last refuge and hope of freedom.

That the people assembled here, disclaiming all party considerations, pledge themselves as citizens of our common country, never to relax their efforts, until the supremacy of the constitution and laws shall be acknowledged, and the protection of the government secured, in support of a sound and uniform currency, the sinews of the enterprise, wealth and prosperity of a nation of freemen, and we earnestly entreat the independent yeomanry of the country, to elect honest men to represent them in congress; that the president may no longer be able to veto the passage of laws enacted for the promotion of the general welfare.

By the gold and silver artificers, watch makers and other branches of the trade.

Resolved, That when the time arrives for an expression of our opinions by the ballot box—that we here declare our determination, to support no individual for office who will not unite with us in tearing aside the flimsy veil which conceals the "kitchen cabinet," and expose them in all their naked deformity to the eyes of the nation, as objects fit only for the scorn and contempt of mankind.

By the cordwainers.

This day, 22 years ago, was the great earthquake at Caracas, and the meeting this afternoon will cause a great earthquake with politicians according to interest, therefore resolved, that we, the cordwainers of the city and county of Philadelphia, considering the name of democrat substituted for man worshiper, or going the whole hog, as deviating from the principles of '93, do agree, as republicans, to support principles instead of men, and shall consider this day as the beginning of the second republican era of this country.

It was resolved, That the president of this meeting have power to appoint a committee of correspondence.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the meeting approve of the delegates chosen by the city and the county to the convention to be held in Harrisburgh, on the 20th of May. They are as follows:

For the city—John Sergeant, John M. Scott, John S. Riddle, Wm. M. Meredith, Daniel Groves, Joseph R. Ingersoll, Silas W. Sexton, Bernard McCredy, Joseph Murray.

For the county—Northern Liberties—William Wagner, Jos. Smith. Spring Garden—David Woolpper. Southwark—Nathl. C. Foster, George P. Little. Moyamensing—T. M. Hubbell. Kensington—Wm. Fritler. Unincorporated Northern Liberties—Thomas Roach. Bristol township—William Wister. Oxford township—Geo. K. Budd. Moreland township—Franklin Conly.

The meeting adjourned after giving nine cheers for the constitution. DANIEL GROVES, president.

Peter A. Browne, esq. delivered an impressive speech on presenting the resolutions.

Samuel Rush, esq. succeeded Mr. Browne, and in an impassioned address of great pith, kept the people in a constant good humor; C. J. Jack, esq. followed. The resolutions were passed with the utmost unanimity, and the immense multitude began to disperse peacefully to their homes before five o'clock.

On leaving the yard, the several processions piloted their banners fancifully before Mr. Duane's door, and commenced giving him loudly vociferated cheers at the rate of "three times three." This brought Mr. D. to the door, and he addressed them for a few moments, evidently deeply affected by their enthusiasm. The applause which followed we will not attempt to describe; it has made an impression on all who heard it which death alone can obliterate, and which should encourage statesmen to pursue the honest dictates of their hearts.

Much credit is due to all parties engaged—the marshals of the day, who appointed places for the trades, &c. were so active and intelligent as to prevent all confusion. To general Prevost, the chief Marshal, in particular, the citizens are greatly indebted.

The stores in Chesnut, Market and the adjacent streets were generally closed—and business suspended.

BANK OF MARYLAND.

A very numerous meeting of the creditors of the bank of Maryland, was held at the Exchange, at four o'clock on Friday, the 25th ult. WILLIAM PATTERSON, esq. was called to the chair, and the hon. NICHOLAS BRICE appointed secretary. After the object of the meeting had been explained, judge BRICE submitted the following resolution, which, after considerable discussion, was adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of fifteen persons be appointed from amongst the creditors, with full power and authority to devise and adopt all such measures as in their judgment shall be found necessary to protect and advance the interest of said creditors, and to bring the affairs of the said bank of Maryland to a just and speedy settlement and distribution of its assets among them; and that said committee be authorized to fill up vacancies and appoint from their own body or other creditors a sub-committee, who shall act in all matters with the like powers as are above conferred.

A motion was then made and carried that the committee should be appointed by the chairman, who subsequently appointed the following gentlemen:

Alexander Fridge,	Jacob Rogers,
Col. William Steuart,	George McCubbin,
Thomas Kelso,	R. W. Gill,
Jacob Albert,	Charles C. Harper,
William A. Tucker,	Charles Nicols,
Frederick Dawson,	Levin Gale, of Cecil,
Alexander Brown,	Jere. Nicolls, of Kent.
Jonathan Meredith,

[Messrs. McCubbin and Nicols having declined serving, Messrs. John Johnson, of Annapolis, and George W. Thomas, of Kent, were appointed in their stead.]

At this stage of the proceedings, the following communication from THOMAS ELLICOTT, esq. addressed to the chairman of the meeting, was received and read:

To the creditors of the bank of Maryland.

The recent and sudden stoppage of the bank of Maryland, with the consequences arising from that event, has imposed upon me relations with you which render it an imperative duty that I should, at the earliest period possible, give you all the information in my power concerning the funds and effects of that corporation, and of the extent of its debts and liabilities to you, as also the circumstances under which I consented to become the trustee.

The present situation of the trust property will all be prepared and laid before you as early as it shall be possible for Robert Wilson, esq. cashier, with the aid of as many clerks as he can employ in the service, to make an accurate statement of the condition of the bank, as it was at the time of its final close at three o'clock, P. M. on the 23d instant.

On the same day, and after that hour, a partial view of the amount of the debts and credits of the bank was exhibited to me, with information, that unless very important aid was extended to it in coin, at its opening on the 24th, it would be unable to sustain its credit another day. This announcement was made to me with a view of ascertaining whether it was probable the Union bank of Maryland would consent to extend the requisite support to the bank of Maryland. I stated that from the views I then had of the subject, that it would not only be highly improper for the Union bank, or for any other, or for all of the other banks in the city, to afford the aid which seemed absolutely necessary to effect the object of sustaining the bank of Maryland under the demands to which it was then liable, and which would, from every appearance, daily and hourly augment to a great extent, but that it would be highly unjust to the trading community generally to abstract the funds from the other banks, and thereby lessen the ability of such banks to supply the necessary and proper facilities to the merchants of the city in the ordinary course of their business: That under this conviction, I could not give any reason to hope that the object so much desired could be accomplished in the way suggested. The friends of the bank of Maryland then decided that the whole funds and effects of every nature and kind should remain in the absolute custody and care of the cashier of the bank, beyond the reach of any other person, until a final decision should be made as to the proper course to be pursued, to guard and protect, equally and rateably, the rights and interests of all the creditors of the bank. The whole of the property of the bank being thus placed in the hands of a gentleman who had been its principal officer for thirty or forty years, and in whose integrity every one had justly the most implicit confidence, time was taken for further deliberation by the president and directors of the bank of Maryland. This resulted in the conclusion by them in the course of the succeeding twenty four hours, that the bank could not properly be in the course for the transaction of business on the morning of the 24th,* and that it was necessary that a deed of trust should be executed, at once, of all the corporate funds and effects for the equal benefit of all the creditors, for the purpose of preventing legal impediments, and especially of guarding against attachments of its property abroad by foreign or other creditors.

In this stage of the business I was applied to, to know if I would accept the trust, if the deed were made to me, and provided it subsequently met the approbation of the chief officers of the other banks in the city. I declined giving an immediate answer, but stated that I would not accept the trust unless, in the first place, the deed were made, as had been suggested by the directors, without giving a preference to any one; secondly, unless it was so drawn that I could place the collection of the claims in the hands of R. Wilson, esq. the cashier, as well as the adjustment of the accounts in such way as that the funds and effects should never come into my hands, so as to subject them to my individual control; thirdly, that the whole power and direction as to the manner in which the trust should be executed should be directed by the hon. Stevenson Archer and the hon. Thomas Beale Dorsey, or if they should decline to act in that particular, under the direction of such person or persons as they would appoint for the purpose; and fourthly, unless, as suggested by the friends of the bank, my acceptance should meet with the consent and approbation of the principal officers of the banks in the city of Baltimore.

These conditions were complied with, and the trust is now in a course of execution under the agency of R. Wilson, cashier, and will continue so until the creditors, whose interest it is the duty of the trustee to protect, shall direct otherwise. In the meantime they may be assured that every exertion which it is possible to make, shall be made to place before them, as early as practicable, a true statement of the situation of the affairs of the bank of Maryland, in order to enable them to decide upon future proceedings; and I beg them also to be assured that it is my anxious desire that they shall select some suitable gentleman to co-operate with me in the execution of the duties of trustee as early as circumstances will permit.

I am aware that rumors have been put into circulation, but by whom or for what purpose I know not, that I have a personal interest in the affairs of the bank of Maryland, or that I am in some way implicated with the institution, or with its president, and I deem the present a proper occasion to say, at once, for the purpose of silencing a rumor so offensive, under existing circumstances, to my feelings, that I am not now, nor have I ever been since the year 1804 or 1805, interested in that bank to the value of one dollar, either as an owner of stock, or a borrower from it, and that there is not now nor ever has been any connection in trade or business between the president of that bank and myself. That I have never known any thing more of the business and transactions of that bank than I have known of that of all the other banks in Baltimore, nor even as much, with the exception of its applications to the president and directors of the Union bank of Maryland for occasional facilities, by the discount of paper within the last four months, to relieve it from temporary pressures for coin. I am, respectfully,

THOMAS ELLICOTT, trustee.

March 29th, 1834.

The meeting then adjourned.

*The 23d being Sabbath.

To the creditors of the bank of Maryland.

The committee appointed pursuant to a resolution adopted at a meeting of the creditors of the bank of Maryland, held at the Exchange on Friday last, the 28th ult. beg leave to report:

That the president and directors of the bank of Maryland having determined to suspend the operations of that institution, executed on the 23d of March an assignment of all the corporate property in trust for the equal benefit of the creditors; which having for its object the protection of the effects of the bank abroad from attachments, was, in the opinion of the committee, a proper and judicious measure. Looking, however, among other considerations, to the magnitude of the trust created by that assignment, the committee deemed it proper that two persons should be associated as co-trustees with Mr. Thomas Ellicott; and after due deliberation with regard to the mode of their appointment, passed the following resolution:—

Resolved, That this meeting proceed to the appointment of a trustee to be associated with Thomas Ellicott in the affairs of the bank of Maryland, and that Stevenson Archer and Thomas B. Dorsey be requested to select another trustee to act with said Ellicott and the trustee of this committee; and in case the said Archer and Dorsey differ in the selection of a trustee, that they have power to call in a third person to decide between them."

In pursuance of this resolution, Messrs. John B. Morris and Richard W. Gill have been appointed co-trustees with Mr. Thomas Ellicott, and having signified their acceptance, will enter upon the performance of their duties as soon as practicable.

This committee beg leave further to report, that previous to the appointment of these two gentlemen, the following resolutions were passed, and have been communicated to the trustees:—

Resolved, That the compensation to which said trustees shall be entitled shall be fixed from time to time as the trust progresses, by the judges of Baltimore county court, or any two of them.

Resolved, That said trustees be authorised and required to deposit the moneys of the bank of Maryland, as they shall be received, and such as are now on hand, with and amongst such of the creditor chartered banks of the city, in proportion to their respective claims, as shall agree to pay such interest on all sums so deposited, as the trustees shall think proper.

Resolved, That Robert Wilson, esq. cashier of the bank of Maryland, be recommended to the trustees as a suitable assistant to them in adjusting the affairs of the institution."

The committee, in conclusion, beg leave further to state to the creditors, that from the progress which they understand has already been made, there is a reasonable prospect that the affairs of the bank of Maryland will be brought to a speedy settlement. The trustees will, no doubt, prepare as soon as possible a statement of the actual condition of the bank, to be laid before the creditors for their information.

By order of the committee.

ALEX. BROWN, chairman.

CHARLES C. HARPER, secretary.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Fellow citizens of the senate, and of the assembly:

Since my communication to the legislature at the commencement of the present session, the unusual derangement of the business operations of the community has been such, as in my judgment to render it the duty of the executive to call your attention to the subject.

It was not then perceived that the order of the treasury department, directing the accruing receipts of the public moneys to be deposited in the local banks instead of the bank of the U. States, could essentially interrupt the business transactions of the community; nor is it now supposed that any necessary connexion exists between that act, and the present state of commercial embarrassment.

Although it was known that the bank of the United States had commenced a rapid curtailment of its debt anterior to the action of the government upon the deposits, and had actually reduced it more than four millions of dollars during the sixty days previous to the first of October, when the order of the secretary took effect; yet as the government had directed the change to be made in a manner best calculated to avoid any pressure upon the bank or injury to the community, it was not reasonable to suppose that the occasion would have been seized for the purpose of giving an unnecessary shock to business, much less of exciting a causeless panic. Certain it is, however, that since the change referred to, such has been the attitude assumed by that institution in regard to the local banks, that the latter are unable to afford to the community those assurances of future accommodations, which are so essentially necessary to inspire confidence among business men in entering into new engagements.

The partisans of that institution, and certain presses devoted to its recharter, by systematic and persevering efforts in disseminating distrust of the credit of our moneyed institutions; particularly those of this state, of the credit of individuals, of the resources of the country, and its ability to meet the crisis; and by endeavoring to fasten on public opinion upon this net of the government as the cause of all the depression which has been experienced, as well as that which is daily predicted and held up to the public view in a distorted and exaggerated form; have also produced an excitement among the business community, calculated essentially to aggravate the pressure, and prolong its existence.

Looking at the immense wealth and resources of the country—presenting externally, as indicated by the course of exchange, an appearance of prosperity unknown for many years, and internally, until within a short period, the same favorable appearance, as indicated by abundant crops, fair prices, active mercantile and manufacturing operations; it appears to be impossible that the existing state of things should have sprung from a cause so inadequate as the mere substitution of one place for another as the depository of the accruing receipts by the government.

Although the removal of the deposits, effected as it was prospectively, and operating upon the funds in hand, not by withdrawing the whole suddenly, but gradually, as the wants of the government required, furnished of itself no sufficient cause for the results which in point of time have followed it; yet it is said that its operation has been to derange the currency, to destroy confidence, and thus to produce the present embarrassment.

It is undoubtedly true that much of the pressure upon the money market has been occasioned by the destruction of confidence, but it is not easy to perceive how that is to be charged as the necessary consequence of the action of the government. It is the consequence of the attitude assumed by the bank of the United States towards other banks—an attitude not necessary, although its advocates attempt to justify it, either as a measure of retaliation upon the government, or for the purpose of compelling those institutions to surrender or to refuse to accept the public deposits.

Nor is it easy to perceive how the action of the government should of necessity derange the currency or the commercial operations of the country, through the medium of domestic exchanges. The ability of the bank to conduct all ordinary business, has not been essentially impaired, and its amount of discounted bills of exchange is at this moment as large or about as large as it ever has been. Whatever inconveniences may have resulted from its refusal hitherto to furnish draughts at sight between its different offices at the usual rates, (and these inconveniences undoubtedly have been great), would seem, therefore, to be of its own creation, or the result of that position in regard to the other banks which it has chosen to assume.

It is believed that the principal causes of the present embarrassment have no essential connexion with the removal of the deposits.

In December, 1830, the bank of the United States commenced a rapid increase of its loans and circulation, and continued augmenting them until May, 1832, having within that period added about twenty-eight millions of dollars to its accommodations to the public, and over four millions to its notes in circulation. The necessary consequence of such a large and sudden increase of facilities to business men, was to encourage a corresponding liberality on the part of the local banks, over action in trade, and to stimulate to excess the industry and enterprise of the country. At all events, since that period, foreign commercial operations, domestic trade and manufactures, speculation in stocks, lands and produce, have been carried on to an extent and upon a scale before entirely unknown.

The policy of contraction on the part of the bank, which immediately followed this unexampled expansion, had scarcely been commenced when the tariff law of July, 1832, went into effect, the operation of which, with its subsequent modification, was well calculated to develop the injurious consequences of the overtrading which had preceded.

Under the former law, duties to the amount of about fifteen millions annually, accrued upon imports at the port of N. York, the payment of which was secured by bonds payable at different periods, some as long as eighteen months. As the merchandise was generally sold by the importer, soon after the execution of his bond for the duties, it is obvious that the credit afforded by the government, was to him equivalent to so much capital until the time of payment should arrive. Before this time a fresh importation enabled him to create a new credit, and thus a very large amount of capital was constantly in use among those engaged in commercial pursuits.

The law of July, 1832, considerably reduced the amount of duties, while that of 1833, operated still further to diminish the capital of the importer thus derived from government credits, by admitting many new articles to the free list, by shortening the bonds in some cases, and by substituting cash payments on many articles subject to duty.

This law took effect on the fourth of March, 1833, and during the past year the bonds of the preceding have been falling due, while the shortened bonds and cash duties have created an additional demand for money, thus casting upon the importer the burthen of repaying the capital formerly loaned to him by the government, and also of paying the cash duties required upon his recent importations. It has been estimated that the effect of this law has been equivalent to the withdrawal from commercial investments of from twelve to thirteen millions of capital.

The depressed rate of foreign exchange also, although an indication favorable to the general condition of the country, has it is understood, prevented the drawing of considerable sums of money from Europe, the proceeds of produce as well as of stocks sold abroad.

These causes, together with the rapid curtailment of its debt by the United States bank, between the 1st days of August and December, amounting to nearly ten millions of dollars, and all operating upon a state of trade unusually and extravagantly extended, are supposed to be sufficient to account for most of the distress hitherto experienced.

The severity of the pressure in New York, has undoubtedly been very much mitigated, by placing the public deposits in the local banks, which have thereby been enabled to discount, and have actually discounted upwards of four millions more than they otherwise could have done.

And as the charter was soon to expire, and the bank had actually commenced its curtailments some time previous to the action of the government, that action would seem to have been indispensably necessary for the protection of the public, so far as the funds of the government would afford the means. This measure, however, which as we have seen, involved no necessary destruction of individual confidence or credit, no necessary derangement of ordinary commercial operations, much less any necessity for the panic which has followed, has furnished to the bank the pretext for placing itself in a new and menacing attitude, and to its partisans the occasion of wantonly sporting with the fears of the timid, the standing of the weak, the stability of the currency, and the credit of our moneyed institutions.

This corporation, brought into existence for the purpose of subserving the general good, (if for any justifiable purpose), seems to be bending the whole of its prodigious energies towards compelling the people, by force of pecuniary suffering, to acknowledge the necessity of its recharter.

Our constituents have distinctly expressed their unbiassed judgment upon the question of recharter; and I cannot doubt that they possess sufficient patriotism to meet any crisis, which the controversy may produce, and that in the maintenance of principles of vital importance to themselves and to posterity, they will be ready to endure any pecuniary privation, rather than submit to the dictation of a great moneyed power.

From recent debates in the national legislature; from the tone of the presses which advocate the cause of the bank; from the language of public meetings; from the organizations of party; and from other indications too plain to be mistaken, the efforts on the part of the bank seem to be directed especially against the moneyed institutions and the business relations of the state of New York. Under such circumstances, I deem it the imperative duty of the state, to put forth its energies to aid these institutions in the struggle, and to protect its citizens from oppression. Connected as these institutions are, with the industry and prosperity of the state, all classes of our constituents, whether agricultural, mercantile or manufacturing are equally interested in their welfare.

I am furnished by the bank commissioners, with a statement of the condition of the banks subject to their supervision on the fourth of March Instant, by which it appears that their circulation had been diminished since the first day of January last, more than three millions of dollars; and that the country institutions, or those located out of the cities of New York and Albany, while they had reduced their loans and discounts only about $600,000, had reduced their circulation about two millions of dollars. The entire resources of the country banks on the 4th of March, excluding the bank fund, amounted to $21,984,000, and their entire liabilities to $12,462,000. Notwithstanding the redemption between those dates, of about two millions of their paper, the reduction of the specie was less than $25,000; and their immediate means of redemption, consisting of specie at home and funds on deposit in Albany and New York, subject to be drawn at sight, amounted to more than thirty-five per cent. of their whole circulation.

So far, therefore, as the banks themselves are concerned, I entertain not the slightest doubt, either of their present or future ability to meet any crisis that can occur; but under a state of things which may be imagined, a proper regard for their own safety, may put it out of their power to afford those accommodations to the public, which its interests may require.

The bank of the United States has recently declared its intention to continue its curtailments, but in what ratio we know not. It probably has due to it in this state about seven millions; and what portion of this amount our citizens may be called upon to pay before the next session of the legislature, cannot now be determined. If this amount shall be called in rapidly, our banks must necessarily strengthen themselves by calling in a portion of their debt; and thus it will be in the power of the bank of the United States, if it should have the disposition, to occasion serious embarrassment to all classes of the community, unless the legislature make some suitable provision to guard against such a result.

It has been suggested to me by several intelligent and practical gentlemen from the city of New York, for whom and for whose opinion I entertain the highest respect, and who, I am sure, were governed by no motives of individual interest in the matter, that the establishment of a large banking institution in that city was called for at the present time. A capital of eight or ten millions was mentioned; and it was proposed that the state should take one half, and pay for it by a state stock, bearing an interest of four or five per cent. redeemable at the expiration of the charter; the balance of stock to be distributed by commissioners to be appointed by the governor and senate, or in such other manner as should be thought best; the state to appoint its share of directors; the rate of discount to be fixed at six per cent. and if deemed proper, the surplus profits over six or seven per cent. per annum to be paid into the state treasury; the institution to issue no notes under twenty dollars, and in other respects to be made subject to the general laws of the state, reserving to the legislature the usual right to modify or repeal the charter.

It was urged that the stock issued by the state might readily be disposed of in Europe for specie, and that such a charter would furnish a sufficient inducement to insure the necessary subscriptions for the residue of the capital; that such an institution would be able to take the debt now due to the United States' bank in this state, whenever it should be called in; to furnish the requisite facilities to the commercial interests of the city of New York in the discount and collection of domestic exchange; to acquire a character in Europe which would enable it to sustain mercantile credit in times of revulsion in trade; and, in short, to exercise a healthful influence over all the diversified interests of that great city, and consequently over every branch of industry throughout the state.

Although many of the advantages anticipated from an institution of such a character, might and probably would be realized, there are, nevertheless, objections to this proposition, of serious if not preponderating weight. It is deemed by many to be objectionable in principle for any government to engage in the ordinary pursuits of individual enterprise. Such an institution, possessing ample powers over the currency of the state, which, properly directed, might be productive of salutary effects, might also, by a misdirection of its efforts, be equally capable of producing serious and extensive injury. It might in its administration be subject to the fluctuations of political power, and thereby be in danger of becoming an engine wielded to subvert the interests of a party. It might, by the acquisition of political influence, paralyze the controlling power reserved to the legislature; it might, for the purpose of acquiring this influence, openly take the field of party politics, and exhibit the disgusting spectacle, with which we are already too familiar, of a large moneyed corporation arrayed in political opposition to the government of the country.

Unless, therefore, such an institution, or one of a somewhat similar character, should be found indispensably necessary to enable us to counteract a greater evil, I should be unwilling to hazard so dangerous an experiment.

It has occurred to me, that a remedy, as well for the existing evil, as for the inconvenience which may in any event result from the withdrawal of the capital now employed by the bank in this state, may be provided, by the issue of a state stock, if necessary, to the amount of four or five millions of dollars, and by increasing the ability of the banks in the city of New York with loans of this stock, in such manner as would be perfectly safe to the state, and at the same time enable them to extend their accommodations so as to supply the amount of capital to be withdrawn by the branch in that city. It is due to the city banks to say, that this suggestion does not proceed from them; they have thus far sustained themselves with creditable ability, and feel a perfect confidence in their resources to do so under any emergency that may happen; but the suggestion is intended for the relief of the whole community, by sustaining the markets for our agricultural and manufactured productions, and giving activity and vigor to commercial enterprise.

Should this measure be adopted, the necessity will at once be perceived of imposing upon certain persons to be designated by the legislature, the power and responsibility of carrying it into effect. Ample provision should be made to secure the regular payment of interest, and the ultimate redemption of the stock by the banks to which the loans may be made, so that the state will neither be subject to inconvenience, nor incur any responsibility beyond the loan of its credit to stable and well conducted institutions. It may also be necessary to provide, that during the continuance of the loans to the banks, they shall possess the power of discounting upon them as upon so much additional capital, without allowing them to extend their circulation beyond the limits now prescribed by law. The banks in New York, from their position, must necessarily meet and sustain the first shock of any pressure upon the money market, and by strengthening them, therefore, we aid every branch of industry throughout the state. A depression in the city necessarily affects prices in the country, and operates to the injury of the agricultural, as well as the manufacturing and mercantile interests of the whole state. Should it be deemed advisable, a portion of this stock might be disposed of, and the avails loaned in the different counties of the state through the agency of the county loan officers, as has heretofore been done on several occasions, to the great relief of the community.

It is not doubted that the state, by the loan of its credit in some such manner, may, without incurring any loss or inconvenience, do much to sustain the great interests of the people, if the necessity for it should arise; and I cannot entertain the slightest doubt that the measure would meet with their cordial approbation.

Being perfectly satisfied, that the energies and resources of this state, will enable it to bear up against any temporary depression of business which can be anticipated; that in this desperate struggle by a great moneyed power to perpetuate its own existence by the force of its pressure upon the community, the patriotism of the people will be found to rise, regardless of mere pecuniary sacrifices; and that it is the duty of the state to stand forth in its strength; and by the use of its credit and the sanction of its name, to shield its Institutions and its citizens from harm; I commit the entire subject to your deliberate consideration.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

The present sheet contains important notices of the proceedings of the house of representatives, in relation to the bank of the United States. They are not, however, final; though strongly indicative of what may be expected when other questions on the same subject shall be raised.

The resolutions attached to the report of the committee of ways and means, were ingeniously prepared. The leading—and, indeed, as we esteem it, the only question that naturally offered itself for presentation, was the expression of an opinion on the sufficiency of the reasons of the secretary of the treasury for the removal of the public deposits. But this was rather evaded than decided, unless indirectly; and, mixed up with other things, the votes given are calculated to make erroneous impressions on the minds of the people.

A call for the previous question being seconded and enforced, 116 to 107, the pending amendments were cut-off, and others were not admissible. That this forcing of the question, and on the day that it was forced, had been agreed upon, seems undoubted—for the result consummated, it was freely said, in advance, would be attempted. Several of the members, however, were not in the secret—and so missed an opportunity to record their votes.

The main question, “that the public deposits ought not to be restored” was decided in the affirmative, 118 to 103—as will be seen in a subsequent page. Those concerning the recharter of the bank, and the appointment of a committee to investigate its proceedings, &c. do not settle any thing. There are several against the recharter who would vote for the bank, or a bank, with a modified charter; but the naked question was presented as to a renewal of the present charter, and, explanations not being permitted, they were compelled to vote against it.

The main question was decided on party grounds. The distinguished member from New York, Mr. Lawrence, the candidate of the party for mayor of that city, has said, as we see it published in the papers—

“The motion to return the deposits is justly considered an attack upon the president, and it is resisted on that account!”

And we have hardly yet met with an intelligent member of the party, however much opposed to the bank, from constitutional principles or otherwise, who has not admitted that the removal of the deposits was wrong; but most of them said, “the president must be supported!” We shall recur to these matters at a future day.

The question on the renewal of the charter of the old bank of the United States was made a party one by the “democrats of '98,” because of a very generally entertained belief, (whether well or ill founded it is not worth while to inquire), that it granted or refused its accommodations to individuals in proportion to their zeal for or against the “federal” party. Such was the general belief. But until the assault of the president of the United States on the present bank, who ever suspected that it meddled in politics? Did not Mr. Van Buren, vice president, even so late as 1826, with Mr. Butler, the present attorney-general of the United States, Mr. Marcy, the present governor of New York, and others of the highest class of present politicians, earnestly entreat the bank to establish a branch at Albany? Would they have asked the location of a “monster” in the midst of them? Had it ever been said that political party influenced the appointment of directors of the bank, or its offices? Was not the generally acting president of the bank, in the absence of Mr. Bidde, until lately a “Jackson man”? Are there not “Jackson men” even yet in all the offices? Indeed we are informed that, in several of them, a majority were “Jackson men,” at the time of their appointment, and perhaps, yet remain so, except on this weighty question! How was it in “democratic” Pennsylvania less than two years ago? Every body was in favor of the bank! How with gov. Wolf some months ago? The bank had not a better friend than he was! And so we might go on for an hour—but it is unnecessary. It is president Jackson who has caused the results on the bank questions to be made thro’ the force of political party. The bank, admitting all that is said to be true, has not, in our opinion, expended so much money in defending herself, as has been expended at the late election held in the city of New York, alone, by persons holding offices there, that the “spoils of victory” may be and remain with them.

The question even concerning the renewal of the charter of the bank, was not made a party one, until forced by the president's veto. The bill to renew it passed the house of representatives on the 3d July, 1832, 107 to 85, many of the most sturdy and “entire” friends of the president voting for it, having passed the senate on the 11th of the preceding month 28 to 20, Messrs. Dallas, Wilkins, &c. in the affirmative. In both houses there were large “Jackson” majorities. The veto, however, came, (the act of one man against such decided votes in both houses), on the 10th July—and then, for the first time, did the affairs of the bank begin to assume a political character, so far as the “Jackson” or “anti-Jackson parties” were concerned. And in further proof, yet, even yet, Messrs. Dallas and Wilkins voted to pass the bank bill, the veto of the president notwithstanding, though as thorough-party men as any in congress, in pursuance of the almost unanimous instructions of both branches of the “democratic” legislature of Pennsylvania! And it will be recollected, that, only about thirteen months ago, and in 1833, the house rejected a proposition to sell the stock, and declared that it was a safe depository of the public money—which, however, was withdrawn by the president, six or seven months afterwards—to wit, on the 1st October, 1833.

The “experiment” gathers strength as it proceeds—distress is heaped on distress, loss upon loss, and bankruptcy on bankruptcy—without one ray of hope to cheer a suffering people, unless, in the majesty of their own strength, they shall arise and arrest the downward course of things. We have advices of the stopping of many additional factories, of the discharge of many working people in numerous employments, and of a daily increasing pressure for money—though much specie is now being imported, at a ruinous rate, and in sacrifices of property that will not be easily recovered; and yet this specie seems as if it served only personal purposes—not relieving the general want of money, because of the general want of confidence. A severely reduced business and the ruin of business-men, with the non-employment of the laboring classes, is, certainly, reducing the demand for money on business paper at the banks—but what are to be the effects of such reductions? Let reflecting men think of them!

Evil reports are started as to the condition of many of the banks in Pennsylvania, Virginia, &c. and runs have been made upon them, without reasonable cause. But the Washington city papers have the following official announcement of the failure of another bank. The effect is, that the notes of all the District banks are refused in this city, for the present.

The bank of Washington announces to the public its inability to continue, for the present, specie payments. In adopting this necessitous and unpleasant course, the directors confidently assert, that the affairs of the institution are safe, and capable to meet all its engagements. Under the general distrust which prevails, the bank is reluctantly compelled to declare its inability longer to discharge its engagements, for the present, in gold and silver. It will proceed to collect its means as fast as the times will authorize, and fairly and fully pay all its creditors; and in this, entire confidence may be reposed. By the unanimous order of the board, R. C. WEIGHTMAN, cashier. April 11, 1834.

We have always understood that this bank was prudently managed—but banks are like individuals. Neither property nor credit avails much, in this season of pressure; and many that could have paid their debts ten dollars for one, a year ago, are now hard put to it to pay them at all.

The following article was prepared for last week's REGISTER—but deferred for want of room.

It is a great misfortune that the question as to a restoration of the public deposits was suffered to run into that concerning a renewal of the charter of the present bank of the United States. It was not the will of the friends of a national bank that it should have been so; but the other party, in pursuit of its original design to destroy the present bank, with a general view, perhaps, to the establishment of a political one, forced the connexion, and the removal of the deposits, by the president, rallied this party, and pushed it into action against the currency of the country. And if this shall not prove sufficient, the power of the veto is held in reserve!

Some gentlemen have said that a restoration of the deposits, without a renewal, or extension, of the charter of the bank, would do no good. With certain of these we feel great delicacy in dissenting—but still must dissent. A simple restoration of the deposits might not much, if any, relieve the pressure on the money market by enabling the bank to discount more freely—but, serving as a pledge that the bank would not be disturbed in its rightful and necessary operations, though a resolution be manifest that it shall die a natural death at the expiration of the term of its charter, the bank will calculate her means and freely use them, with greater safety to herself, and the great effect be a restoration of PUBLIC CONFIDENCE, which would relieve the present sudden and severe pressure, and enable persons in business, also, to make calculations on their means, with a view to a liberal use of them for the time being, and a gradual gathering-in of them as future circumstances should indicate the necessity of doing. But, without such restoration, the war, as it may well be called, of "the government" against the bank, by compelling the bank to defend herself, and each of her branches, (not knowing where an assault may be made), so acts and must act, for self-preservation, as to forbid full confidence in money transactions, until, perhaps, the last year in which it will be permitted to do business in winding up its concerns; and we see no possible way in which this state of things can be speedily and safely changed, in the relations at present existing between the government and the bank: for those causes which forbid the free operations of the bank of the United States, affect all the state banks in the same manner—and the possessor of the best paper which can be made has no certainty that he can obtain an accommodation upon it, as heretofore. And although it is the fashion to accuse the bank of the U. States of causing the pressure, though as we have said in another place, the line of its discounts has not been so much reduced as the line of its deposits, since October last*—the truth is, that the state banks, in general, and other money-lending institutions, have reduced their discounts at a more rapid rate. And in gov. Marcy's late message it is stated that the 67 banks in New York, under charge of the commissioners of the safety fund, have reduced their circulation three millions, since the 1st of January last!—but the circulation of the bank of the United States is greater now than it was in October.

The action of "the government" against the bank began in the president's message to congress of 7th Dec.

1829. It was even then thought by him the time had arrived when a winding-up of its affairs should be looked to—and yet the bank is blamed for the pressure, because of a present curtailment of its discounts at a less rate than the curtailment of its deposits! What can be done by the bank to appease its enemies! There is no pleasing—either by discounting freely, or in withholding discounts! It was said to be an unsafe depository of the public money, and is yet charged, on high authority, with having an ability to relieve the money market, and of refusing to do it!

Such wretched inconsistencies in times of less excitement than the present, would cause one to suspect the sanity of those who are guilty of them. Yesterday, the bank was "a reptile to be crushed at will"—to day, it is a "monster," and its president the "money-king!"

But this is manifest, that, without a restoration of the public deposits, and of the PUBLIC CONFIDENCE which would flow from that measure, the present evils must be increased, so far as they shall depend upon the proceedings of the bank—for, having no favor to expect of "the government," it must begin a serious retirement of its business. On the first of March last, its discounts amounted to 56 millions of dollars, and it then had 48 months only to close its affairs, being allowed 2 years after the expiration of the charter for that purpose. To meet the case the discount line must be reduced nearly $1,200,000 a month, or exactly fourteen millions a year, for these 4 years. Has any one calculated the effects of such a reduction? From whence will the needful supply of "money" be obtained? The supply cannot be obtained, without great public and private sacrifices of property or credit. Indeed, we fear that it cannot be obtained at all in "money" to be regarded as the equivalent of coin. But, if in this pressure the bank shall force the payment of the debts due to it, what will result?

With a restoration of the deposits, in our humble opinion, this great good might be accomplished, without any regard to a renewal of the charter, or the establishment of another national bank—The bank, for its own interest, would endeavor to collect its debts with all possible rapidity consistent with a due regard for the convenience, or solvency, of its debtors; and if, towards the expiration of the time allowed for closing its concerns, it should appear that its debts cannot be collected without causing great public distress, a brief indulgence might be expected as to time, in the same manner and spirit as the bank shall feel it necessary to indulge her debtors. But as things are, and without a restoration of the deposits, the bank cannot hope for any such indulgence on the part of "the government," nor extend its indulgence to others.

As to the public deposits—the sum of them may not long be a matter of much importance to the bank or the public, speaking of them with regard to their amount in dollars, only.

It will be recollected that, some months ago, we laughed at the fears of the wise ones, as to the vast heaps of money that would remain locked up in the treasury of the United States, or in the selected banks! Certain of these wise ones, we think, in about September last, apprehended that some twenty or thirty millions of dollars would remain as surplus funds, and they didn't "know what in the mischief" to do with them! We told them to "keep cool"—but were thought reckless when we suggested it as being within the range of possibility, that the calls upon the treasury, in the year 1834, might not be satisfied as they ought, without borrowing money! Well—soon after we had the president's message at the opening of the session of congress, and the secretary of the treasury's annual report, both of which contained exhortations to keep down the amount of the appropriations, shewing it was probable that it would be "touch and go" between the expenditures and the receipts, and that a small balance of available funds only would remain in the treasury. The wise ones rubbed their eyes, and read these parts of the message and report twice over, and wondered and wondered, saying "how can this be?" We had stated why it would or might be—but were not "democratic" enough to be believed; it then being the will of the party that the people should be alarmed at the excess of money that must remain idle in the treasury! The reason of things, with the increased expenditures, and, in some cases, prodigal uses of the public money (instance in the post office department), were all disregarded—the people were to be made to believe that the treasury would become oppressive by its repletion!

We have recurred to this subject on seeing the following statement in the newspapers:

The revenue of Boston from January 1st to December 31st, 1832, was $5,424,839 36; from January 1st to December 31st, 1833, $3,895,036 71. The revenue arising on merchandise imported from January 1st to March 31st of this year, $642,200 00—during the same time last year, $913,600 00. The number of foreign arrivals up to March 31st, 1834, 150; during the same time last year, 153—the number of foreign clearances for the same time this year 170—the clearances last year during the corresponding time, was 158.

This shews a reduction of the revenue at Boston, 1832 being compared with 1833, in the sum of 1,529,803 dollars; and yet further a reduction in the first quarter of 1834 compared with that of 1833, of 271,400 dollars, or at the rate of $1,085,600 for the year—which if maintained, will give only $2,809,430 in 1834, to be compared with $5,424,839, in 1832—difference $2,615,409.

An important report of the state of the United States bank, on the 1st of April, has been made. It shews that the bank, instead of acting to increase the pressure, has acted to relieve it—the line of the discounts, compared with that of the deposits, being reduced nearly three millions less since the 1st October, 1833! And also shewing that the present state of the balances with the state banks was 2,195,489 dollars on the 1st instant, in favor of the bank of the United States. The bank, however, is about to begin a reduction of its discounts. This report was received too late for the present number of the REGISTER.

It will be seen that the house of representatives, on Tuesday last, refused leave to print an amendment to the appropriation bill, offered by Mr. Vance, by which it is proposed to reduce the salaries of many officers of the United States, (beginning with the the president, and ending with the tide waiters, including clerks in all public offices, and agents and sub-agents of all sorts), thirty-three per cent. For the leave 105, against it 67—two-thirds being required, the leave was not granted. See the yeas and nays.

The present is an auspicious season for this glorious "retrenchment!" The "East Room" is furnished—the bare mention of which a few years ago, threw all the friends of economy into "the horrors," though a wilful falsehood—and we see it stated that plates of gold are used at Washington; and now let us have a little of the long and loudly promised "reform!" A reduction of thirty-three per cent. on the salaries of the army of public officers, would be of infinite service in purging the political atmosphere, and, we hope, will be effected. We do not see why these should be set aside as a privileged class, a peculiar people, rioting on the distress of the farmers and mechanics and other honest men, and insulting honorable labor in the "spoils" made upon it. It would also tend to preserve the purity of our elections, or at least diminish the amount of frauds committed. We have seen it repeatedly said that these highly favored persons have been sometimes assessed as high as 10 per cent. on their salaries for electioneering purposes, and compelled to pay it, under the fear of being dismissed!* Now the full battalion employed at the N. York custom house, (323 men), receive 340,000 dollars a year—10 per cent. on which, for obtaining or making votes, is 34,000 dollars; but if their aggregate salaries be reduced one-third, or to 227,000 dollars, the election money, at the same rate of assessment, will amount only to 22,700 dollars! How many perjuries may be prevented by this retrenchment! In Baltimore, the pay of the custom house officers is only about $45,000—and some of them, we are certain, do not submit to the assessment above stated; but others are exceedingly busy in all electioneering matters, and appear to spend money freely. We may see how it will be under a thirty-three and a third per cent. reduction of their salaries. But even then a few of them will possibly receive from 10 to 20 dollars an hour, for every hour actually employed in the business of the customs.

*Some few however, to their honor be it said we are sure have refused to pay their assessment for corruption.

The appreciated value of money will justify the proposed reductions—and if "we the people" must suffer under "the experiment," let the public officers partake of our fare; let the same measure be meted to them which is meted to us. If this matter shall fail in the house, it will, certainly, pass the senate, through the able support of col. Benton, in that body—without it, he, surely, will not vote for any appropriation bill.

We heartily thank Mr. Vance for his amendment offered to the appropriation bill, as above stated. A mighty good will be effected by its passage; and we have a strong hope that it will be, or that the bill, itself, will fail! Under times require energy, and it will not be wanting. The such a reduction of salaries, the ins will be less zealous to retain what they have, and outs less anxious to get their noses into the public trough; and the people, less disturbed by the squealings of both parties, the granters here and the grunthers there, will more quietly attend to their own business, and more clearly discern the true interests of the country. The proposed reduction is also just. The salaries were increased, some years ago, because of the depreciated value of money, compared with the cost of subsistence, &c. and now ought to be reduced on account of the appreciated value of money. The wages of working people have fallen, or will fall, more than one-third—and so should the wages of the public officers.

We noticed some time ago, the presentation of a memorial to congress, praying for a restoration of the deposits, signed "by sundry merchants and traders from the interior of the United States then [1st March, 1834] in Philadelphia." As a matter of information, and to give an idea of the number of such merchants sometimes present in Philadelphia and other cities, it may be mentioned, that the number of the signers of this memorial is about 280; but what allowanees should be made for others who, though then in the city, either had not an opportunity to sign or refused to sign this memorial, we cannot pretend to guess.

The residences of the gentlemen are given, and the following is their distribution, viz: Kentucky 125, Missouri 23, Tennessee 21, Ohio 44, Pennsylvania 10, Illinois 5, Virginia 6, Indiana 17, Louisiana 1, Mississippi, 7, Alabama 5, Connecticut 2, New York 2, Delaware 1, Massachusetts 1, North Carolina 2, Georgia 1, &c.

The particulars of the instruction to Isaac McKim, esq. one of the Maryland delegation in the house of representatives, will be found in a subsequent page. To the best of our recollection, this is the first regular transaction of its kind that has happened—wherein a large majority of the bona fide voters of a district have so acted. It is, on this account, specially worthy of a record. The "instruction" was presented to Mr. McKim on Thursday last week, and, though it was a matter of considerable notoriety that an attempt would be made to force a decision on the resolutions attached to the report of the committee of ways and means on the following day, through the agency of the previous question, he so far respected the voice of his constituents as to decline voting, and to proceed to Baltimore, for a more close investigation of the facts stated. On the list of names are hundreds of persons who voted for Mr. McKim—but who had not, at that time, appreciated the effect of a removal of the public deposits.

We copy the report of the joint committee of the legislature of New York, on gov. Marcy's special message, inserted in our last, with the bill annexed—which we suppose has become a law. The opponents of this law say that it "mortgages" the state; and the 10th section looks very much like it. We think that we never before knew a similar principle recognized. If the money, or credit, borrowed, is not paid by the borrowers, it seems that the deficit is to be made up by a general tax on the county in which the deficiency happens, with interest and costs! Those concerned will refer to it, and see if our reading is a correct one.

†The project is also to reduce the per diem of members of congress from 8 to 6 dollars.

Mr. Wise a member of the house of representatives from Virginia, has addressed a brief letter to his constituents, on account of his absence when the votes on the resolutions attached to the report of the committee of ways and means were taken on the 4th inst.

He says that he had proceeded to Baltimore to meet his family—they had not arrived as he expected, and he remained to receive them, not apprehensive that the "gag law" would so soon be again applied. He adds, that if he had been present, he should have voted against the previous question, and for the resolution of Mr. Wilde, declaring the reasons of the secretary of the treasury insufficient, &c. if the previous question had not been carried—that, though he disapproves of the charter of the present bank, he "should have voted against the 1st resolution of the committee, declaring "that the bank of United States ought not to be rechartered," with the understanding that the bank should be rechartered under various modifications."

Adding—

I should have voted against the second resolution declaring "that the public deposits ought not to be restored," &c. and against the third, declaring that the state banks ought to be continued as the places of deposit," &c. and I should have voted for the fourth resolution, ordering an investigation into the conduct and concerns of the bank of the United States, and an inquiry into its alleged corruptions, abuses and malpractices, not only because, if such corruptions, abuses and malpractices exist, I wish them exposed and corrected, but mainly because I desire all the light to be revealed which can possibly be shed on this vexed subject, that we may see and remedy the defects, and know and avoid the dangers of this present bank and its administration, in creating any similar institution which may hereafter, and which I hope will hereafter, be incorporated.

Having thus discharged a duty to myself in warding off any unjust imputation which might have been made, of skulking from my post in times like these, when the country expects "every man to do his duty," and my duty to you by putting you in possession of my votes and opinions which were concealed by my absence, I will conclude by saying, that, though the laws and the constitution be hard pressed upon by abuses of the powers of government, tolerated by a blind party spirit, yet there is a rebounding elasticity in the spirit of our institutions, which will react and restore all things to their wonted equilibrium. The people must guard and preserve that spirit now, by their own vigilance and majesty.

Under a due sense of responsibility and obligation, I am, fellow citizens, your humble servant,
HENRY A. WISE.
Washington, April 5, 1834.

Mr. Turner, one of the delegation from Maryland in congress, and representing Baltimore and Hartford counties, has addressed a letter to the public wherein he speaks freely, and well, of some remarks in the "government paper," as he calls the "Globe," in which he has been treated with much disrespect, for his vote on the resolutions reported by the committee of ways and means. The time was, when the official paper, conducted by gentlemen, however much its editors might differ in opinion with members of congress on particular points, never forgot the courtesy due to the honorable place held by them, unless in personal defence, and not often even under such circumstances—but now any refusal to go all lengths with "the government"—seems a sufficient justification for the editor of the official print to treat members of congress as he would a political opponent at a gathering of persons in a roads tavern, at night.

Mr. Turner states that he always thought the removal of the deposits would be productive of ruinous consequences—that the measure was "a rash experiment," and that, though he had been an ardent supporter of the present chief magistrate, he could not sustain him in this proceeding. He also says that though he unhesitatingly voted against a renewal of the charter of the present bank, he would vote for a national bank, modified and improved, &c.

Mr. Heath, from the city of Baltimore, voted with Mr. Turner, on the naked proposition concerning the recharter of the bank—but would renew its charter, we understand, with certain modifications. The screws of the previous question, however, and the address of the anti-bank committee, in framing and dove-tailing the resolutions, forbade an explanation, and causes the vote on this question to appear in a false light.

The "Alexandria Gazette," with reference to the late speech of Mr. McDuffie, gives us to understand that he announced a determination to retire from public service, in the congress of the United States.

Mr. Wilde's speech in the house of representatives, in favor of a restoration of the public deposits fills the four capacious pages, (less one column, of the "National Intelligencer"), of Wednesday last week! It concludes as follows—

We are told this "experiment" will not be abandoned whatever may be the consequences, until it has been tried and fails. And what sort of experiment is it? The president has the agriculture, commerce, manufactures and constitution of the country with a large portion of the fortunes and happiness of twelve millions of people in his crucible. It is on the subterranean fire of the palace, and we can all discern through the smoke, what alchemist it is, that promises to extract a metallic currency out of misery, and ruin, and to restore the golden age. The cries of the wretches whose substance is consuming in this wretched caldron, are drowned by the attendant spirits in bursts of mocking laughter, mixed with taunts and bitter irony. One gibbering elf traces a caricature upon the walls, and calls it "PANIC DAY." A voice of unearthly music, sweet and scornful as the accents of Archangel ruined, rings in the sufferer's ears the scoffing exhortation, "groan sinners groan!" while the guardian angels of the treasury, unable to be heard amid the din, hold up a mighty scroll labelled "BANK INVESTIGATION."

Perhaps no two other persons in the United States stand higher in the estimation of worthy and intelligent men, than James Madison and William White. The first is the father of our constitution, and entered the 84th year of his age on the 16th of March last. The second is the father of the Protestant Episcopal church in America, being its first bishop, and said also to be the oldest Protestant bishop living, entered his 87th year on the 4th instant. Though the bodily strength of these illustrious men (as well as that of judge Marshall, who must be placed in their rank), is much lessened, their power of mind does not appear to be diminished. It would be worth a journey from Boston to Washington, to see the three named all together! Such a trio of talent and character and goodness, has not, perhaps, ever yet met.

We have only a few and partial returns of the Virginia elections. So far there does not appear to be any material change in the political character of the members of the legislature chosen. We shall have many returns for our next.

The New York local or town elections have just been or are about to be held. In the opposing accounts, it is hard to ascertain the truth—but it would appear that there has been a great rallying against the general administration, and that of the state government. We shall know the real state of things in a few days, the N. York city election for mayor, &c. being now over.

The New York city election for mayor, aldermen, &c. commenced on Tuesday last, and was continued on Wednesday and concluded on Thursday. We cannot know the result until this evening (Saturday), and, of course, too late for this paper. We have some account of what happened on Tuesday, and as late as ½ past 1 o'clock on Wednesday, which we shall briefly notice.

It rained heavily, and sometimes in torrents, on Tuesday, but it had no effect to reduce the temperament of the people, and the extraordinary number of 20,257 votes were polled on that day, being 6,416 more than was polled on the 1st day in 1832, and 3,000 more than in the three days of the November election, 1833.

From what we have heretofore briefly mentioned, our readers will have entertained some idea of the arrangement, resolution and energy of the parties to this contest—but the reality has gone far beyond anything that we expected. The parties seem to have been engaged in a death struggle: the public officers and all their dependents, with the friends of the general and state governments, on the one side—and the merchants and traders, and mechanics, and opponents of the general and state governments, on the other. Business of all sorts was nearly suspended—at 12 M. the flag of the union was hoisted each day on the exchange, the building was then deserted, and the stores in all parts of the city generally closed, that every man might go to the polls!

*Mr. Forsyth, in the senate.

James Thomas Compton

At most of the wards in which the anti-Jackson men expected a majority, the election proceeded as peaceably as could have been hoped in such a state of excitement—but in the 6th and 11th wards there was much violence and confusion. The former has sometimes been called the office-holders ward, being the residence of many of them, and the latter is thought to be the strongest in their favor. In the 6th, "the party" commenced with a general attack on the committee room of their opponents, and possessed themselves of it, tearing down the banners, and destroying the ballots, &c. Many were armed with bludgeons, and some with knives. They were headed by an ex-alderman—and knocked down about 20 persons, one man was reported killed,* and several injured, one so much so that he was carried off lifeless, but, recovering, he again took his place at the polls. The mayor was called upon for aid, but said that he could not render it, all his force being already on duty. In this emergency, a meeting was called at the Masonic Hall, and four thousand "Whigs" attended it. Gen. Robert Bogardus, was called to the chair and the following resolutions passed:

Whereas the authority of the POLICE of the city has been set at defiance by a band of hirelings, mercenaries and bullies in the 6th ward, and the LIVES of our fellow citizens put in jeopardy; And whereas it is evident that we are in a state of ANARCHY which requires the prompt and efficient interposition of every friend of good order who is disposed to sustain the constitution and the laws—therefore be it

Resolved, That in order to preserve the PEACE of the city, and especially of the 6th ward, the friends of the constitution and the liberties of the citizen, will meet at this place, (Masonic Hall), to-morrow, (Wednesday at half past seven o'clock, and repair to the 6th ward poll, for the purpose of keeping it open to ALL VOTERS until such time as the official authorities may "procure a sufficient number of special constables to preserve the public peace."

Resolved, That while at the 6th ward poll, those who are not residents thereof, will not take any part in the election, but simply act as conservators of the peace, until such times as the MAJESTY OF THE LAWS shall be acknowledged and respected."

Various other proceedings for the preservation of the public peace were had—and many special constables appointed on the ensuing morning, &c. A large meeting was again held at the Masonic Hall at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 7, A. M. on Wednesday, when it was plainly to be seen that order would be preserved by the application of force, if needed. Particular bodies of men were rallied and prepared, and the mayor, sheriff, &c. exerted themselves, being in attendance at the 6th ward; and, though another great effort was made to bring about a general riot, and many stones were thrown and bludgeons used, the force present put it down, and at 1 o'clock (Wednesday), the polls were of easy access to voters. Several rioters, (chiefly Irishmen), were arrested and sent to prison—though violent attempts to rescue them were made, in which persons, who ought to be regarded as gentlemen, were concerned. But they were defeated.

At the 11th ward the "Jackson" men had two private entrances to the poll room, which they exclusively used for their own friends, blocking up the public entrance! These proceedings caused a great excitement—and measures were taking to have the private entrances closed.

Several persons appear to have been stabbed—one of them it was feared would die, being struck in the bowels.

The estimates as to the state of the polls before the ballots are counted, cannot to be relied on—and both parties suppose that they have the majority.

P. S. We have accounts from New York to  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 1 o'clock on Thursday. At about 12 o'clock, a large body of Irishmen, armed with bludgeons and stones, marched in a body to attack the anti-Jackson committee, meeting in the Masonic Hall! The mayor, sheriff, &c. with a strong posse of constables, repaired to the scene of action. The mayor held up his staff, and commanded the peace—but was answered with a shower of stones and other missiles. The herd rushed on—the mayor and sheriff were assailed—numbers of ruffians rushed into the hall, and put the defenceless committee to rout—they fled for their lives! They knocked down, and are believed to have killed several persons in the street! The mayor was badly injured. After this, the mob attempted to gain the arsenal—but the citizens anticipated them, and kept them off; and, at the latest moment of our advice, the officers at the arsenal were passing out arms to the citizens, to suppress the rioters.

Such is the substance of the account—hastily written, and, no doubt, under much excitement. The stores in Broadway were closed—and the riot continued, to end we know not how. Several peace officers were much hurt.

On the second day 9,271 additional votes were polled.

The present governor of Connecticut, Mr. Edwards, was elected last year by the "Jackson" party in the state; but, from the accounts before us, it appears that Mr. Fool, (anti-Jackson) at present a member of congress, has ousted Mr. E. with a majority unprecedented since the rise of present parties in that state. It is said that only one "Jackson man" has been returned to the state senate, and that the house of representatives will be from two-thirds to five-sixths anti-Jackson.

In New York and Connecticut the term "whigs" is now used by the opponents of the administration when speaking of themselves, and they call the "Jackson men" by the offensive name of "tories."

It is reported that major Eaton has been nominated governor of Florida, in the place of gov. Duval; and intimated that Andrew Stewart, one of the Pennsylvania delegation in congress, will probably be chosen president of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, in the place of major Eaton, resigned.

A considerable subscription has been made in New York for the relief of the Polish exiles, who have arrived in that city. One person unknown contributed $200.

There was a drawing room held at St. James' palace, on the 24th Feb. last, the anniversary of the queen's birth day. It was numerously attended, and the ladies were splendidly dressed, &c. The queen, the queen that is to be, (the princess Victoria), and her mother, the duchess of Kent, were wholly dressed in articles of British manufacture. THEY ARE "TARIFFITES!"

It appears from the official papers that the extra allowances made by the post master general, in the last four years, amount to the enormous sum of $1,515,589! The distribution of this money is not less remarkable than its amount, as the following summary statement will shew:

States and territories.	Sums appropriated under the title of extras to mail contractors.
Maine,.....	$7,529 00
New Hampshire,.....	1,520 00
Vermont,.....	1,480 00
Massachusetts,.....	4,248 64
Connecticut,.....	3,478 80
New York,.....	8,650 08
New Jersey,.....	37,552 00
Pennsylvania,.....	158,133 20
Delaware,.....	6,304 00
Maryland,.....	94,853 28
Virginia,.....	315,414 60
North Carolina,.....	112,036 48
South Carolina,.....	62,448 32
Georgia,.....	144,974 84
Florida,.....	5,190 72
Alabama,.....	186,822 68
Mississippi,.....	3,618 56

Indiana,.....	95,379 84
Illinois,.....	39,369 56
Missouri,.....	4,360 96
Arkansas,.....	10,434 08

Total, $1,515,580 84

To pay-off the post office debts and relieve it from its present bankruptcy, we understand that a curtailment of these extra allowances will be made! For instances, Reese will be cut-down 73,693 dollars in 4 years! Stockton and Neil 63,920 dollars! Porter & Co. 67,776 dollars! and so on.

*He was, however, yet living, at the latest date.

The cholera has reappeared at Memphis, Ten. and in certain parts of Kentucky, &c. and on-board some of the steamboats—so say several of the western newspapers.

It is reported at New York, that the Brandywine frigate will soon proceed from that port for Norfolk, from whence she will take out "Mr. Speaker" Stevenson as our minister to England, and thence proceed to her station in the Pacific. We have only just heard that Mr. S. has been nominated to the senate—the result has not yet reached us. We did hope that the practice of taking members of congress from their places to fill offices in the gift of the executive, would not be preserved in.

ALEXANDER BROWN. We noticed the decease of this much valued citizen in the last REGISTER—of whom the "American" of the 5th instant, says—"A circumstance has been mentioned to us which illustrates in a striking manner the liberal character of the deceased. After the sitting of the committee of the creditors of the bank of Maryland, on Tuesday evening last, Mr. Brown, in the course of a conversation on the moneyed distress of the times with one of the members—an old personal friend—remarked with much emphasis, that "he would not permit one solvent merchant in Baltimore to fail." The same night he was attacked with the illness which caused his death, but there is no doubt that had his valuable life been spared, his ample wealth would have been freely employed in the noble purpose which he then avowed.

LABOR IN THE PENITENTIARIES. Great complaints are made of the interference of the labor of criminals with that of honest men, and they are just; but the way to relieve them does not seem clear to us. As we have several times said, we think that the penitentiary system has failed to effect the reformation hoped for by it—but rogues must be punished, or at least withheld from society, shall they be subsisted without labor, or how shall we employ them?

The following statement of the number of convicts and their employment in the Sing Sing prison, in October, 1830, extracted from the report of the inspectors, was lately published in several of the New York daily papers:—

40 locksmiths; 56 blacksmiths, grate makers, &c. 99 shoe makers; 56 weavers and tailors; 11 silk hatters, to which more is added now; 174 coopers; 22 assistant coopers; 15 laborers; 76 quarry men; 18 cooks and bakers; 45 masons and stone cutters, working on work shops; 15 waiters and tenders; 22 men in hospital. Total 649.

The provisions for 649 men, agreeable to the report, does not exceed 63 cents per day. The whole cost for sustenance, clothing and keeping each convict will not exceed 12 cents per day.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 10th March, inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

A serious riot recently occurred in Liverpool between the Leinster and Ulster Irish factions. They had previously fought three pitched battles in the county of Cheshire, and on returning to Liverpool commenced an indiscriminate attack upon all they met. Seventeen of them were taken and imprisoned, prior to which, however, they wounded several of the police officers severely.

Lord Althorp had notified his intention of introducing a bill for reforming the reform bill; and the marquis of Westminster had given notice of his determination of altering the system of voting by proxy in the house of lords.

The balance in the treasury, according to lord Althorp's financial statement, was, on the 5th of January last, £1,513,000; and his lordship calculates that the opening of the China trade will add £600,000 to the revenue derived from that source; that the estimates of the present year will be less by half a million than those of 1833; that, if the present taxes were continued, there would be a surplus of £2,600,000 at the end of the year. After providing for the interest of the twenty millions to be paid as an indemnity to the West India proprietors, which he puts down at £800,000, the estimated surplus will be reduced to £1,600,000; and he introduced a bill, on the 7th March, to repeal the house tax, amounting to £1,300,000, leaving a surplus of £600,000. On the same day, Mr. Hunt's bill to repeal the corn laws was defeated by a vote of 319 to 155.

It is also proposed to reduce the navy estimates £180,000. From actual returns, the property of the church of England, consisting of bishops' incomes, deans' and chapters' incomes, together with 11,400 benefices, amounts to £3,621,125.

FRANCE.

Disturbances of a serious nature, but without bloodshed, occurred in Paris, on the 23d of February, which were undergoing judicial inquiry. The unstable tenure by which peace is maintained in Paris, may be gathered from the pithy remarks of gen. Jacquemont, the commander of the national guards, made in the chamber of deputies, on the occasion of the discussion of the above disturbances. He said: "the national guard is tired, fatigued and discontented; that the position of the gentlemen composing it had become intolerable, for they were continually under the necessity of taking up arms to defend their shops and warehouses; and that the citizen, instead of taking his wife out to walk of a Sunday, is obliged to shoulder his musket."

The chamber of deputies had been engaged in the discussion of petitions demanding the abolition of the law of banishment against the Bonaparte family, and praying for the removal of the remains of Napoleon to France.

The government had signified its opposition to the first branch of these measures.

Alarming dissensions had taken place among the workmen and their employers at Lyons, Nantz and Marseille; those at the first place were so serious as to cause many families to remove, and the rioters at the second had got possession of the magazine. Many arrests had taken place.

SPAIN.

Ordonnances for the organization of the national guards; for placing the financial affairs of the country in the hands of Imas; and for appointing several commanders of provinces, had been issued by the queen regent. She had also consented to the convocation of the cortes in consequence of the tender of the resignation of two of her most popular ministers, and the consequent occurrence of an immediate commotion in the very neighborhood of the palace.

In the north the insurgents were in very great force. Zabala, with 5,000 men was besieging Guernica; and other chiefs had approached Lrun.

It was stated that Don Carlos had negotiated a loan of 4,000,000,000 of reals, the name of the contractor is not however given, nor is credit to the statement.

PORTUGAL.

A battle occurred on the 18th February, between 5,000 of Don Miguel's troops at Santarem, and the Pedroites, under gen. Sandauba, near Cartaxo, which, according to the report of the American consul at Lisbon, was most decisive in favor of the Pedroites, the whole force of the Miguelites being either killed or taken prisoners. Great rejoicings had taken place in consequence of the victory, and Lisbon was brilliantly illuminated. Previously, some apprehension had been felt at Lisbon in consequence of the proximity of a large Miguelite force; but they were now dispelled. Miguel still, however, held on to Santarem.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

The arrangements between these powers, it is stated, will be very speedily brought to a favorable termination. Holland is to have the province of Luxemburg, and Belgium that of Limburg. This arrangement, it is said, will be carried into effect, notwithstanding the refusal of the collateral branches of the house of Nassau. This will leave the regulation of the trade of the Scheldt the only remaining point to be settled.

The Hague papers, however, speak of the marching of 10,000 Belgian troops into Luxemburg.

At Brussels, the reply of King Leopold to the address of the representatives of the people, had produced great discontent, and the king, and his minister of justice, were both burnt in effigy on the great square. At the last advices all was quiet in the capital.

At Ghent there had been tumultuous proceedings among the students, nineteen of whom had been arrested.

Many of the large commercial houses and ship owners of Antwerp were emigrating to Holland.

NAPLES.

A revolution had broken out in the capital, and had extended itself throughout the kingdom.

TURKEY.

M. Rothschild had come to a final arrangement with the Porte relative to the payment of the indemnity, and would remain at Constantinople for some months.

MEXICO.

Conspiracies and robberies continued to be the order of the day in this country. There had been 500 criminals arrested in one district, in about a month prior to the 16th February, 200 of the number for robberies.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

April 3. The vice president presented the following communication from the secretary of the treasury, responsive to Mr. Clay's resolution of the 31st March.

Treasury department, April 3, 1834.

SIR—In obedience to the resolution of the senate of the 31st ultimo, requiring the secretary of the treasury "to report to the senate what amount of public money is now on deposit in the Union bank of Maryland, when and on what account it was deposited, and also, whether any treasury drafts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, or at any time heretofore, to the bank of Maryland, for any and what purposes: And that he likewise report what amount of stock in the capital of the said Union bank was held by R. B. Taney, esq. when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive on deposit the public money, and what amount of the said stock he now holds," I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement, (marked A. to U.) of the public money deposited in the Union bank of Maryland, showing when it was deposited and on what account. The difference between the balance to the credit of the treasurer, in his statement, and in that furnished by the bank, arises from warrants which have been issued by the treasurer on the bank, but which have not been presented for payment, and a deposit to his credit since the last weekly return.

No treasury draughts, contingent or other were furnished to the Union bank of Maryland during the month of March, 1834. And no transfer draught of any description, contingent or other, has ever been furnished to the bank of Maryland, since I came into office. In answer to that part of the resolution, which calls for information as to the amount of stock held by Roger B. Taney in the Union bank of Maryland; "when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive in deposit the public money, and what amount of the said stock he now holds." I have the honor to state that inasmuch as the inquiry does not embrace the stockholders generally, but is confined to the stock of a particular individual, it must, by necessary implication, be understood as pointing the inquiry to the motives which influenced the individual named in the transactions he may have had in the stock of the said bank—and under such circumstances, it is due to his official relations to the senate and to the public, that his motives in any such transactions should be fully and clearly disclosed. I therefore transmit to the senate a copy of a letter from this department, to the president of the Union bank of Maryland, dated the 31st day of March, 1834, apprising him of the information required by the senate, requesting him to forward to the department, a statement of the amount of stock in the Union bank of Maryland, held by Roger B. Taney, at the time the deposits were removed—time at which it was purchased—and the amount now held by him—and the original private letter of Roger B. Taney authorising him to sell certain shares of stock which were lately sold.

Also, the letter from the president of the Union bank of Maryland, in reply, dated April 1st mentioned, which are herewith transmitted and are as follows:

1. The statement of the cashier, showing that at the time of the selection of the said bank as one of the banks to receive in deposit the public money, Roger B. Taney held in the stock of the said bank, 71 full shares, and 4 half shares, the par value of which amounted to $5,475. That the last of these shares were purchased by him on the 12th of May, 1831, before he received any appointment under the government of the United States; and that he now holds 63 full shares of stock in the said bank, showing that 8 full shares and 4 half shares which were held by him at the time the deposits were removed, were sold and transferred on the 20th February, 1834.

2. The original private letter of Roger B. Taney, of the 18th February, 1834, to the president of the Union bank, directing so many shares to be sold, for the purpose of paying the debt therein mentioned, as might be necessary for that purpose, and the balance of the shares to be returned to him; and the affirmation of the president of the Union bank that he sold, under the power of attorney mentioned in that letter, eight full shares, and four half shares, and returned to Roger B. Taney a certificate of the remaining one share. The letter states the certificate sent to the president of the bank at nine full shares; the affirmation of the president of the bank shows, that it contained nine full shares and four half shares, the half shares being omitted in the letter, included in the power of attorney to sell.

I also transmit herewith the original letter, dated 15th February, 1834, from Somerville Pinkney, esq. of the city of Annapolis, the counsel for the creditor to whom the debt was due from Roger B. Taney, as trustee, requesting the payment of the said debt. I have the honor to be sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, secretary of the treasury.

Hon. Martin Van Buren, vice president of the U. States and president of the senate.

Mr. Clay briefly explained, that, in consequence of the return made of the stockholders of the Union bank of Maryland; in which the name of R. B. Taney appeared as stockholder, he had thought it but justice to the public, that it should be ascertained what amount of stock was held by Mr. Taney in this bank. It was a mere fact which was called for, and nothing had been dropped, when the call was made, on the subject of motives. When the people had the facts before them, they would be able to make their own inferences. He had not thought it proper that the name of Mr. Taney should be sent forth to the world as a stockholder, without further information.

He moved that the communication be printed; which was agreed to.

April 4. Mr. McKean presented the proceedings of a large meeting of friends of the administration, held in Centre county, Pennsylvania, one of the most prominent actors in which was the venerable Andrew Gregg, a member of the first congress that assembled under the present constitution, &c. This meeting, said Mr. McK. among other things, resolve that they have continued confidence in the integrity and patriotism of our present venerable president, and that they see no reason to doubt the purity of his purpose and honesty of intention, which guided him in his recent course against the United States bank; but, as congress alone possesses the power, under the constitution, to raise revenue, and direct its appropriations, so, in accordance with the same principle, the place of deposit and safe keeping of the public money should be provided for by law. And they request their senators and representatives in congress to use their best exertions to procure an early and satisfactory adjustment of the questions affecting the currency of the country.

The proceedings having been read—

Mr. Clayton rose merely to correct an error, into which the persons composing the meeting had fallen. They expressed their regret that a compromise offered by the senator from Georgia, when the bank charter was under consideration, was not accepted by the senate. Now he, Mr. C. recollected that no such compromise was offered by the senator from Georgia. That gentleman did not say that he would vote for the recharter of the bank, if the restrictions and limitations he suggested were accepted by the senate, although he did say that he would vote for no bank bill that did not contain them. These were his recollections of facts; if he was in error the gentleman from Georgia would correct him.

Mr. Forsyth replied, that he should have a dreadful task of it, if he undertook to correct every error to be found in the memorials presented to the senate. The gentleman from Delaware, however, was right in his statement of facts. He did not offer a compromise. His convictions were, that no bill to recharter the bank could be so framed, at this session, as to meet with the concurrence of every member of the senate. Perhaps there never could be such a bill framed.

Mr. Clayton agreed entirely with the gentleman from Georgia. It was not possible, he thought, to frame a bill at this session, that would meet with the concurrence of a majority of both houses of congress.

Mr. McKean then presented the proceedings of another meeting held in the same county, of the respectability of the names attached to which he bore a high testimony, disapproving of the removal of the deposits, to which cause they attribute the present distresses of the country, and recommend, for a limited time, the extension of the charter of the present bank, and that the public revenues, to be collected hereafter, shall be deposited in it and its branches.

The proceedings and resolutions were read, referred to the committee on finance and ordered to be printed.

After some debate, the matters relating to the contested election for a senator in Rhode Island, were laid on the table.

The bill authorising the governors of the several states to transmit, by mail, certain papers and documents free of postage, was read the third time and passed, by yeas and nays—27 yeas, 1 nay.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, jr. was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. Clayton submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following be added to, and form a part of, the rules of the senate:

"As soon as the journal is read, the president shall call for petitions from the members of each state, beginning with Maine, and, if in any day the whole of the states shall not be called, the president shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day."

A good deal of other business was attended to this day, which will be sufficiently noticed in its progress.

The senate adjourned till Monday.

April 7. Memorials, proceedings of meetings, &c. favorable to the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented, as follows: by Mr. Sibley, of Massachusetts, from 1,208 inhabitants of the town of Salem in that state; by Mr. Wright, of N. York, from 55 citizens of the village of Syracuse; by the same from 1,143 citizens of Rochester; by Mr. Bibb from upwards of 1,000 citizens of Shelby county, Kentucky; which were severally read, referred and ordered to be printed.

Proceedings and resolutions approving the removal of the deposits, &c. were presented by Mr. Frelinghuysen, from a meeting of friends of the administration in Essex county, New Jersey; by Mr. Brown, of North Carolina, from a meeting held in Tarborough, in Edgecombe county—which were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Morris presented certain resolutions from the legislature of the state of Ohio: 1. A resolution asking for an appropriation of public lands for the use of schools in that state; 2. A resolution disapproving of the West Point academy; 3. A resolution asking a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Ohio and Pennsylvania canal, and 4. a resolution asking that grants of land may be made to the surviving officers of the last war with Great Britain: which were severally read and referred.

The special order, being the resolutions introduced by Mr. Clay on the subject of executive power, being announced by the chair, the senate, on motion of Mr. Clay, postponed their consideration until this day fortnight.

Mr. Preston submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate the name of the agent or agents employed by him to transact the business of the treasury with the banks selected for the deposit of the public funds; the nature of the duties performed by said agent or agents; the amount of compensation paid for the discharge of the said duties, and by whom and from what fund the said compensation was paid; and whether the said agent or agents have been appointed in pursuance of law.

Mr. Calhoun gave notice that he would call up his bill repealing the force bill, on Wednesday next.

The bill making an appropriation for the construction of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road in the District of Columbia, was laid on the table.

The senate having successively taken up and acted upon several bills of a private character, went into executive business, and, after, being sometime engaged therein, the senate adjourned.

April 8. Memorials, proceedings of public meetings, &c. favorable to the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented by the following persons: by Mr. Southard from a meeting of inhabitants of the town of Clinton, by the same from large public meetings in the town of Morris, Hunterdon county, in the county of Cape May, as also of Salem county, all in the state of New Jersey; by Mr. Silsbee from inhabitants of New Bedford, Mass.; by Mr. McKean from a large meeting of citizens of Delaware county, Pa. also from the city authorities of the city and county of Philadelphia; all which were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Southard presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Clinton, Huntingdon county, New Jersey, approving of the removal of the deposits, &c. which was read, referred, &c. Mr. Silsbee reported a bill in aid of the marine hospital at Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. King submitted a resolution inquiring into the expediency of authorising the accounting officers of the treasury to credit the account of David McCord, late receiver of public moneys at the land office at Cahawba, Alabama, with a certain amount of money received by him for the sale of public lands, and lost by the burning of the steamboat Florida, while taking the same to Mobile to deposit it in the branch bank of the United States. The chair communicated a report from the general land office in answer to a call for the number of patents ready for the signature of, and unsigned by, the president, &c.

On motion of Mr. White, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and remained in secret session two hours.

On the reopening of the doors, the senate proceeded to the consideration of a resolution offered by Mr. Clayton proposing a change in the rules of the senate, on the subject of the presentation of petitions.

A debate ensued in which Messrs. Clayton and Southard defended the resolution, and were opposed by Messrs. Clay, Calhoun and King, of Ala. After several unsuccessful attempts to lay the resolution on the table, and an amendment being offered by Mr. Clay, the senate, on motion of Mr. Ewing, adjourned.

April 9. A message was received from the president of the United States, transmitting the information called for relative to the proclamation for the sales of the Choctaw lands, and giving the reasons for the shortness of the notice.

On motion of Mr. Preston, the resolution submitted by him a few days ago, calling on the treasury department for information respecting the agent appointed to arrange the affairs of the government with the several state banks selected to receive the public deposits, was taken up, modified and adopted.

After attending to some private business,

On motion of Mr. Calhoun the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to repeal the force act, when

Mr. Calhoun addressed the senate in support of the bill for an hour and a half.

Mr. Clay said he should have voted for the force bill if he had been in his seat when the bill passed—that he would go for the repeal of the military part of the bill, if it would soothe any unkind feelings in the south, for that part of the bill was now unimportant, and he had not much confidence in the man whom it clothed with extraordinary power—but he would not vote to repeal the judicial part of the bill—and he was sorry the question was agitated at all. He then moved to refer the bill to the judiciary committee.

Mr. Calhoun opposed the reference; and after a brief debate in which Messrs. Forsyth, Preston and Poindexter took part, and a few remarks in explanation by Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun withdrew his objection, and the bill was referred to said committee.

A joint resolution, offered by Mr. Benton, was then taken up; but in consequence of his absence, was laid on the table. The senate then adjourned.

April 10. Mr. Mangum presented the memorial of 103 citizens of Terrill county, N. C. remonstrating against the removal of the deposits.

Mr. Shepley presented the proceedings of a public meeting held in the towns of Gardiner and Dixton, Maine, signed by 634 individuals, without distinction of party, equal to the average number of voters of both political parties, complaining of distress and embarrassment, and in favor of a bank to regulate the money concerns of the country.

Both the above were read, referred, &c.

The report on the contested election of the Rhode Island senator, was taken up, and made the order of the day for this day week.

The bill to repeal the act for the better organization of the treasury department, was taken up, as in committee of the whole, and, on motion of Mr. Tyler, laid on the table.

The resolution moved by Mr. Clayton to change the rules of the senate relative to the reception of petitions, &c. was taken up, amended and agreed to.

The senate then successively took up, as in committee of the whole, several bills of a private or local character, which were severally read the second time and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—and then the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 4. After the morning business—

Mr. McDuffie continued and concluded an animated and eloquent speech in opposition to the report of the committee of ways and means.

When Mr. McD. resumed his seat, which he did at a quarter after four o'clock, a number of gentlemen started to obtain the floor; Mr. Mason, of Virginia, succeeded, and, after some brief prefatory remarks, moved the previous question.

On the question whether that motion was seconded by the house, (which it must be by a majority, or it fails), the members passed between tellers, and the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Adams, Wm. Allen, Anthony, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, John Bell, John Blair, Boeke, Boon, Bouldin, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chinn, Samuel Clark, Clay, Coffee, Connor, Cramer, Day, Dickerson, Dickinson, Dunlap, Forester, W. K. Fuller, Galbraith, Gillett, Joseph Hall, T. H. Hall, Halsey, Hamer, Hannagan, Joseph M. Harper, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Hawes, Henderson, Howell, Hubbard, Abel Huntington, Inge, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Noah Johnson, Cave Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kavanagh, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Thomas Lee, Leavitt, Loyal, Lucas, Lyon, Lytle, Abijah Mann, jr. J. K. Mann, Mardis, J. Y. Mason, Moses Mason, McIntire, McKay, McKinley, McLene, McVeah, Miller, Henry Mitchell, Robert Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Murphy, Osgood, Page, Parks, Parker, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, Peyton, Franklin Pierce, Pierson, Plummer, Polk, Pope, Schenck, Shinn, Charles Slade, Smith, Speight, Standifer, Stoddard, Sutherland, Wm. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thomson, Turill, Vanderpool, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Wayne, Webster, Whallon—114.

NAVS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, C. Allan, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Baylies, Beatty, James M. Bell, Binney, Briggs, Bull, Burd, Burges, Cage, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Choate, Claiborne, William Clarke, Clayton, Clowney, Corwin, Coulter, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Warren R. Davis, Amos Davis, Davenport, D-berny, Deming, Denny, Dennis, Dickson, Duncan, Ellsworth, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Fillmore, Foot, Grayson, Philo C. Fuller, Folson, Gordon, Graham, Grayson, Grinnell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, J. Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, J. W. Huntington, Jackson, W. C. Johnson, King, Lay, Lincoln, Martindale, Marshall, McCarty, McCommas, McDuffie, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Moore, Pinckney, Potts, Ramsay, Reed, Rencher, Selden, W. R. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, William Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Stewart, William P. Taylor, Philemon Thomas, Tompkins, Turner, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmouth, E. D. White, F. Whittlesey, Elisia Whittlesey, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Young—106.

So it was seconded that the main question should now be put—cutting off the proposed amendment of Mr. Wilde, and excluding all other amendments.

Mr. Selden rose and called the attention of the chair to the 22d rule of order, which forbids any member to vote on a question in which he is personally interested, and stated that several members of the house were stockholders in the banks which had been selected to receive the deposits.

The chair decided that no question could be interposed, nor question of order discussed, until the vote on the previous question had been taken; inasmuch as the house, by supporting the motion for the previous question, had determined that the question should at once be put.

A variety of motions and proceedings followed—the majority refusing to adjourn, and the yeas and nays being called several times, &c.

Mr. Wilde asked if it would be in order to move to suspend the rules of the house, so as to obtain a direct vote by yeas and nays on his amendment?

The chair decided in the negative. The nature of the previous question did not depend on the rules of the house, but on the lex parliamentaria, and the suspension of the rules would not affect it.

Mr. Adams inquired whether, after the previous question should have been ordered, it applied to all the resolutions, or only to the first?

The chair said that the question now was, only whether the main question should be put: when the house had decided this, the main question itself would be susceptible of division, so as to get a separate vote on each resolution.

The previous question was now put as follows:

"Shall the main question now be put?" And decided by yeas and nays as follows:—yeas 114, nays 107.

So the house determined that the main question should now be put.

The main question was then put, viz: will this house concur with the committee of ways and means in the resolutions reported by them to this house?

Mr. Wilde demanded that the question should be divided, so as to take a vote separately on each resolution.

It was divided accordingly: and put, first, upon concurring in the first of the resolutions reported, viz:

"Resolved, That the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered."

And determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Adams, Wm. Allen, Anthony, Archer, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, J. Bell, Jno. Blair, Boeke, Boon, Bouldin, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, Campbell, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chinn, Claiborne, Samuel Clark, Clay, Clayton, Clowney, Coffee, Connor, Cramer, W. R. Davis, Davenport, Day, Dickerson, Dickinson, Dunlap, Felder, Forester, Foster, W. K. Fuller, Fulton, Galbraith, Gholson, Gillet, Gilmer, Gordon, Grayson, Griffin, Jos. Hall, T. H. Hall, Halsey, Hamer, Hannegan, Jos. M. Harper, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Hawes, Heath, Henderson, Howell, Hubbard, Abel Huntington, Inge, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Noadiah Johnson, Cave Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kavanagh, Kinnard, Lane, Lausing, Laporte, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Thomas Lee, Leavitt, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Lytle, Abijah Mann, Joel K. Mann, Mardis, John Y. Mason, Moses Mason, McIntire, McKay, McKinley, McLene, McVean, Miller, Henry Mitchell, Robert Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Murphy, Osgood, Page, Parks, Parker, Patterson, D. J. Pearce, Peyton, F. Pierce, Pierson, Pinckney, Plummer, Polk, Rencher, Schenck, Schley, Shinn, Smith, Speight, Standtler, Stoddert, Sutherland, William Taylor, William P. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thomson, Turner, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Wayne, Webster, Whalon—132.

NAYS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Baylies, Beatty, James M. Bell, Binney, Briggs, Bull, Burges, Cagle, Chambers, Chilton, Choate, William Clark, Corwin, Coulter, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Amos Davis, Deberry, Deming, Denny, Dennis, Dickson, Duncan, Ellsworth, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Fillmore, Foot, Philo C. Fuller, Graham, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, James Harper, Hazeltine, Jabez W. Huntington, Jackson, William C. Johnson, Lincoln, Martindale, Marshall, McCarty, McComas, McDuffie, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Moore, Pope, Potts, Reed, William E. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, William Slade, Charles Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Philemon Thomas, Tompkins, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmough, Edward D. White, Fred. Whittlesey, E. Whittlesey, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Young—82.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The question was then put on agreeing to the following (the second) resolution:

"Resolved, That the public deposits ought not to be restored to the bank of the United States."

And determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Adams, Wm. Allen, Anthony, Beale, Beau, Beardsley, Beaumont, J. Bell, J. Blair, Boeke, Boon, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chancy, Chinn, Samuel Clark, Clay, Coffee, Connor, Cramer, Day, Philemon Dickerson, David W. Dickinson, Dunlap, Forester, Wm. K. Fuller, Galbraith, Gillet, Gilmer, Joseph Hall, Thomas H. Hall, Halsey, Hamer, Hannegan, Jos. M. Harper, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Hawes, Henderson, Howell, Hubbard, Abel Huntington, Inge, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Noadiah Johnson, Cave Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Benjamin Jones, Edward Kavanagh, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Thomas Lee, Leavitt, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Lytle, Abijah Mann, J. K. Mann, Mardis, J. Y. Mason, Moses Mason, McCarty, McIntosh, McKay, McKinley, McLene, McVean, Miller, Henry Mitchell, Robt. Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Murphy, Osgood, Page, Parks, Parker, Patterson, Dutce J. Pearce, Peyton, Franklin Pierce, Pierson, Plummer, Polk, Pope, Schenck, Schley, Chas. Slade, Smith, Spangler, Speight, Standtler, Stoddert, Sutherland, Wm. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thomson, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Wayne, Webster, Whalon—118.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barrington, Baylies, Beatty, James M. Bell, Binney, Briggs, Bull, Burd, Cagle, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Choate, Claiborne, Wm. Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Corwin, Coulter, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Warren R. Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Deming, Denny, Dennis, Dickson, Duncan, Ellsworth, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Fillmore, Foot, Foster, Philo C. Fuller, Fulton, Gholson, Gordon, Graham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, James Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, Jabez W. Huntington, Jackson, William C. Johnson, King, Lay, Lincoln, Martindale, Marshall, McComas, McDuffie, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Moore, Pinckney, Potts, Ramsay, Reed, Rencher, Selden, William E. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, William Slade, Sloane, Stewart, Wm. P. Taylor, Philemon Thomas, Tompkins, Turner, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmough, Edward D. White, Frederick Whittlesey, Elisha Whittlesey, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Young—103.

So the second resolution was agreed to.

The question was then put on agreeing to the third resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the state banks ought to be continued as the places of deposit of the public money, and that it is expedient for congress to make further provision by law, prescribing the mode of selection, the securities to be taken, and the manner and terms on which they are to be employed."

And determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Adams, Wm. Allen, Anthony, Beale, Beau, Beardsley, Beaumont, John Bell, John Blair, Boeke, Boon, Bouldin, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chauey, Chinn, S. Clark, Clay, Coffee, Connor, Cramer, Day, Dickerson, Dickinson, Dunlap, Forester, Wm. K. Fuller, Galbraith, Gillet, Gilmer, Joseph Hall, T. H. Hall, Halsey, Hamer, Hannegan, J. M. Harper, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Hawes, Henderson, Howell, Hubbard, Abel Huntington, Inge, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Noadiah Johnson, Cave Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kavanagh, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Lea, Lee, Leavitt, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Lytle, Abijah Mann, J. K. Mann, Mardis, Moses Mason, John Y. Mason, McCarty, McIntire, McKay, McKinley, McLene, McVean, Miller, Henry Mitchell, Robert Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Murphy, Osgood, Page, Parks, Parker, Patterson, Dutce J. Pearce, Peyton, Franklin Pierce, Pierson, Plummer, Polk, Pope, Schewek, Schley, Shinn, Charles Slade, Smith, Speight, Standtler, Stoddert, Sutherland, Wm. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thomson, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Van Houten, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Wayne, Webster, Whalon—117.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Heman Allen, J. J. Allen, C. Allen, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Baylies, Beatty, James M. Bell, Binney, Briggs, Bull, Burd, Burges, Cagle, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Choate, Claiborne, Wm. Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Corwin, Conner, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Warren R. Davis, Amos Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Deming, Denny, Dennis, Dickson, Duncan, Ellsworth, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Fillmore, Foot, Foster, P. C. Fuller, Fulton, Gholson, Gordon, Graham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, James Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, Jabez W. Huntington, Jackson, W. C. Johnson, King, Lay, Lincoln, Martindale, Marshall, McComas, McDuffie, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Moore, Pinckney, Potts, Ramsay, Reed, Rencher, Selden, William B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Wm. Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Stewart, Wm. P. Taylor, P. Thomas, Tompkins, Turner, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmough, E. D. White, Frederick Whittlesey, Elisha Whittlesey, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Young—105.

So this resolution also was agreed to.

The question was then put on agreeing to the fourth and last resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That, for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as practicable, the cause of the commercial embarrassment and distress complained of by numerous citizens of the United States, in sundry memorials which have been presented to congress at the present session, and of inquiring whether the charter of the bank of the United States has been violated, and also what corruptions and abuses have existed in its management; whether it has used its corporate power, or money to control the press, to interfere in politics, or influence elections, and whether it has had any agency through its management or money, in producing the existing pressure, a select committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the said bank, who shall report whether the provisions of the charter have been violated or not, and also what abuses, corruptions or malpractices have existed in the management of said bank, and that the said committee be authorised to send for persons and papers, and to summon and examine witnesses on oath, and to examine into the affairs of the bank and branches; and they are further authorised to visit the principal bank, or any of its branches, for the purpose of inspecting the books, correspondence, accounts and other papers connected with its management or business; and that the said committee be required to report the result of such investigation, together with the evidence they may take, at as early a day as practicable."

And determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Wm. Allen, Archer, Ashley, Barringer, Baylies, Beale, Beau, Beardsley, Beaumont, John Bell, James M. Bell, Blair, Boeke, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Brown, Bunch, Burges, Bynum, Cagle, Campbell, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chancy, Chinn, Claiborne, Samuel Clark, William Clark, Clay, Clowney, Coffee, Conner, Corwin, Coulter, Craner, Warren R. Davis, Davenport, Day, Deberry, Deming, Dennis, Dickerson, Dickson, Duncan, Dunlap, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Fillmore, Forester, Foster, Fowler, Philo C. Fuller, Wm. K. Fuller, Fulton, Galbraith, Gholson, Gillet, Gordon, Graham, Grayson, Grennell, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Thomas H. Hall, Halsey, Hamer, Hannegan, Hardin, Joseph M. Harper, James Harper, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Hawes, Henderson, Howell, Hubbard, Abel Huntington, Inge, Jackson, Jarvis, Wm. Cost Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Noadiah Johnson, Cave Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kavanagh, King, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Thomas Lee, Leavitt, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Lytle, Abijah Mann, Joel K. Mann, Martindale, Mardis, John Y. Mason, Moses Mason, McCarty, McComas, McIntire, McKay, McKinley, McLene, McVean, Miller H. Mitchell, R. Mitchell, Moore, Muhlenberg, Osgood, Page, Parks, Parker, Patterson, D. J. Pearce, Peyton, Franklin Pierce, Pierson, Plummer, Polk, Pope, Ramsay, Rencher, Schenck, Schley, Selden, Augustus H. Shepperd, Shinn, William Slade, Chas. Slade, Sloane, Smith, Spangler, Speight, Standtler, Stewart, Stoddert, Sutherland, William Taylor, Wm. P. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philemon Thomas, Thomson, Turner, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Vinton, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Wane, Webster, Whalon, Frederick Whittlesey, Elisha Whittlesey, Wilde, Wilson—171.

NAYS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Chilton Allan, Anthony, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Beatty, Binney, Burd, Chambers, Chilton, Choate, Clayton, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, A. Davis, Denny, Dickson, Evans, Edward Everett, Gilmer, Hard, Hazeltine, Henderson, Lincoln, Marshall, McDuffie, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Murphy, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, William B. Shepard, Tompkins, Tweedy, Vance, Watmough, Williams, Young—42.

So this resolution was agreed to.

And it was agreed that the committee to be appointed in pursuance of this last resolution, should consist of seven members, (who are of course appointed by the speaker.)
 [The committee above authorized, consists of Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, Mr. Everett, of Massachusetts, Mr. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, Mr. Mann, of New York, and Mr. Lytle, of Ohio.]
 Mr. Wilde asked consent to offer a 5th resolution, declaring the reasons offered by the secretary insufficient and unsatisfactory.

Objection being made, he moved to suspend the rules.
 The house, on the motion of Mr. Polk, at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 7 o'clock, adjourned to Monday.

ANALYSIS OF THE VOTES.

[For that on the previous question we are indebted to the National Intelligencer—that part against the restoration of the deposits is our own; as well as the classification of the members by their several states; which is added:—]

Monday, April 7. Mr. Burges said he held in his hand a memorial from the county of Bristol, Rhode Island, accompanied by a letter which he wished to have read.

The chair said it could only be done by unanimous consent. Mr. Chilton objected to the reading of the letter.

Mr. Burges then made some remarks as to the respectability of the memorialists; when the memorial was read and laid on the table.

Mr. Burges then moved that a certain letter, or letters, read on the last petition day by his colleague, and which had been withdrawn from the files of the house, might be restored thereto.

The chair stated that this motion could only be received by unanimous consent, and doubted if it would be in order then, as the house had no power over the paper in question, it being a private letter.

Objection being made, and the motion requiring unanimity, was not received.

Mr. Pearce presented resolutions adopted at Providence and North Providence, R. Island; read and laid on the table. He also wished to present two communications addressed to himself on the subject of the deposits.

Objection being made to their reception, Mr. P. moved to suspend the rule; which motion was negatived.

Memorials, &c. in favor of the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented by Mr. Allen, of Vt. from the inhabitants of the county of Chittenden, in that state; by Mr. Slade, of Vt. from inhabitants of the county of Rutland, Vt.; by Mr. Selden, from 88 of the mechanics of Troy, N. York; by the same from 2,800 citizens of Albany, N. Y.; by Mr. Filmore, (a spirited remonstrance from the young men of Troy; by Mr. McKennan, from inhabitants of Washington county, Pa.; by Mr. Darlington, from 2,530 inhabitants of Delaware county, Pa.; by Mr. Henderson, from 600 citizens of Belfont, Centre county, Pa.; by Mr. Anthony, from 100 citizens of Mancy, Lycoming county, Pa.; by Mr. Potts, 23 memorials signed by 1,600 citizens of Chester county, Pa.; by Mr. Miller, from a large meeting of citizens of Adams county, Pa.; by Mr. Barnitz, the proceedings of a meeting at West Manchester, York county, Pa.; by Mr. F. Thomas, from the Washington county bank, and three banks in Frederick county, Md.; by Mr. Stoddert, from 800 voters of Prince George's county, Md.; by Mr. Turner, of Md. from 328 citizens of his district; by Mr. Wise, from inhabitants of James City, Va.; by Mr. Williams, of N. C. two memorials from his district; by Mr. Allen, of Ky. from the citizens of Lexington and Fayette county in that state; by Mr. Chilton, of Ky. from citizens of his district; by Mr. Mitchell, of Ohio, from citizens of his district; by Mr. Leavitt, from 2,000 persons of Harrison county, Ohio; by Mr. Spangler, from inhabitants of Tuscarawas county, Ohio; by Mr. Corwin, from citizens of Warren county, Ohio; by Mr. Dickerson, from a meeting of inhabitants of the village of Clinton, N. Jersey; by Mr. Hall, of N. C. from inhabitants of Beaufort county, in that state; all which were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Binney presented a memorial from the select and common council of the city of Philadelphia, stating the effect of the course pursued in relation to the currency, especially on the property held by them in trust for the benefit of the city, and praying for a recharter of the bank.

Memorials, &c. approving of the removal of the deposits, &c. were presented by Mr. Pierson, from certain citizens of Troy, N. York; by Mr. Beardsley, from 600 citizens of Utica; by Mr. Dickerson, from Paterson, N. J.; by Mr. Muhlenberg, (several memorials, some in German and others in English) from 5,480 inhabitants of Berks county, Pa.; by Mr. Sutherland, from a meeting in Delaware county, Pa.; by the same from certain citizens of Blackley, Pa.; by the same from the democratic Jackson association of Southwark; by the same from 3,179 voters of the third congressional district; by Mr. Wagener, from inhabitants of Northampton county, Pa.; by Mr. Anthony, of Pa. from 1,118 citizens of Northampton county, Pa.; by Mr. Galbroth, from the town of Franklin, Venango county, Pa.; by Mr. Beale, of Va. from certain citizens of that state belonging to the state rights party; by Mr. Bynum, of N. C. from citizens of Halifax county, in that state; by Mr. Leavitt, from inhabitants of Jefferson county, Ohio; by the same from inhabitants of Harrison county, Ohio; by Mr. Pearce, from citizens of Pawtucket village, R. Island; by Mr. Lansing, from inhabitants of Albany, N. York; by Mr. Dickerson, from inhabitants of Essex county, N. Jersey; by Mr. Hall, of N. C. from citizens of Edgecombe county, in that state; all which were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Doon asked leave to offer a resolution, fixing a day for the adjournment of congress. Objections being made, he moved to suspend the rule, but, in consequence of numerous remonstrances all around him, he immediately withdrew the motion.

Mr. Ewing sent certain papers to the clerk's table containing programmes, drafts and outlines for the establishment of a national currency, which he wished to have printed, and observed, that, if the house would hear him on the subject, he would promise to occupy not more than an hour. The speaker said these papers could not be presented but by unanimous consent. Loud objections being made to the leave, Mr. Ewing withdrew his motion.

The whole of the residue of the day was taken up in the presentation of memorials and petitions, generally of a private or local character. The house adjourned.

Tuesday, April 8. Various bills for the relief of private individuals were reported, twice read and committed.

Mr. R. M. Johnson submitted a resolution which was agreed to, directing the secretary of war to cause a revision of the system of army tactics to be made, and reported to the next session of congress.

The resolution of Mr. Mardis on the deposit question coming up,

Mr. Corwin, of Ohio, resumed the floor, and continued his speech until the expiration of the hour—when

The house took up the commutation bill as in committee of the whole.

Mr. Cramer resumed his remarks, and having concluded his speech,

Mr. Crane obtained the floor, but yielded it at the suggestion of Mr. Polk, when the house, on motion of the latter gentleman, took up the general appropriation bill.

The bill was read by sections, and, after various proceedings—

Mr. Vance, of Ohio, asked leave to have an amendment printed, which he proposed at the proper time, to offer, in committee of the whole, in connection with the appropriation bill, which had been under consideration to-day.

Objection being made, the reading of the amendment was called for. It proposes that from and after the passage of this act, instead of the compensation now allowed by law, there shall be paid to the within named officers the following sums per annum:

“To each of the secretaries, of state, treasury, war and navy, four thousand dollars. To the postmaster general, three thousand five hundred dollars. To each assistant postmaster general, eighteen hundred dollars. To each of the controllers of the treasury, two thousand dollars. To each of the auditors of the treasury, two thousand dollars. To the solicitor of the treasury, two thousand dollars. To the register of the treasury, two thousand dollars. To the treasurer, two thousand dollars. To the commissioner of Indian affairs, two thousand dollars. To the commissioner of the general land office, two thousand dollars.”

It provides also, for a reduction of thirty-three and one-third per centum per annum from each of the following officers, viz: from all officers of the customs; from all officers connected with the system of the public lands, either as surveyors general, registers, receivers or clerks; from all the clerks in the general post office, deputy postmasters, their assistants and clerks; and from all persons connected with the Indian department as superintendents, agents, sub agents, interpreters, agents for removals, commissioners, or in whatever other manner employed. It also proposes to reduce the per diem of members of congress to $6 instead of $8, and a like reduction on their travelling allowance to and from the seat of government, and it provides after the expiration of the present presidential term, the salary of the president of the United States shall be $15,000 instead of $25,000 as now allowed.

Mr. Vance now moved for the suspension of the rule, so as to allow him to make a motion to have his amendment printed. On which question,

Mr. Crane demanded the yeas and nays.

They were ordered and taken, and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, William Allen, Archer, Barber, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Beatty, Binney, Bouldin, Briggs, Bull, Burd, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chilton, William Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Coulter, Crane, Crockett, Davenport, Deberry, Deming, Denny, Dennis, Duncan, Ellsworth, Evans, Edward Everett, H. Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Foot, Philo C. Fuller, Fulton, Gholson, Gilmer, Gorham, Graham, Grayson, Greenell, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Jos. M. Harper, James Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, Heister, Jabez W. Huntington, Jackson, William C. Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kimnard, Lane, Lay, Leavitt, Lincoln, Lytle, Martindale, Marshall, McCarty, McKennan, McVean, Mercer, Milligan, Robert Mitchell, Moore, Patterson, Pinckney, Potts, Ramsay, Reed, Selden, W. B. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, William Slade, Charles Slade, Sloane, Spangler, William P. Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Turner, Tweedy, Vance, Van Houten, Vinton, Watmough, Whalon, Edward D. White, Fred. Whitlsey, Elisha Whitlsey, Wilde, Williams, Wise, Young—105.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Adams, Anthony, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, John Bell, Boeckie, Bodie, Brown, Bunch, Bynum, Cage, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Chinn, Sml. Clark, Clay, Coffey, Day, W. C. Fuller, Gillet, J. Hill, Halsey, Harnegan, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Henderson, Howell, Abel Huntington, Jarvis, R. M. Johnson, Noadiah Johnson, Kavanaugh, King, Lansing, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Loyal, Abijah Mann, Joel K. Mann, Mardis, Moses Mason, McIntire, McKinley, McLene, Miller, Osgood, Page, Parker, D. J. Pearce, Peyton, Franklin Pearce, Polk, Selley, Smith, Speight, Standifer, Stoddert, Sutherland, Francis Thomas, Philemon Thomas, Turrill, Wagener, Wayne—67.

There being not two-thirds in favor of suspending the rule, as moved, the motion of Mr. Vance, to print the amendment, was overruled. The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, April 9. The resolution submitted yesterday, calling upon the secretary of war for a detailed estimate for the repairs of the Cumberland road, east of the Ohio river, was taken up and agreed to.

The resolution of Mr. Mardis relative to the deposits was taken up, when

Mr. Corwin resumed and continued his remarks till the expiration of the hour.

On motion of Mr. Polk, the house went into committee of the whole on the general appropriation bill.

Mr. J. Q. Adams moved to amend the bill so as to strike out that item in the bill which went to allow $1,400 for the salary of a clerk in the office of the department of state, for one year, to arrange and index certain papers; whereupon a long and animated debate arose, and, after a verbal amendment being offered to the item in the bill, by Mr. Binney, the amendment of Mr. Adams prevailed by a vote of ayes 89 nays 70; so the appropriation was stricken out.

Thereupon the committee, rose, and reported progress. And the house at 5 o'clock adjourned.

Thursday, April 10. Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Corwin, who is entitled to the floor, the resolution of Mr. Mardis, relative to the deposits, was laid over until to-morrow.

At the suggestion of Mr. Whitlsey, of Ohio, the house agreed to take up snell resolutions as had been long lying on the speaker's table, as would not elicit debate.

They were accordingly taken up, and seventy or eighty of them agreed to.

[Among those laid over were the following, moved this day by Mr. Davis, of South Carolina:

Resolved, That the powers of the executive department of the federal government have increased beyond the authority of the constitution.

Resolved, That the powers of the executive department of the federal government have increased, are increasing, and ought to be diminished.

Resolved, That the patronage of the president of the United States has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.]

At one o'clock, the house, on motion of Mr. Polk, took up the general appropriation bill, as in committee of the whole.

When Mr. Vance moved an amendment (the same, in substance, as heretofore published, but with some variations, limiting the reduction of clerk's salaries to twenty-five per cent. &c. &c.) proposing a reduction in the salaries of all the officers of government. The debate on this amendment occupied the committee till past 4 o'clock, when they had only got as far in this list of officers as the office of the commissioner of the department of Indian affairs. The question was taken separately on the salary of each officer, and the reduction on each successively negatived, as far as the committee of the whole proceeded with them. The committee then rose, and the house adjourned.

INSTRUCTION TO MR. McKIM.

To the voters of the fifth congressional district of Maryland.

The delegates appointed by the first five wards of the city of Baltimore, the county of Anne Arundel and the city of Annapolis, to proceed to the city of Washington, and present certain instructions to the hon. Isaac McKim, our representative in congress—respectfully beg leave to report:

That they assembled at the city of Washington on Tuesday, the 1st April, organized their body by calling Charles Carroll, of Anne Arundel, to the chair, and according to arrangement, waited upon Mr. McKim on Thursday, 3d April, at 12 o'clock, when the following letter was read by the chairman and then presented to him:

Washington city, Gadsby's hotel, 3d April, 1834.

SIR: The undersigned, deeply impressed with the conviction that the distress which now pervades our country, has been produced by the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States, and the attitude assumed by the executive with regard to that question, look to congress alone for relief from the evils which this ill advised measure has brought upon the country.

In order that our representative in congress should be apprised of the real wishes of his constituents, and feeling assured that he will not hesitate to conform to those wishes to their fullest extent, when properly made acquainted with them—we beg leave to inform you, that meetings have been held in various sections of the 5th congressional district of Maryland, and that resolutions have been adopted at those meetings, and signed by a large majority of your constituents.

The undersigned were appointed a delegation to proceed to Washington to communicate to you this fact. In obedience to their instructions, they have now the honor to present to you the resolutions as passed at those meetings, with the accompanying signatures.

Annexed is an official statement* of the number of votes taken at the last congressional election in the 5th district, on examination of which, it will be found that there were 6,001 votes taken at that election.

The resolutions which the undersigned have now the honor to hand to you have been signed by 3,717 voters, all of whom we firmly believe to be legal voters in their respective districts, showing a majority of 715 [1,433] votes.

From the anxiety which your constituents feel to know your determination on this important subject, the undersigned will conclude this communication by remarking that they will be most happy to hear from you at your earliest convenience. We are, very respectfully, your most obedient servants.

CHARLES CARROLL, chairman.

THOMAS HODGES,
BENJAMIN WATKINS,
CHAS. S. W. DORSEY,
GEORGE HOWARD,
THOMAS S. HERBERT,
THOMAS DUCKETT,
JOSEPH H. NICHOLSON,

Delegation from the first 5 wards of the city of Baltimore.

Delegation from Anne Arundel county and the city of Annapolis.

To which Mr. McKim made the following reply:

Mr. Chairman: I beg leave to state to the delegation that I fully acknowledge the right of instruction by the majority, when that majority can be well ascertained.

The papers now left with me by the delegation, shall receive a most careful and attentive consideration, as the subject most justly demands, and I shall try, to the best of my ability, to come to a just and correct decision thereon.

ISAAC MCKIM.

The delegation having thus committed the subject of the resolutions to the representative of the district, consider their duties closed; and they cannot but hope that so authentic a manifestation of the wishes of his constituents will not be without its proper influence, while they believe that the example which this proceeding has afforded to the country, may be beneficially followed in the other districts of the state.

☞ Signed as above.

BANK OF MARYLAND.

The following correspondence has been published in the daily papers: Baltimore, April 2d, 1834.

To R. W. Gill, Jacob Albert, Alexander Fridge, esq's.

GENTLEMEN—The report of the committee of fifteen, which appears in the papers of this morning, in relation to the concerns of the bank of Maryland, seems, not only in my own opinion, but in the opinion of friends in whose judgment I confide, to be calculated to convey the impression that I had not cheerfully acceded to each of the propositions made to me by the committee that were finally thought by them to be just in relation to the trustees, or at all material to the interests of the creditors.

As both my verbal and written communications in the whole of this affair were with you as the organs of the committee, you will, I am sure, do me the justice to state in reply to this note, whether I have not throughout the entire negotiation, not only willingly consented but desired that the trust should be

*Note by the editor of the Register—Here are added the certificates of the clerk of the executive council showing the following results of the election held in October last—

	McKim.	Stewart.
Anne Arundel county.....	1,132	1,114
5 wards Baltimore.....	2,049	1,678
	3,181	2,792

So it appears that 28 votes were, in the whole, without the name of either gentleman for congress. Mr. McKim's majority 289.

{To make the matter plain we add the following note which appears in the Baltimore Chronicle of Monday last.

The worthy gentlemen who presented the instruction of the voters of the 5th congressional district to Mr. McKim, made a great mistake in the use of the word "majority."

They say that the whole number of votes taken at the last election was 6,001—and that 3,717 voters have signed the instruction. Then—

From the whole number of votes	6,001
Deduct the number of the signers	3,717
And there is left	2,284
which deducted from 3,717 leaves a majority of 1,433—one thousand four hundred and thirty-three.

If one be taken from one side and added to the other, it does not change the "plurality," but gives two to the majority.

placed as well in relation to the number of trustees to be associated with me, the mode of their appointment, and the manner of executing the trust, precisely upon the footing which the committee have ultimately recommended.

You will further oblige me, by stating, what I understand to be the fact, if in our acceptance of the trust, as proposed to be regulated by the committee, there was any material difference of opinion between my co-trustee, J. B. Morris, esq. and myself, when we were called upon prior to the final arrangement, to express our determination upon the subject.

The acceptance of the third trustee, R. W. Gill, esq. having been given after all the conditions of the trust had been agreed upon, is of course evidence of his entire acquiescence in their propriety. Very respectfully. THO: ELLICOTT.

Baltimore, April 2d, 1834.

SIR—Your letter of this date, addressed to Messrs. Gill, Fridge and Albert, has been laid before the committee by those gentlemen, who beg leave in reply to state, that having again carefully examined the report, we cannot discover any ground for the impression it seems to have made upon you and the friends you have consulted. A recurrence to the correspondence which has taken place on this subject will show that it could not have been the intention of the committee that any such impressions should be made. If desired by you, that correspondence shall be published.

It is proper in explanation to say, that the propositions to which you alluded came originally from yourself—that which related to the appointment of additional trustees, was acceded to by the committee—the others were modified. By order of the committee of fifteen, I am respectfully,

ALEX<sup>R</sup> FRIDGE, chairman, pro tem.
CHARLES C. HARPER, secretary.

To the creditors of the bank of Maryland.

The original deeds executed by the president and directors of the bank of Maryland to Thomas Ellicott, provided, that he, in the entire execution of the trust created thereby, should act under the advice and direction of the honorable Stevenson Archer and Thomas B. Dorsey, and in case they declined to act, then under the advice and direction of such other person or persons as they might name. Those gentlemen having declined acting, appointed Reverdy Johnson and John V. L. McMahon, esquires, as the advisers and directors of said trust. In conformity with the resolutions agreed upon by the general committee of the creditors, and Thomas Ellicott, and by the direction of the said advisers of the trustees, a deed of assignment from Thomas Ellicott, and the president and directors of the bank of Maryland, uniting John B. Morris and Richard W. Gill, as trustees with the said Thomas Ellicott, according to the conditions of the original deed of trust, was executed and delivered to the subscribers upon the 5th April, instant, who were thus properly authorized to proceed with the affairs of the said trust.

The trustees have directed a statement of the condition of the bank to be prepared for the information of the creditors as speedily as practicable, which, when ready, will be submitted to them.

Persons interested, will please take notice, that in relation to notes and drafts, not yet due, deposited with the bank of Maryland, merely for collection, by parties not indebted nor liable to the bank, and over which the bank has no right or control, other than as agent, the trustees do not consider that such notes or drafts passed to them by the assignment. Applications for such notes and drafts will be made to the cashier of the bank.

It is proper also to notify the debtors and creditors of the bank, that we are instructed by the advisers and directors of the trust, that the debtors of the bank are under the circumstances attending the creation of this trust, and by the statute laws of Maryland, privileged to discharge their debts with the notes of the bank, certificates of deposit issued by it, or the open accounts due by it, and that, without regard to the period at which such debtors may have become the proprietors of such notes, certificates or accounts, or the value they may have paid for them. This instruction is in answer to an inquiry made by the trustees for their government, and it is their intention to follow it.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

As we cannot publish, at length, the debate in the senate, on the 29th ult. on the concerns of the post office department, we copy the following abstract from the "Alexandria Gazette"—

Mr. Leigh said, referring to the statement made in the Blue Book with regard to extra allowances to contractors—

"The contract prices of each and all are stated, and under them the extra allowances (where there are any) are set down, and indicated by an asterism. I began my examination of this list of mail contractors with the state of Maine, and having heard a good deal of conversation since I came here on the subject of these extra allowances, I was greatly surprised to see how few of those states were in Maine, and in the other New England states, and how small was the amount of the extra allowances in that part of the union. The number of them, however, begins to increase in New York, and thence, gradually, till the mail routes cross the Potomac. Getting to Virginia, I found such a number of asterisms as quite astonished me—there is a perfect galaxy, a milky way, illuminating the mail routes through that state. In a single page (page 250), I find, among others, the following: Alex. Patterson, $2,300 contract price, $2,300 extra allowance; Peck & Wolford, $5,231 contract price, $6,557 extra allowance; E. Porter & Co. $25,436 contract price, $38,232 extra allowance; D. A. & O. Saltmarsh, $8,000 contract price, $4,913 extra allowance; Wm. Smith (who lives in the county of Culpeper, from which this memorial comes), and if reports say true, takes a busy part in politics there) $10,897 68 contract price, $9,550 extra allowance; and J. N. C. Stockton, $3,155 contract price, and $7,610 extra allowance.

These extra allowances, in that single page, (to which my attention was attracted by the light of those ominous stars), amount in the aggregate, to $59,162, while the aggregate of the contract prices is but $60,709.

Mr. Clayton said, referring to a report which had been made from the post office department—

"I glanced my eye over it, and found among other things there, by the help of a friend, that the statements of the most extravagant of the extra allowances had, in some thirty or forty instances, undergone erasure; and although the operation had been most delicately performed, it was on investigation ascertained that the name of the person who really made the allowances (William T. Barry, namely) had been scratched out, and that of an assistant postmaster general under Mr. McLean's administration substituted for it. It appeared also that the report entirely evaded and omitted to answer this call expressly made for the additional services of contractors. The man most injured by the misstatement of this official report, applied to the senate for redress, and the senate did, by a unanimous vote, rescind the order for printing the document, on the ground that a report, thus discredited in so many instances was creditable in none. Yet we are now, by the burning of the treasury buildings, deprived of all other statements than those coming from the same sources from which this document proceeded."

Mr. Ewing said: "It is now 3 or 4 weeks since we called on the treasury department for information respecting mail contracts and extra allowances, which, by law, are to be deposited there within a short time after they shall have been made. It was not until last evening that any information was given us on that subject, and we were then informed that the papers relating to that subject had been nearly all consumed, and, among those that remained, no extra allowances appeared to have been reported. The clerk who gave the information, for it was merely verbal, stated, also, that those allowances appear only in pencil marks in the books, or on the copies of the contracts in the post office department. This, sir, is truly a most startling fact. Those extra allowances appear on the Blue Book to the amount of nearly four hundred thousand dollars; have been made by that department which is rendered insolvent by the waste and extravagance of those who control it, and they have avoided the only check which the law imposes upon them, by neglecting to report to the treasury department; and the whole matter stands in pencil marks only on them, in a situation to be altered or obliterated, as may best suit the views of those who have access to them."

In any other age of the republic, how such facts as these would have startled and aroused every man in the country! Will the people suffer such conduct now? Are they prepared to countenance corruption and abuse so monstrous, gross and palpable?

LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

From the Harrisburgh Intelligencer, of April 3.

Substance of the remarks of Mr. Dunlop, delivered on Tuesday in the house of representatives, upon the resolution of the judiciary committee, "that the speaker issue a warrant to bring James Lesley, esq. before the house to answer for a contempt, for refusal to answer, (before the committee appointed to investigate the expenditures on the canal), the question:

"Do you know whether any engineer, superintendent, supervisor, or any other person or persons holding appointments under them, have been, or are now interested in contracts, on any of the public works, or whether any of the public moneys have been used by any of the public agents now in office, for purposes other than those authorized by law?"

Mr. Dunlop said, that the house had certain express powers relating to powers of investigation of matters of fact—and certain implied powers necessary to carry those powers into successful operation. That the house has power of impeachment, and of voting for the removal of judges, for instance. That these express powers imply the power of examination and enforcing the disclosure of facts relating to the subject or matter. But he said he could not assent to the doctrine that the house have the implied power to enforce the disclosure of facts and discovery of papers by force, the purpose of procuring information upon any and every subject. That the right of enforcing disclosure of facts and discovery of papers by force could not legally be carried beyond the execution of the express powers of investigation as in case of impeachment. But that the house could not enforce the disclosure of facts to enlighten their minds on subjects of a merely legislative nature. That he could not consent to the doctrine of his colleague that the powers of the house to punish for contempt extended, for instance, to the offer of a bribe to a member in his chamber—but that the necessarily implied powers of the house to arrest for contempt, ought not to be extended beyond the protection of themselves whilst actually acting or about to act as a legislative body and the prosecution of the powers expressly confided to them by the constitution.

With regard to the particular case before the house he argued that the house ought not to issue the warrant to arrest Mr. Lesley on the ground of his being in contempt as he Mr. L. was not bound to answer the question put in the committee, in as much as it was too broad in its terms. That as the committee reported the case to the house, the house ought not to hold Mr. Lesley in contempt, unless, (if the investigation was before the house), he would be bound to answer. That he thought the committee might as well have asked, do you know any scoundrels in Pennsylvania? If you do please state who they are and why you think so. That though the 11th section of the resolution ordering the inquiry, was as general as the question, it did not follow that the committee could put all sorts of questions to a witness, not directed to a particular malpractice or the misconduct of a particular individual.

He concluded his remarks by offering a resolution, that the question propounded to James Lesley, esq. by the committee, appointed, &c. is too general in its terms to justify the house in issuing a warrant to bring him before the house for contempt.

From the same, same date.

☞ Nearly all day yesterday was taken up in debating a resolution of the judiciary committee, in the house of representatives, that the sergeant-at-arms take into custody James Lesley, esq. and bring him before the bar of the house to answer for a contempt of the house in refusing to answer a question put to him by the committee appointed to investigate the conduct of the public agents in the disbursement of money on the public works. Mr. Lesley refused to disclose private and confidential correspondence solicited by himself, after stating that the facts to be disclosed would in no manner criminate himself. [The resolution was passed—67 yeas, 17 nays.]

☞ This morning, (April 3), James Lesley, esq. was brought to the bar of the house by the sergeant-at-arms. Mr. Laeock read a case in congress, of a publisher of a paper that refused in 1812 to testify before the committee of foreign relations. Mr. Alexander moved that the question which Mr. Lesley refused to answer before the committee, be now put to him by the speaker, which after the reading, the report of the committee, was agreed to. Mr. Lesley then stood up and the speaker asked him the question. Mr. Lesley replied in substance that he had every respect for the house, but that he had divulged every thing which he could as a man of honor. Mr. Lesley was then recommitted to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms. Mr. Alexander then offered the following resolution:

Whereas, James Lesley having been brought before the house of representatives, by the sergeant-at-arms, on a warrant issued against him for a contempt, and it appearing from the testimony offered and accepted, to sustain the charge against him, and from his answer before the house, that there was no intention on his part to resist the due execution of the laws; but, that he was actuated solely by a principle of honor, magnanimous in its conception, yet mistaken in abstract legal contemplation. And, as the majesty of the laws, and the dignity of the house of representatives, have been fully vindicated and sustained; Therefore Resolved, That the said James Lesley be forthwith discharged from custody.

After considerable debate, in which Messrs. Alexander, Holcomb, Walker, Crawford, of Franklin, Stevens, Laeock and Keating took part, the resolution was postponed, and Mr. Lesley was again brought before the house, when he again refused to testify, but stated that nothing that he could state would implicate the canal commissioners. He was again committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, and the resolution of Mr. Alexander to discharge him, was again taken up.

The debate on the resolution was continued by Messrs. Alexander, Laeock, Thompson, Holcomb, McCreery, Barclay, Wallace, Dunlop, Crawford, of Franklin and Kerr, of Butler, to a late hour, when it was negatived, the vote being yeas 19, nays 69.

So Mr. Lesley, is still in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, [Mr. L. remained in custody at the date of our last account, Ed. Res.]

LEGISLATURE OF NEW YORK.

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

[Report made to the assembly, March 31.]

Mr. Morris, from the joint committee of the two houses, to whom was referred the special message of the governor, of the 24th March, 1854, reported:

That they have given to the subject all the consideration which its importance demands, and that their deliberations have resulted in an unanimous assent to the propriety of the measure, which the governor has recommended to the legislature. They have prepared a bill accordingly; but before they proceed to submit the details of the plan on which they have united, they deem it due to the occasion to advert to the circumstances which render its adoption expedient, and to the relation in which the state of New York has for several years stood to the great question of rechartering the bank of the United States.

The right of congress, under the constitution of the U. States, to incorporate such an institution, has uniformly been denied by many of our citizens; while others, who supposed that such a right, though not given in terms, might be drawn by implication from express grants of power, became at an early day alarmed at the influence which the bank had acquired by its control over the moneyed institutions of the states, and by gaining over to its service many individuals of distinguished talents, who had uniformly been hostile to it. All saw in these indications of strength, a danger that it might be perverted to the accomplishment of objects altogether inconsistent with that freedom of opinion, on which the durability of our political institutions essentially depends. An apprehension on the one hand, of a concentration of power dangerous to the government and the people; and on the other, a deliberate conviction of the unconstitutionality of the bank, led, in the year 1831, to an expression on the part of the legislature of this state, adverse to the renewal of its charter. Since that time, the electors of this state have repeatedly evinced their strong repugnance to it, notwithstanding the efforts of that institution to bring about a change in its favor, by purchasing presses and attempting to corrupt the fountains of public opinion. But the firmness with which all these efforts have been resisted by the great body of the people, has fully demonstrated the existence of a deep-rooted conviction on their part, that it ought not to be continued beyond the period for which it is chartered.

In pursuance of the design referred to on the part of the bank, to produce a change of opinion in its favor, its accommodations were extended throughout the union, from about forty-two to seventy millions of dollars, between December, 1830, and May, 1832. In this expansion of its loans, our own citizens largely participated; and the unnatural impulse which it gave to business and the spirit of commercial enterprise, has made the subsequent contraction of the operations of the bank, more embarrassing and disastrous in its consequences.

Unsuccessful in its attempts to control public opinion, by appeals to the pecuniary interests of the people, the bank immediately commenced a system of curtailment; and there is abundant reason to believe that it was the result of a deliberate plan to create wide-spread embarrassment and suffering, for the purpose of extorting from the wants and fears of the community an expression which it had failed to obtain by the extension of its favors. There is equal reason to believe that the principal effects of the contraction referred to, have been made to fall upon the citizens of this state: an object by no means difficult to accomplish, as the commercial operations of the union have centered for many years in the city of New York. And although the statements of the branch in that city exhibit no diminution of the amount of its discounts, it is nevertheless well understood that the bank, while it has refused to the city merchants the usual accommodations in collecting the debts due them from other states, has, by the purchase of domestic exchange on N. York, through its southern and western branches, availed itself of their indebtedness, for the purpose of visiting upon them the distress and alarm on which it founded its hopes of coercing the people into a renewal of its charter.

It is conceded on all hands, that the condition of this state would have been one of extraordinary prosperity, but for the embarrassments which have grown out of the operations of the bank. That the payment of duties in cash, by withdrawing a large amount of credits, which were equivalent to capital in the business of the merchants, has contributed to the prevailing difficulties, cannot be denied. But it is believed that this change of system might have been made without serious embarrassment, if the bank had not retrenched its accommodations at the same time, and by creating alarm, put an end to that interchange of confidence and credit, which is indispensable to the successful prosecution of commercial enterprises. The elements of our prosperity are undiminished: the state was never essentially more prosperous: the surplus production of the last season was almost unexampled; no foreign market has been closed against us; and until the presses in the service of the bank, and the public men who are advocating its recharter, proclaimed that the country was overwhelmed with embarrassment and suffering, our commerce and enterprise were pursuing their accustomed channels with activity and success.

That much of the existing pressure is the fruit of distrust, cannot be denied; but that any portion of this distrust is to be attributed, as the partisans of the bank assert, to the change made by the government in the places for depositing the public moneys, will not be a moment conceded. If the public moneys had been withdrawn from the commercial operations of the country, a corresponding retrenchment would have been the consequence. But it is difficult to conceive in what manner their transfer from one institution to another, having nearly the same local situation, and possessing similar means of extending accommodations to business men, could have produced the effects ascribed to it. The local banks, which received these moneys, have discounted upon them freely, and it is believed that they have been the principal means of sustaining the community against the evil consequences resulting from the contraction of the accommodations of the bank of the United States, which, from the period when its curtailments commenced, have been reduced about sixteen millions of dollars. That this contraction has been made in a capricious manner, and been carried to an unnecessary extent, can hardly be disputed: nor is it doubted that it might close all its concerns without producing embarrassment in the business affairs of the country, if it had not assumed an attitude of hostility to the local banks as well as to the decided expressions of public opinion. The former bank of the United States discontinued its operations without any material check to the public prosperity, although during the contest in congress for a recharter, the same scenes of panic and distress were enacted by its partisans. But the question of its recharter being disposed of, it submitted to its fate, and by means of the state banks, with which it had a friendly understanding, the transfer of its accommodations and business was made without difficulty or commotion.

It is not to be disguised that the state of New York is the peculiar object of hostility to the bank and its partisans. Although we hear of embarrassment and distress in other states, those evils are not depicted elsewhere with the same exaggerated features. Bill-holders have been urged to make demands of specie on the banks; unwearied attempts have been made to bring them into dispute, by declaring them to be on the verge of insolvency; and it has been their misfortune to incur the enmity of men distinguished for their talents in congress, while the moneyed institutions of other states have been almost entirely exempt from their animadversions. Rumors of the failure of particular institutions have been put in circulation simultaneously in different sections of the country; merchants of high standing have been made the subjects of similar impeachment; and no effort has been spared to produce panic and distress for the purpose of inducing the people of this state to take shelter from impending evils under the shadow of the bank of the United States. The credit and stability which our local institutions have derived from the safety fund system have enabled them successfully to resist that grasping monopoly; and we have no hesitation in saying that the attacks, which they have sustained, would, in the absence of the provisions of the safety fund act, have produced the most disastrous consequences. The objections which have been urged against them, by those who have manifested a greater willingness to assail than to understand the system, have been so satisfactorily answered by our senators and representatives in congress, that it is unnecessary for us to recapitulate either the aspersions or their refutation. We cannot, however, forbear to remark that if the annual contributions of one-half of one per cent. for six years only, for the purpose of creating a fund to secure bill-holders, is objected to, the objection is answered by the fact, that in other states the banks are required to contribute annually during the continuance of their charters a larger amount for the support of government; if the evils of a paper currency are pointed out as a source of apprehension, the answer is, that in other states the issues of paper exceed the amount to which our banks are restricted; if a concentration of power by means of the safety fund is feared, we answer, that the interest of each bank is concerned in confining the operations of all the others to their proper limits, and that at least two-thirds of the banks are controlled by individuals, who are politically opposed both to the administration of the state and the nation. Although it is announced that a more liberal policy has been adopted by the bank, it is well known that the arrangement is to be temporary in its duration. There is every reason to believe that the policy of curtailment will be resumed and pursued; and that the people have nothing to hope from the liberality of the bank but through the surrender of principles, which they have repeatedly asserted, and which we are satisfied they will never abandon. The people of this state have always been ready to make all necessary sacrifices of their interest for the public good; and we much mistake them if they do not meet, with a firm and unyielding resistance, every effort to coerce them into an abandonment of their honest opinions on the part of an institution, which has set the authority of the general government at defiance, which has declared that it held in its hand the existence of the state banks, and which has exhibited both the power and the disposition to inflict injury and suffering upon the community.

Experience teaches us that in this warfare upon us our reliance must be upon our own resources. Our banks stand firm, and they are better prepared for the prosecution of the contest than they were when it commenced. Many individuals, however, in our commercial cities, have yielded to the pressure; although the distress has been by no means so great as has been represented. The efforts to create a panic, which should result in the prostration of our moneyed institutions, have been fruitless; and if the business of our citizens were left to regulate itself, confidence would soon be restored. But how long the bank may allow their operations to continue undisturbed, cannot be foreseen; nor is it practicable to ascertain the precise amount of the liabilities of our citizens to that institution, when its operations are spread out through its numerous branches, and when the only avenue, through which any detailed information can be reached, is effectually closed up against the people by the rejection of the government directors. It is, however, stated that its total amount of loans on the 1st of March, inst. exceeded fifty four millions of dollars, of which it is believed seven millions at least, are due from the citizens of this state. It is in the power of that institution to call in a great portion of this amount in a short period; and it may also reach us by sudden curtailments in places having intimate commercial connections with the city of New York; and we should be wanting in prudence and foresight, when we recur to the past manifestations of its designs, if we were not to anticipate and guard against such an exercise of its power as its interest or ambition may dictate.

Other states have already taken such measures as were deemed necessary to protect their citizens both against the gradual withdrawal of its capital and its struggles to perpetuate itself. On our part, no extraordinary legislation would be necessary, if we were sure that its affairs would be closed in such a manner as the interest of the public and its stockholders requires. But when we consider the desperate efforts which it has made to procure a recharter, the assaults of its partisans upon the credit of the country, and the evils which it has visited upon the prosperity of this state, the committee deem it due to our citizens that some measure should be adopted to protect them from an arbitrary exercise of its power. The necessity of such a measure does not grow out of the condition of the banks, or any doubt on our part of their ability to withstand any assault which may be made on them. On the contrary, we are fully satisfied, from a careful examination of the returns of the banks to the commissioners on the 4th of March instant, which were exhibited to us at our request, that nothing but a series of unforeseen and extraordinary calamities could jeopard their safety. But in order to place themselves, as the committee now consider them, beyond the reach of the bank of the United States, they have been compelled to withhold from their customers the accommodations usually granted at this season of the year; and any further contraction of its operations by that institution, might compel them to curtail still farther and thus increase the existing pressure.

It is only under this view of the subject—for the purpose of affording to the business of the city its usual accommodations, and thus securing the country a market for its productions—that the committee feel it incumbent on them to recommend any measure of precaution. Such they understand to be the purport of the governor's message, and concurring, as they do, in the views presented by him, their attention has been directed solely to the object referred to.

In addition to the objections suggested by the governor to the project of a large bank, other considerations of force might be urged against it. But the committee limit themselves to the single remark, that, in their opinion, no such indispensable necessity exists as to warrant the legislature in hazarding the experiment.

The project of a loan upon the credit of the state, is not open to the same objections. It will be a mere pledge of the credit of the state, to the amount loaned, for the protection of its citizens against an unprovoked warfare upon their prosperity, and to enable them to sustain themselves in the effort which they are making, in common with the citizens of other states, to cast off a monopoly alike irresponsible and dangerous to our popular institutions. For the accomplishment of these great objects, affecting the interests of the whole union as well as our own, the committee conceive that we should be wanting in our duty, if we were to hesitate in resorting to the credit of the state as a means of protection, in case the necessity for its interposition should arise. It is, therefore, suggested that the authority to make the loan and issue the stock, be vested in a board of commissioners, composed partly of state officers, in whom the public have long reposed confidence, and partly of individuals known for their talents and integrity, to be appointed by the governor and senate, whose duty it will also be to determine when and to what extent the execution of the measure shall be demanded by the public exigencies. The committee are aware that such a discretion may be objected to: but they see no alternative but to confide it as they propose. Unless this be done, the legislature must either declare that the loan shall be made absolutely, or by refusing to act, leave their constituents at the mercy of an institution, from which they have nothing to expect on the score of justice or liberality.

The amount proposed to be loaned is $6,000,000, of which $4,000,000 is set apart for the city of New York, and $2,000,000 for the different counties of the state, excepting those in the first senate district. The commissioners are to be authorised to issue 5 per cent. state stock for this amount, redeemable at different periods, as they may think proper, but not exceeding 12 years in any case. It is proposed to loan the amount, set apart for the counties, through the agency of the loan officers, under the restrictions of the act authorising the loan of 1808; but the money is in no instance to be delivered to those officers until the board of supervisors of the county shall first determine that their citizens require it; and, as in the case of the loan of 1792, the county will be responsible for any deficiency of principal or interest in the payment of the sums loaned within it. These provisions, while they leave it to the several counties to decide whether the loan is necessary, will insure a certain return of the money to the treasury of the state, after having performed its office of guarding against the evils of factitious as well as real pressure.

It is proposed to loan the sum set apart for the first district, to the banks in the city of New York, which shall make application for it, and shall offer to the state such ample security for the payment of the interest and the reimbursement of the principal as shall be satisfactory to the commissioners; but no part of the sum is to be loaned to any bank, unless in the judgment of the board the public exigencies require it, and in no case is a loan to a bank to exceed one-half of its capital stock. Whenever a loan shall be made, the bank receiving it, should, in order to render it beneficial to the community, be authorised to discount upon it as capital; and in this manner it is believed that the necessities of business men will be much more effectually relieved than they could be by the intervention of loan officers. The execution of these arrangements will depend upon a concurrence of the banks and the commissioners; and the committee are assured that, in case of necessity, it would afford a relief, the effects of which would be felt throughout the state. The condition of the market in New York, necessarily affects every section of the state; for it is in that city that all our commercial operations centre. The abundance or scarcity of money there, fixes the prices of all the productions of the interior; and upon the ability of the merchant to make purchases, will depend the reward which the farmer, the mechanic and the manufacturer receive for the fruits of their industry. Thus are all classes of our citizens, and all sections of the state, linked together by common ties of interest, which can neither be broken nor relaxed without general embarrassment and suffering. It is by the pressure of the bank of the United States upon the money market of the city, that the distress which is felt in some of the interior counties, has been produced; and it is for the purpose of alleviating it, and guarding against its recurrence, that the proposed loan is set apart to sustain the prosperity of the city; indispensable as it is to the successful employment of the wealth, enterprise and industry of the whole state.

Such are the general features of the relief proposed by the bill, which the committee ask leave to introduce. They are aware that the measure is of no ordinary character, but at the same time it is not without precedent. In 1786, when the country had passed through a long and sanguinary struggle for independence, and had come out of that contest with its commercial confidence impaired, and its citizens embarrassed by the pressure of pecuniary distress, the legislature of this state interposed its credit and loaned to the counties the sum of five hundred thousand dollars. In 1808, when the commerce of the country had been suspended by measures of restriction, indispensable to its preservation, the legislature authorised the fiscal officer of the government to borrow the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, and to loan it to the citizens of the state. In each of these cases, immediate and effectual relief from a temporary pressure was afforded. Then as now, the state was called on by a regard to the welfare and prosperity of its citizens, to put forth its credit for their support. And the committee cannot forbear to add, that if in the cases referred to, the appeal was not unsuccessful, the obligation of the state to stand forth in its strength, seems at least equally imperious, when her commercial prosperity is assailed, the freedom of opinion outraged, and a vast moneyed power seeks to perpetuate itself upon the ruins of our political institutions.

The loans of 1786 and 1808 were not made to banks, or to citizens through the agency of banks; and although the proposition to intrust so large an amount to the credit of the local institutions may meet with some objections, it is apparent that this mode of extending relief and giving renewed activity to our commerce will be more effectual than any other. When we consider that the general government has not hesitated to intrust to three banks in the city of New York a larger sum than is now proposed to be loaned to all of them, and that our citizens have confided to fifteen of those institutions private deposits exceeding $6,500,000, no reason can be perceived why the state should put less confidence in them than those who have a deeper interest in their stability and credit. Our canal fund, exceeding $2,500,000, is now and has been for some years, deposited, not only with safety, but with profit, in our banks, principally in the interior of the state; and in the year 1833, the sum of nearly two millions of dollars was drawn from them by the commissioners of the canal fund for the redemption of canal stock. In 1797 the legislature authorised the sale of the United States bank stock, held by the state, amounting to $1,300,000, to the bank of New York, for which that bank gave its bond. The capital of the bank was never more than one million of dollars; yet a debt exceeding that amount existed against it more than twenty years without any loss to the state: while in the present case, the proposed loans are not to exceed one-half the capital of the banks to which they are made.

It is not to be disguised that this measure ought not to be adopted without necessity. But when we consider the power of the bank of the United States, and its attempts to control public opinion by successive appeals to the favor and the wants of the community, the committee rely with confidence on the patriotism of our citizens to support all measures necessary for our common protection. They will not fail to perceive, that if this vast and irresponsible monopoly is successful in its struggles to maintain itself in opposition to the declared will of the people, it will gradually overshadow and destroy the free institutions under which we live.

March 31, 1834.

An act to loan the credit of this state to the people thereof. The people of the state of New York, represented in the senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

§1. The commissioners hereinafter named are hereby authorised, if, in their opinion, the public interest shall require it, by an order in writing signed by a majority of them and filed in the office of the comptroller, from time to time, whenever they shall deem it expedient, to direct the comptroller to issue special certificates of stock, in such manner and under such regulations as are hereinafter provided, for an amount not exceeding in the whole six millions of dollars; for the redemption of which, and the punctual payment of the interest thereon, as herein provided, to the owners of such stock, the faith and credit of the people of this state is hereby pledged.

§2. Upon the filing of every such order, the comptroller shall issue certificates of stock to the amount required thereby, in such sums and to such persons or bodies corporate as the said commissioners, or a majority of them, may direct, for the purpose of being loaned as hereinafter directed.

§3. The said commissioners are hereby authorised to loan so much of the said stock when so issued as aforesaid, as in their opinion the public interest may require, to such of the incorporated banking institutions in the city of New York, as they shall deem proper, not exceeding in the whole four millions of dollars, and in such sums to each as they shall deem proper, not exceeding in amount to any one institution one-half the capital stock of such institution, at a rate of interest not less than five per cent. upon its par value; and the said commissioners before they shall make any such loan, shall examine particularly into the affairs of such bank. And the said commissioners may also at their discretion, take such security for the punctual payment of said interest and the ultimate payment of said principal, as they shall deem proper and necessary to insure such payments at such time as may be agreed upon, not extending beyond the time when the principal of said stock shall be reimbursable.

§4. The certificates of stock to be issued as aforesaid shall be issued in the manner provided by chapter 320 of the laws of 1831, and the said stock shall be transferable at the pleasure of the owner, in the same manner and at the same place as the canal stocks of this state are now transferable.

§5. The said stock shall bear an interest of five per centum per annum, payable quarter yearly at the Manhattan bank in the city of New York, and shall be reimbursable at such time or times within twelve years from the passage of this act, as the said commissioners shall designate.

§6. The presidents of the respective banks to which such stock may be loaned, shall cause public notice to be given for at least two days in two of the daily newspapers printed in the city of New York, of the time and place at which the said stock will be sold, and the said stock shall be sold at such time and place at public auction to the highest bidder, and the amount of any premium received on such sales shall be paid into the treasury of this state for the benefit of the general fund. But at any such sale the corporation to which such stock may belong, shall be at liberty to bid for the same and become the purchaser thereof.

§7. The said commissioners hereinafter named, are also authorised in like manner, from time to time, as they may judge expedient, to require an issue of like stock to an amount not exceeding in the whole two millions of dollars, and when so issued to convert the same into money and pay the same into the treasury of this state, the premium thereon to belong to the general fund, and the capital to be loaned to the citizens of the different counties of this state, except the counties in the first senatorial district, in the manner and subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned, to wit:

1. The amount to be loaned in each county shall be ascertained by an apportionment of the whole amount of two millions of dollars, among such counties according to the number of inhabitants in each, as ascertained by the census taken in the year 1830.

2. No loan shall be made to the citizens of any county until an application therefor shall have been made to said commissioners by the board of supervisors of such county.

3. The moneys to be loaned in each county shall be loaned by the "commissioners for loaning money" in such county, under the act of April 11, 1808, and where there shall be no such commissioners in any county, they may be appointed in the same manner, and shall hold their offices for the same term and upon the same tenure as if appointed under said act.

4. The commissioners of each county, before entering upon the duties of their office under this act, shall take the oath of office as prescribed by the constitution of this state, and file in the office of the comptroller a like bond as is provided for by the fourth section of the act last aforesaid, in addition to the bond required by that section in cases where that may now be required.

5. The principal moneys to be loaned under this act shall be payable at such time or times, within twelve years from the passage of this act, as the said commissioners mentioned in the eleventh section of this act, shall designate, and the interest thereon at the rate of six per centum per annum, shall be payable on the first Tuesday of May in each year.

6. The said commissioners for loaning money shall keep separate books and accounts relating to the loan authorised by this act, distinct from their other loan office books and accounts, and in addition to the evidences of title required by said last mentioned act, it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to require of the borrower a certificate from the county clerk and a clerk of the supreme court, shewing that there is no incumbrance upon the property proposed to be mortgaged on record in their offices.

7. Whenever any principal moneys loaned by said commissioners shall be paid in to them, it shall not be reloaned, but shall be paid into the treasury of this state.

§8. The moneys to be realized from the stock authorised to be issued under the preceding section of this act, shall belong to the general fund of this state, and the interest upon said stock shall be paid out of the said general fund.

§9. Except as herein otherwise provided, all the provisions of the act aforesaid, entitled "an act authorising a loan of moneys to the people of this state," passed April 11, 1808; and also of the act to amend the same, passed March 29, 1829; and also of the act, entitled "an act to provide for the conveyance of land sold by a commissioner of loans under the act, entitled 'an act authorising a loan of moneys to the citizens of this state,' passed April 21, 1825," shall apply to the loans to be made under the seventh section of this act, in the same manner as if the moneys loaned constituted a part of the said loan of 1808.

§10. Whenever upon the foreclosure and sale of any premises mortgaged to secure any loan made under the seventh section of this act, the said mortgaged premises shall not bring the amount due and to become due upon said mortgage with the costs of foreclosure and sale, the deficiency shall be reported by the commissioners making such sale, to the board of supervisors of the county, who shall at their next annual meeting for that purpose, cause such deficiency and the interest thereon, to be raised as part of the contingent charges of such county, and paid over to the county treasurer whose duty it shall be to pay the same over to the said commissioners for loaning money.

§11. The comptroller, the attorney general, the secretary of state and the bank commissioner appointed by the governor, and three such citizens as shall for that purpose be appointed by the senate on the nomination of the governor, shall be commissioners to carry this act into effect; but it shall not be lawful for them to require any issue of stock as herein before provided, after the first day of February next.

§12. This act shall take effect immediately upon the passage thereof.

An act in relation to certain banks.

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

§1. When any bank shall obtain a loan pursuant to the act entitled "an act to loan the credit of this state to the people thereof," the amount of such loan may be regarded as capital, for the purpose of enabling the bank to increase its discounts; but such bank shall not increase its circulation beyond the amount now authorised by law.

§2. This act shall take effect on the passing thereof.

In assembly—April 2.

On motion of Mr. A. J. Parker, the general orders were laid on the table, and the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. McKnight in the chair, on the bill to loan the credit of this state to the people thereof.

The committee passed the remaining sections of the bill, as reported by the joint committee, without material amendment.

An additional section was adopted, on motion of Mr. Haigh, providing that, in case the supervisors of any county should refuse or neglect to take the loans provided for such county, loan should be made to the bank or banks in the county; and if there shall be no bank in the county, then to any other banks in the state, at the discretion of the commissioners.

Another section was adopted on motion of the speaker, providing for calling special meetings of the boards of supervisors of the several counties.

The same committee passed the bill in relation to certain banks. [Authorises the banks to which loans shall be made in pursuance of the act just passed, to discount on such loans as on so much additional capital.]

The question on agreeing with the committee in their report on the bill to loan the credit of the state to the people thereof was decided in the affirmative, yeas 89, noes 12.

The following are the yeas and noes on the final passage of the bill—

Yeas—Messrs. Anderson, Angel, Anthony, Archibald, Arnold, Barnes, Bartle, Beardslee, Bockeven, Bowne, Brasher, Brown, Butrick, Campbell, Cargill, Case, Chamberlin, Church, Clark, Coe, Conklin, Crosby, Culver, Cuykendall, Degrauw, Dusenbury, Dyer, Ellithorp, Enos, Fowler, Gardner, Germond, Gordon, Grinnell, Groom, Guinnip, Haight, Hall, Hasbroack, Heally, Herttel, Hone, Hough, Humphrey, Hunt, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Kernan, Kingman, Livingston, Mabbett, Marvin, McKee, McKnight, Mercereau, Morrell, Morris, Myers, Myrick, Nichols, Orr, Osborne, Palmer, A. J. Parker, J. S. Parker, J. H. Parker, Phelps, Ringold, O. Robinson, J. P. Noes—Messrs. Clary, Dana, Emmons, Fleming, Fox, Harris, Lewis, Parkhurst, Patterson, Robertson, Ward, Whipple—12. [The bill has also probably passed the senate, with not more than 5 or 6 nays. But we have not yet received the particulars.]

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 8—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, APRIL 19, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,178.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Many articles prepared for this paper have been shoved out. We do all that we can to keep pace with events, and the duties which appear to devolve upon us, in these portentous times.

It is quite plain, we think, that a great crisis in the history of our country is rapidly approaching, and; perhaps, is closer at hand than is generally apprehended. Things cannot remain and stand still—as they are. There must be a forward or retrograde movement! The usual political questions of parties are merging into personally interesting, or yet loftier considerations! A whole loaf or half of one—bread or no bread; the constitution and the laws, or the will of individuals. It is not a party question when an hundred men, chiefly with families, shall be discharged from one employ, on two succeeding Saturdays, as it is freely said will be consummated in Baltimore this day, for want of means to pay them; and that several hundreds of other working people may fearfully look to a like operation at the end of the present month, in our vicinity, from the same cause, to be added to the hundreds already out of employment. These are not party matters! There are no speculative opinions in them! They reach the heart and home of every body, and are felt—bitterly felt. Gloomy or desperate faces are met with at every step. Party has nothing to do with them. Wives, children and property—liberty and peace—are the things which are under consideration. Pass over the Point and round our wharves, and it would seem as if a withering pestilence was raging amongst us. A worse or better state must soon happen. We repeat it, things cannot remain, and stand still—as they are.

In a succeeding page will be found a brief notice of the contents of an extraordinary paper sent by the president of the United States to the senate, on Thursday last. The "Globe" of the following day contains this paper at full length, but we cannot make room for it without an utter derangement of the week's business. We the less regret this delay because of the abstract of its contents, for which we are indebted to the "National Intelligencer."

We had heard that such a proceeding was contemplated, by way of an appeal to the people, but did not believe that it would be carried out. It will cause a great excitement, and especially in the minds of those opposed to "the government."

It will be observed that when the senate adjourned, a motion that the paper be not received, was before that body. With a full senate, we think, there would be no great difficulty in deciding how that proposition would be disposed of.

The house of representatives, in committee of the whole, is voting down all Mr. Vance's proposed retrenchments, and it is believed that the gag-law will be enforced to prevent calls of the yeas and nays, when the appropriation bill is reported to the house—but the senate can and will "correct the procedure", and, by amendments, compel a taking of the yeas and nays in the house, that the people may know those who profess, and those who would practice economy.

Mr. Webster, on his late journey to Boston, was received and parted with at Philadelphia, New York, Providence, &c. by thousands of the people.

Messrs. Poindexter, Preston and McDuffie visited Philadelphia the beginning of this week, and received the most flattering attentions of the citizens—thousands having waited upon to honor them; and they were dined, &c. with great enthusiasm. We intend to give some of the particulars in our next.

VOL. XLVI—Sta. 8.

The bank of the United States is arming itself with specie. Most of the late large importations are on its account. It will sustain a sound currency. Its notes are like old gold. The confidence of the people reposes in it. The sound of "the horn," or of the hurrah, is silenced by the jingling of its dollars! In the wreck of banks, it stands fearless. The "reptile" is the chief—the "monster" has become the barrier between honest labor and "rag-barons;" and other paper money manufacturers. It is like a rock in the ocean. It laughs at the storms which folly and prejudice and passion and false dealing raise against it. The story sent forth "by authority" that it has caused the pressure, is kicked out of every decent company, by the power of truth, and even the least informed of the people begin to ask—what harm hath the bank rendered to me? "Uncle Sam's" paper reposes in the back part of the most common laborer's pocket book, if possessed of various kinds of notes. He relies upon it as a "friend in need." The bank is winning for itself "golden opinions" by its moderation and liberality. A farthing candle does not affect the light of the sun. The bank has the power to return the mischiefs devised against it—and refrains. It is ready to help its enemies out of the dark ditch into which their own ignorance, or something worse, has cast them. And, it is within the range of probabilities, that its aid may be required by its bitterest opponents! Nous verrons!

At the New York stock exchange on Monday last, 141 shares of the stock of this bank were sold at 105@105½.

We were promised a "better currency" than the bank of the United States furnished! Behold "the experiment!" Bills of the Virginia banks were at 5 per cent. discount on Monday last, at Baltimore—at 7½ per cent. on Tuesday, at 10 per cent. on Wednesday, and fifteen per cent. on Thursday last, in exchange for Baltimore bank notes; and, on the same days, such Baltimore bank notes were at a discount in Richmond!!! Hence we see a "glorious" operation—but the poor man "pays the piper." It is an abominable state of things, and will not be submitted to.

It is our opinion that the Virginia banks are as good as any other state banks in the union.

The Buenos Ayres papers present a fine specimen of "rag money," in the prices current of commodities. For instance, a silver dollar is worth 7 dollars 62½ cents in paper, a doubloon 120, a barrel of flour 60 dollars, and so on.

Speaking of the failure of the four banks in the District of Columbia—viz: two at Washington and one each in Georgetown and Alexandria, the "Globe" of Wednesday says—

"The stoppage of the District banks is, doubtless, intended to produce effect on the Virginia elections. Recent movements in this city demonstrate the game that is playing. The banks that have already closed within the District have done so in accordance, no doubt, with the views and wishes of the United States bank."

Now this is very obliging, indeed, in the District banks! They become bankrupts just to accommodate the bank of the United States! This brings to recollection what is said to have happened at Newgate, England, when a person was about to be hung, who kicked and struggled and made battle, to prolong his life—on which the reverend chaplain advanced, and in the most soothing and fatherly manner said—"Do, good man, oblige me by being hung, peaceably—for the morning is chilly, and I wish to retire! Do my good man—do be hung!"

We are not surprised that such absurdities are manufactured and published in the "Globe"—and they may be believed in a certain quarter, and there have the desired effect: but business-men will regard those who believe them as candidates for the honorary degree of A. S. S. The idea is not, however, original in the "Globe." We think that it was thrown out by some imported patriot in the West, as to the bank of Maryland, that it had failed just to assist in carrying on the war of the bank of the United States against the president! We guess there was a better reason than this for the failure of the bank of Maryland, or its notes would not now be selling at from 40 to 50 cents in the dollar!

The six million loan bill has passed the senate of New York, as we expected, 17 to 4. If all who "do business on borrowed capital ought to break," the state of New York, and the banks that borrow parts of this loan, will be in a bad way!

We most heartily wish relief to the people, and shall be glad to find ourselves mistaken as to the result of this extraordinary proceeding. We think it is calculated to increase the alarm, and add to the pressure on the money market, in the general opinion formed on hundreds of close observations, that a forced credit is altogether inconsistent with a sound or safe policy, in individuals or communities—and affords, in itself, evidence of desperate circumstances. To borrow money in the ordinary operations of business and things, and in the usual way, is often highly beneficial, as well as absolutely necessary—but this is "another affair." The credit of the state is avowedly sent forth to sustain the credit of the banks, that they may sustain the credit of individuals! This is, indeed, an "experiment." We shall see "how it will work."

In the congressional proceedings will be found a brief speech of Mr. McKim, the member from the 5th Maryland district. It is very nearly in the words of a card issued by him, at Baltimore, on the 12th inst. and it is not worth while to insert both. But in reply to his card we have the following notices:

The delegates from the first five wards of the city of Baltimore, who were charged with certain instructions to the hon. Isaac McKim, representative in congress from the 5th congressional district of Maryland, will, in the course of a few days, reply to the address of that gentleman to the voters of the district, which appeared in the Republican of yesterday.

April 15, 1834.

The delegates from the seven election districts of Anne Arundel county, will reply to the communication of the hon. Isaac McKim as soon as the names which he has adverted to as not being on the poll books of the last election can be ascertained. It is well for the present to remark, that there may be a great number of voters whose names are attached to the resolutions presented to Mr. McKim, who did not vote at the last election, and whose names do not appear upon those books. It is obvious therefore, that the poll books cannot be taken as the only proper guide in ascertaining the number of legal voters in the district.

April 15, 1834.

The mis-spelling of names, in the hurry and bustle of an election, by the clerks, not personally acquainted with one-fourth of the voters, perhaps, at the utmost extent, and other causes, renders our poll books very uncertain guides, in the absence of any regularly taken list of qualified voters; for the right of suffrage, in Maryland, as in New York, is a little more than universal! If a stranger is resolved in himself, and has good backers at hand, (and they are easily obtained), he may vote several times at different wards, or more than once, even in one of them, under different names, if he keeps a "bright look out" when a great press is made on the judges—for there is no check on them except in their own discretion, exerted at the moment. We must have a register of voters, at least in our large cities and towns, made out not less than six months before any election at which a person shall be allowed to put in his ballot; and, if his name is not on the list of the ward, being personally unknown to the judges as a resident thereof, let him be rejected, unless on the recorded oaths of two householders that he is entitled to the vote which he offers, under the penalty of perjury to all the parties. This would correct an evil which, if uncontrolled much longer, will deluge the streets of our chief cities with blood. The resident, or tax-paying population, will not suffer the perpetration of such frauds upon the right of suffrage with impunity. They will not permit persons to "kill their votes" today, who, even by the vigilance of a Parisian police, could not be found as citizens to-morrow. It is an abuse that must be abated. Let every man vote as the law gives him a right; but we would make it a penitentiary offence to vote contrary to the law.

[DEFERRED ARTICLE.]

That always veracious paper, the "Albany Argus" of Feb. 14, had a long letter from Washington, pretending to give an account of the anniversary supper of the "Typographical society," in that city, from which the following is extracted:

"After few moments of respectful silence, a letter was read from Hezekiah Niles, esq. regretting his inability to be present at the festival, and wishing health and happiness to the company, and all practitioners of the 'black art' the world over. The letter of Mr. N. as well as I could hear, was exceedingly violent and bitter. After it was finished, his health was drunk as follows:

Mr. Niles, and his 'black heart' (h unspirated)." The "entire" account is of a-piece with this extract—and the whole may be judged by this part. Now, the following is taken from the official account of the proceedings had on that anniversary, copied from the "Telegraph" of January 14—

"The following letter from the veteran printer and editor, Hezekiah Niles, esq. of Baltimore, to whom a special invitation was forwarded, breathes sentiments that show how deserving he is of the courtesy and esteem of his fellow craftsmen:

Baltimore, Jan. 3, 1834.

Dear sir: I regret to say that the nature of my engagements are such, being indeed a working-man, that I cannot visit Washington to-morrow, as I wished; be pleased, therefore, to accept of my thanks for your kind invitation, and present to the committee and the society my sincere, earnest, and hearty wishes for the health and happiness of you all, and every practitioner of the "black art," "rats" and "collar" men always excepted. The former shall not steal the [bread and] cheese in my office from the mouth of honest labor, nor the latter ever find an associate in me. And, while it is with just pleasure that I bear testimony in behalf of the improved standing of the working printers, I much regret to say that the profession is suffering in the public estimation, because that the press has been made the chief instrument of jockeys, wishing to ride into office by the promulgation of error, and the blackening of private persons—and with too much success. Of this sin—of this degradation of our noble art, every regular-bred printer will feel as I do; and, consistently with his other obligations, do all that lie cau to correct and restrain what he cannot "reform."

I take leave, however, to offer you a sentiment:

In the mutual respect which is due between employers and the employed, may the liberality and justice of the former be only exceeded by the industry and fidelity of the latter.

Yours truly,

H. NILES.

Mr. John Dowling, chairman of committee, &c."

And soon after the preceding letter was read, the following toast was offered—

By J. F. Crooker: "Our fellow craftsman Hezekiah Niles, esq. of Baltimore—His successful career as an editor proves that none are more faithful 'Registers' of the events of their country, than those who had first learned to Register the press.

This is all that is said about "Hezekiah Niles, esq." And how out of this could be made the story which appears in the "Albany Argus," can be understood only by those who are conversant with the arts (and know the hearts), of "able editors."

The technical terms are simple, but should be explained. By "rats" are meant irregular workmen, a class of persons that I have never encouraged; "bread and cheese" is an old term in the "chapel" or printing house, and means subsistence—but the words "bread and" were either omitted by me in the hasty note, or left out in the copy. The word "collar" needs no explanation; every dirty dog knows the meaning of it, as the badge of a MASTER—or the pledge of crawling and crouching, though flogged, as evidence of his claim to a bone when wagging his tail,—as a dog ought to wag it, and belching "bow, wow, wow," at the master's bidding, without any reasoning why, as every entire dog should do.

What is there in my note that is "violent and bitter?" The word "collar" may have offended some present, and probably caused the elaste communication to the editor of the "Argus." These fellows often put me in mind of a West India story, about the policy used to detect a thief. The negro slaves of the plantation being gathered, it was proclaimed that the thief was revealed by a par-rot's feather hanging to his nose, and the culprit put up his hand to brush it away. So with the miserables—talk of a collar, and each of them believes that a personal reference is made to himself—

"Thus conscience doth make cowards of us all."

If this communication be not the product of the "honorable and honest" Isaac, it must be that of some Englishman, many of whom, or of other fresh importations, are now employed in teaching us "democracy;" for no American, unless as cunning as Isaac, would thus haveasperated han faich for the use of the Halbany Hargus.

NEW YORK CITY ELECTION. The latest accounts from New York, published in our last paper, were dated  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 1 o'clock on the last day of the election, being the 10th inst. and then the report was that the citizens were arming themselves at the arsenal, to suppress large masses of rioters, who were attacking, and knocking down, and, as it was then thought, killing persons at will! We shall now proceed to make a brief record of subsequent proceedings, &c. and give the results.

The affair at the Masonic Hall has been mentioned. A strong body of Irishmen attacked the "whig" committee, whose head quarters were in that building—a rally was made by the Americans, and a terrific scene followed. The mayor and the police were disregarded, and about 15 of the peace officers badly wounded, some of them dangerously, their bones being broken, &c. and "dozens lay on the ground bleeding at a time." It was horrible. Another rally was made. The Americans rushed to the affray, and 10 or 12 of the rioters were arrested, and, in spite of resistance, sent to Bridewell. It was now evident that a military force was necessary. The mayor did not wish to use it—but it was decided that the city was in a state of insurrection, and an application was first made to the United States officers on the station. They declined interfering, not feeling authorised. In the mean time the "whigs" had taken possession of the arsenal, and they held it until the arrival of the mayor and his posse. Gen. Morton soon prepared 1,200 men for instant service. They were at the arsenal by 3 o'clock, and bodies of cavalry were ready, armed and mounted in haste. These preparations quickly cooled down the fury of the mob, and order was pretty soon restored, when it was manifest that prompt punishment would follow its violation. Many men remained under arms during the night—for attacks upon the bank and Merchants exchange were loudly threatened, as well as on two or three of the printing offices. But the exertions of the mayor and the vigilance of the police, supported by the military, preserved the public peace; and the rebellious spirits, exhausted by three days of almost unremitting exertion and excitement, were thus quieted.

In the affray at the Masonic Hall eight of the police officers were so much hurt that they were carried to the hospital. Capt. Munson, of the city watch, so much so that his life was despaired of. He was shockingly mangled, and several of his ribs were broken. He was also struck with an axe!

Several persons of good standing in society have been freely named in the New York papers, as directing or abetting the rioters, and it seems probable that some of their cases will come before the courts. A large number of persons were arrested at different times, and sent to prison—these were nearly all Irishmen; and as in such cases it most commonly happens, were made the victims of persons "behind the scenes," less brave but more cunning than they.

We might fill several pages with details of disgusting things that happened—but would forget them, and hope that they will be forgotten, except in organizations to prevent their repetition. They cannot be permitted. Life and property, in the great city of New York, must not be thus made insecure. The mob must be taught obedience to the law. The extent of the danger is now clearly perceived, and it will be guarded against.

On the day after the election, general Morton issued an order in which he handsomely acknowledged the services of the military.

THE RESULT.

If these results are fairly stated, it appears that there was a decided majority in favor of the "whig" (as they call themselves) aldermen and assistant aldermen.

The effect of this election places all the municipal power of the city—such as the appointment of all officers, (including the judges of the elections), and disbursement of the city's money, in the hands of the anti-Jackson party—by a majority of four in joint ballot—to say nothing of the election in the 6th ward, which may be set aside. The majority in the board of aldermen is 3, in that of assistant aldermen 1.

We publish some account of a large meeting of adopted [Irish] citizens recently held in New York, with another letter from Dr. Macneven and one from counsellor Sampson, on the recent state of affairs, chiefly for the purpose of relieving those severely hostile feelings which have been extensively produced, because that marshalled bands of natives of Ireland were used at the late election in the city just named as mere fighting machines,* acting with such indiscretion and violence as to make it necessary to call out the military to restrain and reduce them to order. The outrageous proceedings of these poor and ignorant men, congregated on the worst principles and for the most reprehensible purposes, were more on account, perhaps, of the bad hearts of those who arrayed and stimulated them, than of their own wrong heads. They were rallied by a battle cry, and, by force, were expected to decide great questions in political economy, of the real merits of which they generally know about as much as the rudest inhabitants of an equinoxial wilderness know of the nature of the mountains of ice which roll in the northern seas, or of the vast fields of frozen water that surround the poles! What could these men know of the principles of the currency, and the delicate relations between men of business, on which the public prosperity so materially depends? Nothing! And yet their aid was invoked to settle disputed questions of right—to act violently against the body of the American merchants and traders and mechanics, and establish a quasi FOREIGN dominion over the great city of N. York!—and it was reasonably believed, as we should suppose, that from four to six thousand of them, many congregated from distant parts of the country, voted at the late election, who had no sort of interest in the city government! For these and other reasons that might be given, a great degree of excitement has sprung up against this class of persons, and is extending all over the United States. To allay this, and induce persons to make just discriminations, at least, as before observed, we publish the proceedings stated—bearing a willing testimony on our part, that natives of Ireland, however ignorant they may be, and rough as they appear, on their arrival in America, because of their privations and oppressions at home, being permanently located in some regular business, and spread among the people at large, are capable of the highest state of improvement, and often become among the most discreet and useful part of the population. It is unfortunate that they are collected in masses on any occasion, but wicked to use them as fighting machines at the polls—and it is no wonder when we see them arrayed as a separated class of the people, that native Americans feel indignant at such proceedings as those which have happened at New York.

*It is admitted by all sides, we believe, that the mobs were composed of Irishmen, and the proof is in the fact that nearly all arrested by the police were of that class of persons—others not having the reckless courage to do in person, what they advised them to do.

*We recollect another case that is applicable to the present occasion. A gentleman was writing a letter in a public coffee house in London, and closed by saying, "I would write further, but an impudent scoundrel is looking over my shoulder. I shall knock him down directly, if he is worth it." "I'm not looking over your shoulder!" said the scoundrel. On which the gentleman rose and looking at the thing, with bitter contempt said—"Be easy—you are not worth knocking down."

The first paragraph of Dr. Macneven's letter, we hope, will be carefully considered by all the natives of Ireland, adopted in America. His exhortation, that these should not keep themselves as a separated class, is worthy of his honored name, and that of the illustrious men with whom he struck for liberty—in “times that tried men's souls,” in the land of his fathers.

A very large public meeting was held at the Musical Fund Hall, Philadelphia, on Monday afternoon last, to compliment the “whigs” of New York on the late victory gained by them. Though thousands were in the huge room, other thousands could not get in! It was a complete “jam.” John Sergeant was called to the chair, and delivered an address of “great power and ability”—“one of the happiest efforts” of that distinguished man. Mr. Preston, of the senate, and Mr. McDuffie, of the house of representatives, were present. The first was loudly called for, when Mr. Sergeant had concluded, and he addressed the meeting at considerable length. Mr. McDuffie was then as loudly named, and he also spoke with his usual arduousness and power, in which he paid a handsome compliment to Mr. Sergeant, who, though he had differed in opinion with him, he regarded as a “sterling patriot,” &c. Each of these speeches were received with hearty and continued marks of approbation, and often interrupted with shouts of applause. The like, it is said, had never before been witnessed in Philadelphia. The people were in the highest possible state of enthusiasm. Gen. Green, editor of the “Telegraph,” was also called, and briefly thanked the meeting, in an appropriate manner. The resolutions were then read by Josiah Randall, and unanimously adopted. “They allude to the recent triumph of the friends of the constitution in New York, in a becoming spirit, and recommend that a public celebration of the victory take place on Saturday next at Powelton, and that our friends in New York be invited to participate with us in the festival.”

We must, at least, defer the particulars of this meeting.

A grand “whig” salute of one hundred guns was fired on the Common, at Boston, on receiving news of the result of the election of New York, and a general meeting of the people had been called to express their joy, “in the redemption of the political character of that great commercial metropolis.”

An immense multitude of people partook of a collation in Castle Garden, New York, on Tuesday afternoon, to celebrate the victory gained in the “three days.” The garden was dressed with flags, and every thing prepared on a grand scale. Pipes of wine and barrels of beer were present in abundance, with a full supply of catables. After partaking of refreshments, (in which a great deal of business was done in a short time, by the thousands employed—for many mouths, like many hands, make quick work!) the meeting was organized, by appointing Benjamin Wells, carpenter, president, 12 vice presidents and 4 secretaries, of whom there was one cartman,* one sail maker, one grocer, one watchmaker, one ship carpenter, one potter, one mariner, one physician, one printer, one surveyor, four merchants, &c. The president briefly, but strongly, addressed the multitude as did several other gentlemen. A committee of congratulation from Philadelphia, was presented to the people, and received with shouts. Mr. Verplanck was then introduced, and received with enthusiastic cheers. An address was read and agreed to. Mr. Webster, being in New York, on his way to Washington, was invited to this festival, but he declined in a letter of considerable length, which was now read. A series of strong toasts, and many volun- teers, were next given. A salute was then fired from the miniature frigate CONSTITUTION, (which had been drawn through the streets the “three days”)—it was returned by one of the Austrian frigates, on which the stripes and stars floated, and that compliment was acknowledged by a salute from the frigate Brandywine, which had just hauled into the Hudson. When the time for adjournment arrived, the vast multitude, in a solid column, taking a considerable circuit, proceeded to Greenwich street, where Mr. Webster was dining with a friend. Loudly called for, he came forward, and was instantly surrounded by a dense mass of merchants and cartmen, sailors and mechanics, professional men and laborers, &c. seizing him by his hands. He was asked to say a few words to the people, and did so. He exhorted them to perseverance in support of the constitution, and, as a dead silence prevailed, he was heard by thousands. He thanked them, and ended by hoping that God would bless them all. Nine cheers were given, and the people departed for the residence of Dr. Maeneven, whom they cheered, and he made a grateful reply to the compliment paid him. Here ended the day's festival, and before 6 o'clock all was quiet—no excesses of any sort were committed, nothing happened to mar the harmony of the meeting, and no act of intemperance was committed, though the means of indulgence were so freely at hand.

Some three or four of the late [regular] speeches delivered in congress should be registered—but the flow of matter is still so great that we do not know what to do with it. The simple reading of all that we ought to read, is a severe operation—in addition to other duties.

We have nothing yet to give any certain indication of the general result of the Virginia elections. The “Enquirer” claims a gain of three or four members, in eastern Virginia—but we have no accounts from the western parts of the state. We incline to a belief that the state of parties will remain nearly the same as it was.

There are returns from 29 counties, which give 15 Jackson, and 19 “opposition” members.

Littleton P. Dennis, esq. a worthy representative from the state of Maryland in the congress of the United States, died, at Washington, on Monday last, after an illness of six or seven days.

*This gentleman, Mr. Milligan, came forward and took his seat on the right of the president, dressed in his frock, with his whip in his hand, and was received with nine cheers, in which he heartily joined waving his whip.

General Robert B. Taylor, one of the most distinguished sons of Virginia, as a practitioner at the bar and a judge, in peace, or as a soldier, in war, died at Norfolk on the 13th inst. universally lamented. He had a peculiar way of obtaining, because he deserved them, the entire confidence and earnest esteem of all who knew him, in every department of his active life. He held the command at Norfolk during the late war—and a very arduous and important one it was. He was equally prompt in his attention to the hospitals, in which hundreds of Americans suffered or died, as he was to the movements of a barbarian-like enemy on the waters of the Chesapeake.

It is stated that Monticello, the late residence of Mr. Jefferson, has been purchased by licut. Levy of the navy of the United States, and that he intends to commence immediately such improvements and repairs, as will fully restore the buildings, &c. to their original condition: after which it will be accessible to visitors once a week.

There is yet much excitement in South Carolina on account of the test-oath required of militia officers, and some talk of resisting it by violence! Many meetings on this subject, especially in the mountain parts of the state, have been held, at which the oath, and those who made it, or take it, were severely denounced.

There is a considerable emigration from North Carolina, and a great one from South Carolina, to Alabama and Mississippi.

The following is an extract from a letter to the editor, from a gentleman of Mississippi—just as it is written and marked—except the name:

"I am requested by Mr. G. to say to you that the remittance by him would have taken place sooner but for the glorious uncertainty of Uncle Sam's news satchel in these strange times; he had doubts whether there was any communication, direct or indirect, from here to Baltimore until recently, when one of your papers came to hand, and brought the glorious news of a clear passage."

MAINE. The municipal election took place in the city of Portland last week, and was a fair and ardent trial of the strength of parties. Last year the Jackson party elected their candidate for mayor by a majority of about 200 votes, now Levi Cutter, esq. anti-Jackson, has been elected by a majority of 416, obtaining a majority in six wards out of seven—and all the aldermen and other officers are elected in every ward except No. 7.

CONNECTICUT. The returns of the late election are not yet complete. Mr. Foot is chosen governor, having a majority of the whole number of votes; and his votes, added to those given to the anti-masonic candidate, place Mr. Edwards, the Jackson candidate, between 5 and 6,000 behind. Seventeen senatorial districts have returned "whig" members, and the other four districts "Jackson" members. The assembly will stand about three to one anti-Jackson.

There has been a great rally and revolution in this state, by the "experiment." It has warmed the people into action.

THE RICH MAN AND THE BEOGAR. A rich man was passing along the road in a splendid coach, when a cur sallied out, snarling and barking, and trying to stop his horses by getting before them. A beggar was sitting by the road side, gnawing a bone, and apparently half famished, while his clothes were falling from him in rags. The cur seeing him thus employed, ran towards him, and fawned at his feet:

"You should teach your dog better manners," said the rich man.

"He is not mine," said the other.

"Why then does he bark at me and fawn on you?"

"Don't you see I've got a bone to throw away?" replied the beggar. [Paulling.]

BANKS, CURRENCY AND THE TIMES.

The "experiment" has a "beautiful" effect, as old col. Laval used to say was the effect of grape-shot upon cavalry! There is killing and wounding, and floundering and floundering without limit, and without the prospect of an end!

In our last we gave the official notice of the closing of the bank of Washington, which we thought was one of the most carefully managed banks in the District; but now we have to add three similar notices.

Farmers' and Mechanics' bank of Georgetown, April 12, 1834.

At a special meeting of the directors, called this day, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

The board of directors of this bank have, for the present, decided to discontinue specie payments, and suspend active banking operations.

In coming to this painful decision, the board of directors are actuated by a high sense of duty, alike to the creditors and the stockholders of the bank, to whose respective interests, involved in the proper administration of the institution entrusted to their charge, they owe their best services.

They foresee that the present prostration of confidence, and consequent derangement of the currency, must eventually reduce them to this course; and they prefer to anticipate the event, by yielding at once to the pressure, rather than avert it during the short practicable period of delay, at the expense of sacrifices that may be prejudicial to those interested in the bank.

This measure is expected to be of temporary duration. The board see no necessity, in the condition of the bank, for extending it beyond the present singular crisis in the banking history of the country, and confidently anticipate the resumption of active business, on a specie basis, with abundant resources, so soon as this crisis shall pass away; meanwhile, they assure the public, with entire confidence, that they consider the resources of the bank most ample to redeem all its engagements, and that they will proceed at once to realize its means, and redeem those engagements as promptly as practicable.

All obligations of the bank will continue to be received in payment of debts; the transfer and subdivision of those obligations for that purpose will be allowed without restriction.

By unanimous order of the board. J. I. STOLL, cashier.

Bank of Alexandria, April 12th, 1834.

It is deeply regretted by the board of directors of this institution, that it has been compelled to yield to the necessity of suspending, for the present, the redemption of its notes, now in circulation, with specie funds. Inasmuch as the amount of notes in circulation is very small, it is hoped they will be speedily redeemed; and they will be received in payment of all debts due to the bank. By order of the board.

J. L. MCKENNA, cashier.

Patriotic bank, 14th April, 1834.

At a special meeting of the president and directors of the Patriotic bank, held this day, for the purpose of taking into consideration the alarming state of the commercial affairs of this District, it was unanimously

Resolved, That in the opinion of the board the interests of the bank, and its creditors, requires that the payment of specie for its obligations ought to be, for the present, suspended.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the board, the report made by the committee of investigation, in January last, showing that the bank had not only the ability to pay its obligations, but to pay the stockholders upwards of 110 per cent. was a true and correct statement of the affairs of the bank, and that nothing has occurred, thus far, to render the securities of the bank less safe than at that period.

Resolved, That the creditors of the bank be requested not to sacrifice their claims, as the board feel authorised to assure them that they will all be paid.

In making known this determination, the board need hardly say that nothing but the extraordinary juncture of affairs could have brought them to the painful necessity of this announcement. They earnestly invite all persons interested to call and satisfy themselves of the condition of the bank, and the exertions made by the board to sustain the institution, and that, so far as discretion and prudence would authorise, they have personally gone.

One or two other banks of the District have been "hard run," but have, so far, held up. On Monday and Tuesday last the notes of all the banks at Washington were refused in Baltimore, except of the office of the bank of the United States—and sales of those that had not broken were made at 5 per cent. discount.

The Farmers and Mechanics' bank of Georgetown possessed a large share of the public confidence. We had often heard reports and whispers prejudicial to the credit of the bank of Alexandria, though it was the one in which the public revenue collected at that port has long been deposited. It is not stated how much of our money (if we may dare to call it so!) remained in this bank at the moment of its blow up. The Patriotic bank appears to have had some large dealings with the general post office department, and its issues must have been heavy, compared with its means, judging by the facts made apparent in our own little business—a seemingly undue proportion of its notes being sent to us. This caused us to suspect them, and promptly to part with them.

Experiments in forcing a circulation, as well as the "experiment" of "the government" in a sudden restriction of the circulation, and prostration of confidence through ill advised acts, have the same end in bankruptcy.

It is reported that several of the "PERISH CREDIT" members of congress, who had on hand bills of the District banks, were among the fastest runners for specie, and that others hastily put off such bills in exchange for those "monsters," signed by the "money-king," or some of his ministering spirits.

The failure of the bank of Maryland is a bad one. The bills and notes and certificates of deposits issued by it, are selling at about fifty cents in the dollar. Indeed it is just now said that only 40 cents, in cash, can be obtained for them! This is very "comfortable" to those who owe money to that bank—but not very agreeable to others to whom it is indebted. But some of the debtors of the bank will make little fortunes out of its bankruptcy, and in the desolation of the hearts of many widows and orphans, ruined. The gentlemen, however, who have the affairs of this bank now in charge, will save all that can be saved, and faithfully keep it for the benefit of the concerned.

A weekly list of the applications made for the benefit of the insolvent laws of Maryland is published in the Baltimore papers. The last contains 13 names. We have a personal knowledge of only three persons on this list—and two of them are on the memorial which was presented to congress from this city against a restoration of the deposits, &c.

We fear that the question, what is money? is about to become a very common one.

It has been made a matter of great complaint against the bank of the United States that a part of its stock is held in Europe—but the same men rejoice that a loan for the establishment of a huge bank at New Orleans has been borrowed in Europe! It is hoped, also, that the New York stock, about to be issued, may be sold in Europe, and its product in money loaned to the banks.* And yet the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank of Albany has taken the Chenango canal loan of 900,000 dollars, at 6½ per cent. premium, for a 5 per cent. stock! Here is an operation that we do not understand. This bank takes a loan at a rate of interest less than 5 per cent. but cannot lend money to its customers, in sufficient quantities, at seven per cent. interest; while the state is lending its credit to the banks that they may relieve the wants of the people!

Specie continues to pour in, and yet money every day becomes more scarce! Will the wise ones tell us how this happens? Money is very plentiful in England.

We hear of the stoppage of several additional factories since our last.

Three snug two story houses, 14 feet front, and on a lot running back 80 feet, situate on Orleans street, Baltimore, in fee simple, were sold on the 10th instant for $2,600 in notes of the bank of Maryland, on that day worth 65 cents to the dollar. These houses are well

*An act has passed the "democratic" legislature of Pennsylvania, authorising the governor to appoint an agent to go to Europe to borrow money, on the credit of the state.

What a grand farce has been performed. "Down with the bank"—it has foreign stockholders! "All who do business on a borrowed capital ought to break!" "Perish credit!"—"perish the state institutions!"—"perish the states!"

It appears probable that if confidence can be obtained in Europe, the Rothschilds and other bankers may have considerable claims on the fee of the "sovereign" states of New York and Pennsylvania, not directly, but not the less certainly, on that account; and if the present patriotic maxim is just, that all who borrow money of the bank of the United States, are bought up by the bank and are slaves of the bank, can it be said that the states named are independent?

A letter from the secretary of war to the governor of Alabama, dated the 12th of March, gives him official notice that the additional troops ordered into Alabama have been withdrawn, and that only the ordinary garrison at Fort Mitchell will remain in the Creek country. The letter also expresses the pleasure of the president at a recent act of the legislature of Alabama, and states that he will be much gratified, if the enforcement of the stipulations of the Creek treaty shall render it unnecessary for him to resort to the provisions of the act of 1807, which he has not the slightest wish to do, unless required by the obligations assumed by the United States in that treaty.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

April 11. The vice president presented the following communication from the secretary of the treasury; which was ordered to be printed:

Treasury department, April 11th, 1834.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the senate, of the 8th inst. directing the secretary of the treasury "to communicate to the senate the name of any agent, or agents, employed by him to transact the business of the treasury with the banks selected for the deposit of the public fund; the nature of the duties performed by said agent or agents; the amount of the compensation paid for the discharge of the said duties, and by whom, and from what fund the said compensation is paid; and in pursuance of what law the said agent or agents have been appointed," I have the honor to state, that for many years past, it has been the duty of one of the clerks of this department to attend to the business of the treasury with banks. The clerkship to which that duty is assigned, has been filled for upwards of four years by Samuel M. McKean. He is appointed under the act of congress of 20th April, 1818, and the salary to which he is entitled under that act, is $1,000 a year; and since the deposits have been removed, as well as before, he has continued to attend to the business of the department with banks, without any additional compensation for such services.

If this clerk in the department is not to be considered as embraced in the call made by the senate, no agent has been employed by me to transact the business of the treasury with the banks selected for the deposit of the public funds.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. TANEY, sec'y of the treasury.

Hon. Martin Van Buren, vice prest. U. S. and prest. of senate. Mr. McKean presented the proceedings of a meeting, and the memorial adopted thereat, held by citizens of Blockley, in Philadelphia county, Pa. sustaining the executive, &c. in the removal of the deposits. Read, referred, &c.

Memorials praying the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented by Mr. Prentiss, from 1,619 citizens of Rutland county, Vt. and by Mr. Ewing, from 2,000 inhabitants of Franklin county, and 4,310 inhabitants of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio.—Read, referred, &c.

Mr. Clay submitted the following:

Ordered, That the secretary of the senate be directed to cause to be ascertained and reported to the senate, the aggregate numbers of all who have, or shall have on the day of his report, presented petitions, memorials, or other proceedings to the senate, for or against the executive measure of the removal of the deposits, distinguishing the number appertaining to each petition, memorial or other proceeding. Modified as follows, at Mr. Poindexter's suggestion: "And specifying the city, town, county and state from which the memorial or petition was received."

Mr. Clay was desirous that the service should be performed, because it was of importance to have collected in one view, the number of our fellow citizens, pro and con who have come here soliciting relief.

Mr. Wright, thought the duty a delicate one. He would name one circumstance. A short time since, a memorial was presented by an honorable senator, coming from the city of Albany, and he (Mr. Wright), also presented another from the same city. They came in from the printer the day before yesterday, and the one which was said to have been signed by 2,800* citizens of Albany, was found to contain the names of but 1,316; and the memorial he presented said to contain 1,700 names, had only 1,666. He thought it best to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. Clay was aware that entire precision was not attainable. The gentleman alluded to the mistake in the memorial from Albany. But was it not possible that it might turn out that a portion of one memorial had been detached from it and added to his. Something like it had occurred in Philadelphia, &c.

Mr. Wright took leave to say that the gentleman from Kentucky did him injustice in the imputation that he had any agency in cutting off any part of the memorial alluded to.

Mr. Clay disclaimed any allusion to the honorable gentleman—he only intimated that such a thing might be done.

After some further remarks by Messrs. Wright, King, of Ala. and Clay, the order was adopted.

The senate took up, on motion of Mr. Poindexter, the resolution offered a few days since, for the printing of 1,000 copies of the journal of the old congress.

Upon this resolution a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Southard, King, of Georgia, Poindexter, Ewing, Bibb and Shepley took part. Without taking the question, at 4 o'clock, on motion of Mr. Morris, the senate adjourned until Monday.

April 14. Mr. Clay presented two memorials, numerously signed; one from Troy, and the other from Schenectady, New York, praying for the restoration of the deposits.† Read, referred, &c.

Mr. Silsbee, presented the proceedings of a meeting held at Salem, Massachusetts, approving of the removal of the deposits. Read, referred, &c.

Mr. Clayton reported a bill to compromise and finally settle the claims of the United States on the Alleghany bank of Pennsylvania. Read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Ewing submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate, whether any of the banks which have recently failed, in the District of Columbia, had in deposit, or otherwise in their possession, any of the public money, and, if any, how much, at the time of their failure.

Several bills for the relief of private individuals, or of a local character, were taken up and disposed of.

The senate then took up the bill authorising the relinquishment of the 16th sections of public lands, granted for the use of schools, and the location of other lands in lieu thereof, which after debate, was, on motion of Mr. Clay, laid on the table.

The bill for the completion of a road from Memphis, Tennessee, to Little Rock, in the territory of Arkansas, was read a second time and ordered to a third reading.

The senate adjourned.

April 15. A message was received from the house of representatives notifying the senate of the death of the honorable Littleton Purnell Dennis, late a member of that house, from the state of Maryland, and that his funeral would take place from the hall of the house of representatives to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The message having been read,

Mr. Kent, of Maryland, rose and pronounced a neat, appropriate and impressive eulogium upon the virtues of Mr. Dennis, and concluded by moving the customary resolution, to attend his funeral and wear mourning as a testimony of respect to his memory; which was unanimously adopted; whereupon, on motion of Mr. Kent the senate adjourned.

[On the 16th the senate attended the funeral of Mr. Dennis, and on the 17th the senate was engaged in a discussion concerning a paper transmitted by the president—see page 121.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 11. The house resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. Marais, in relation to the deposits; and Mr. Corwin continued his remarks.

Mr. Polk moved the suspension of the rules in order to move that the house resume the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. Ward supported Mr. Polk's motion, and contended that public business should be first attended to; and called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, spoke of the urgent importance of the private business.

Mr. Polk urged the necessity of going on with the appropriation bill. The question was finally negatived by the following vote, yeas 92, nays 93.

*TO THE PUBLIC.

Having observed in the Washington Globe, and in the speech of Mr. Wright, in the senate, a denial that the Albany memorial contained the number of names which the committee authorized Mr. Webster to state were attached to it, when it was presented to the senate, we have felt it our duty to inquire into the subject, and we have now to state, that, by accident, one roll or list of names was omitted when the others were communicated to Mr. Webster; that this roll is now placed in Mr. Webster's hands, to be presented and added to the rest; and that the names on this roll make up the whole number, as declared when the memorial was presented; that is to say, twenty eight hundred, or thereabouts.

JACOB TEN ETYCK, } members of the RUFUS H. KING, } committee.

April 16, 1834.

†See his remarks on this occasion, page 125.

The house then went into committee of the whole, on the bill to provide for the payment of property lost and destroyed while in the military service during the late war with Great Britain, and after making some progress therein, the committee rose, reported progress, &c. and then the house adjourned.

Saturday, April 12. The resolution of Mr. Morris on the subject of the deposits was resumed, and Mr. Corwin concluded his remarks; and at the close of them, offered a resolution by way of amendment, declaring the reasons given by Mr. Taney, for the removal of the deposits, to be insufficient and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, after a remark or two, moved to lay the resolution and the amendment on the table.

On this motion, Mr. Vinton demanded the yeas and nays; which was ordered.

Mr. McKean stated that he thought he had the floor as soon, if not sooner, than the gentleman from Alabama, who had already had an opportunity of expressing his views on the subject, whilst other gentlemen were cut off by the power of the majority in the house. He, therefore, appealed to the courtesy of the gentleman, and asked him to withdraw his motion to afford the same privilege to others which he had enjoyed himself.

Mr. Clay declining to withdraw his motion—

Mr. Carr moved a call of the house.

On this motion, Mr. Williams demanded the yeas and nays, and being ordered, stood as follows: yeas 152, nays 11.

The call of the house being ordered, proceeded for some time, when the hour having expired, was, on motion of Mr. Whittlesey, arrested, and the whole subject lies over until Tuesday, Monday being petition day.

The house then, as in committee of the whole, took up the bill providing compensation for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy during the late war, which after being gone through with and amended, was agreed to in committee, and reported to the house, when the house adjourned.

Monday, April 13. Memorials, proceedings of meetings, resolutions, &c. favorable to the restoration of the deposits, &c. were presented as follows: by Mr. Bean, from citizens of the town of Dover, New Hampshire; by Mr. Bates, from 700 inhabitants of Springfield, Massachusetts; by Mr. Burges from 3,463 citizens of the county of Providence, Rhode Island; by Mr. Slade, from 160 (additional) citizens of Rutland county, Vermont; by Mr. Beardsley from 111 inhabitants of Pittsford, Monroe county, New York; by Mr. Lee, from inhabitants of Salem county, New Jersey; by Mr. Beuderson, from citizens of Lewis town, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Stewart, three memorials, which with one presented a few days since, were signed by 933 citizens of Fayette county, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Binney, from 457 farmers, mechanics and traders of Union county, Pennsylvania; which were, severally, read referred, &c.

Mr. Evans presented a memorial of a large number of citizens of Gardiner and Princeton, in the state of Maine, praying for a speedy remedy from the present pressure. Mr. E. concluded by moving to commit the memorial to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report two resolutions—one declaring that the reasons of the secretary of the treasury for the removal of the public money from the United States bank are insufficient and unsatisfactory—and the other declaring that a bank, created by the authority of congress, is necessary, expedient, and ought to be established.

The speaker suggested that the instructions first proposed were not in order, inasmuch as a resolution similar in character was already before the house.

Mr. Evans said, that he would then move the commitment, with instructions to report the second resolution. The subject was postponed to Monday next.

Mr. Graham presented resolutions adopted by the citizens of Morgantown, Burke county, North Carolina, alluding, in harsh terms, to the language applied by Messrs. Brown and Forsyth, to a memorial some time since forwarded by them, and laid before the senate, in which they attribute Mr. Forsyth's departure from the ordinary courtesy of debate to the influence of some peculiar excitement, but whether from the pot house or the palace, they do not think it important to inquire. He moved that the resolutions lie on the table.

Mr. McKim, of Maryland, said: I am requested to present the proceedings of a meeting held in the fifth congressional district of Maryland, as, also, instructions to me, signed by 3,715 voters of said district. As I admit, Mr. Speaker, the right of instruction by the majority, when that majority can be well ascertained, the only inquiry which I deemed it necessary to make, was when I received these instructions, was, whether they were sanctioned by the signatures of a majority of the legal and qualified voters of the district? And this could only be done by an accurate investigation of the poll books. For that purpose, I proceeded immediately to Baltimore, as I did not feel at liberty to vote on any question affecting the instructions, while such documents remained uninvestigated by me. That investigation has been made, at my instance, and, in part, under my particular inspection. The result, is, that of the 3,715 signatures on the proceedings and instructions, there are 1,892 of the names of the signers to the same which are not to be found on the poll books, at the election held in October last, at which election, sheriffs were elected for all the counties in the state of Maryland. A difference of this remarkable character leaves me at liberty to make no other conclusion, consistent with what I believe to be the accuracy of the examination had in this affair, than that I am not instructed by a majority of the legal and qualified voters of the district, otherwise than by my election, I consider it my duty further to state, that, if I had not received the instructions prior to the vote being taken on the resolutions reported by the committee of ways and means, respecting the bank of the United States and the deposits, I should have voted with the majority on all the resolutions. I forbear all further remark, and ask that the proceedings and instructions be read, laid on the table, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Memorials, proceedings of meetings, &c. against the restoration of the deposits were presented as follows: by Mr. Osgood, from a meeting of citizens of Salem, Massachusetts; by Mr. Pearce, from 1,660 citizens of Providence, Rhode Island; by the speaker, from Stratford, Connecticut; by Mr. Lansing, from a town in the vicinity of Albany, New York; by Mr. Scheneck, from a meeting held in Somerset county, New Jersey; by Mr. Stewart, seven memorials, signed by 675 citizens of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, also proceedings of a meeting in said county; by Mr. Anthony, from 324 citizens of Northumberland county, Pennsylvania; also from a meeting at Muncey in Lycoming county, Pennsylvania.

Various other memorials, generally of a private character, were presented, referred, &c.

Mr. Geaulte presented a memorial from the citizens of Savannah, Georgia, strongly opposed to the conduct of the administration in the removal of the deposits, &c. Mr. G. then asked leave of the house; to make a few remarks but there being no quorum, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, April 15. The journal of yesterday's proceedings having been read,

Mr. Stoddert, of Maryland, rose and addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Speaker: In announcing the death of Littleton Purnell Dennis, a representative on this floor from the state of Maryland, I discharge a sad and solemn duty. Not a week has elapsed since he mingled in the deliberations, and co-operated in the active duties of this house; he now sleeps the sleep of death. What an impressive illustration of the instability of human life—"of what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." The deceased stood to me, sir, in the double relation of colleague and friend. I knew him long and well. He was a noble, benevolent and estimable man, and has finished his course in honor. He was no tame and ordinary character; and although his modesty may have delayed the development of his faculties for public service, during his brief connection with this house, his state is not left without proofs of his legislative prudence and skill. He served her in both branches of her legislature for many years with honor and ability. He was well gifted by nature, well educated and well principled. His native sagacity, sound judgment and decision, and purity of purpose, made him what he was, a capable and honest public agent. The brave, generous, open and manly qualities of his nature secured him the confidence and affections of the people among whom he lived, and made it their delight to honor him.

He is gone hence, sir, but his memory will survive, embalmed in the kindly regards of those who knew and appreciated his noble and manly qualities, and unembittered and un tarnished by a single act of meanness, injustice and oppression. He died as he lived, deserving and possessing the warm-hearted esteem of many, the ill will of none. As the last act of respectful duty which it remains for friendship to perform, I move you, sir, the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of this house will attend the funeral of the late Littleton Purnell Dennis, at 12 o'clock, to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Littleton Purnell Dennis, deceased, late a member of this house from the state of Maryland.

Resolved, That the members of this house will testify their respect to the memory of Little Purnell Dennis, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the senate to notify that body of the death of Littleton P. Dennis, late one of the representatives from the state of Maryland, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, from the hall of the house of representatives.

The above resolutions and order were unanimously adopted; and then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, April 16. The house this day attended the interment of the remains of the late Mr. Dennis.

Thursday, April 17. Mr. Jarris asked leave to offer a resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate the affairs of the banks in this District which have suspended specie payments, with a view to ascertain the cause of their having done so.

Objection was made by Mr. Whittlesey and Mr. Williams, the latter of whom said he had no objection to the inquiry, but would not consent to receive resolutions of any kind at this period of the proceedings of the house.

Mr. Jarris moved to suspend the rules, to allow him to offer the resolution; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. Chilton called up the consideration of the resolution, moved by him a day or two since, calling upon the president to submit to congress the project of a national bank, and demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rule to allow of its consideration. They were taken, and stood as follows: yeas 50; nays 112. So the house refused to consider.

After some other business which will sufficiently appear in its progress—

The house, in committee of the whole, took up the general appropriation bill, and, after a long and animated debate, considered and negatived three more items of Mr. Vance's proposed "reforms," and then adjourned.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE SENATE.

From the National Intelligencer of yesterday—April 18.

A new chapter is opened in the political history of our country.

A message was yesterday received in the senate from the president of the United States, purporting to be a protest, on the part of that high functionary, against the resolutions expressive of the opinion of the senate touching the constitutionality and expediency of the removal of the public deposits, in the manner in which it was effected, from the bank of the U. States.

The message is of great length, the reading thereof by the secretary of the senate having occupied more than an hour. Having had no opportunity of access to the document, we are only able to give our readers such an idea of it as an imperfect hearing of it will enable us.

The message begins by reciting the resolutions passed by the senate; and, considering it the duty of the president to protect his privileges from encroachment by every means in his power, declares the proceedings of the senate to be unprecedented and extraordinary, and enters his solemn protest against them.

Except as otherwise specially provided in the constitution, the message declares the rights of the executive and of the legislature to be co-equal. In this view the president is of opinion that the proceedings of the senate, in the case referred to, are wholly unauthorised by the constitution. No such power as the senate has assumed is, he says, to be found, in any part of the constitution, granted to either branch of the legislature. To prove this he enters into "a brief analysis" of the powers conferred upon the senate by the constitution. Any proposition acted upon by the senate, to be within the sphere of its powers, he argues, must tend to legislative action, or, in its conclusion, must take the form of some executive or legislative act. The resolutions in question, he says, were not a legislative act; nor did they apply to any treaty or nomination before the senate in its executive capacity. Nor did they relate to any of the cases in which the senate might lawfully act, (in reference to its own organization, &c.) without the consent of the other house.

They have, therefore, in his opinion, no warrant in the constitution. They amount to an impeachment, if the senate had the power: but the house only has power to impeach, and the senate only power to try impeachments when preferred by that body. The resolutions, the president says, embrace charges of usurpation and violation of the constitution, impeachable offences, and declare the president to be guilty of them; thus attempting to exercise all the moral power of impeachment, without observing, in any part of the proceedings the provisions or requirements of the constitution in regard to impeachments. The resolutions, he further argues, prejudice a case in which the senate might have been called upon to act judicially, had the house of representatives preferred an impeachment against the president, &c.

The whole proceeding, the president declares, in very plain terms, to have been an assumption, by the senate, of powers not conferred upon it by the constitution, and utterly incompatible with that instrument, and with the plainest dictates of equity and justice.

The president then goes on to object to the vagueness of the resolution censuring the conduct of the executive. Though comprehensive enough, he says it contains no certainty of time, place or circumstance, which induced any one senator to vote for it. Although the resolution, as originally modified, specified certain particular acts alleged to be contrary to the constitution and the laws, yet at the close of the debate it was so modified as to particularize nothing; a proceeding which the general very pointedly condemns: for, he adds, if the resolution had been put to the vote in its original form, it is presumed it would have received the sanction of but few votes, since the acts specified in it were clearly not contrary to the constitution, &c.

The message then enters into an elaborate exposition of the views which the president entertains of the extent of his own powers, reviewing the provisions of the constitution respecting the power of appointing officers of government, and the construction which they have received in practice. There is no such thing as officers under the control of congress, it is argued, but those which spring from the power conferred upon each house by the constitution to choose its own officers. All the other officers, except judges and the officers of courts, are appointed by the president, with or without the consent of the senate, and subject to his will and pleasure, through the power of removal, he being responsible for their good conduct, and for the due execution of the laws. The treasury department, like others, is wholly executive in its character, and likewise in its responsibility. The custody of the public money is one of the functions of that department. For the discharge of that function it is responsible, not to congress, but to the president. The law establishing the bank of the United States did not, the message argues, change the relations of the president and the secretary of the treasury to the public money: it did not release the former from the duty of directing where the public money should be kept, nor the latter from the executive supervision in relation to the discharge of his duties: it merely superadded a requisition, that, when the secretary should think fit to remove it from the bank of the United States, the reasons for so doing should be laid before congress. So glaring had been the abuses of the bank, so determined it appeared to be to interfere in elections, and to corrupt the press, &c. the message says, that the president had felt it to be his duty to interpose, to check the bank in his career, lessen its power to do mischief, &c. and, in doing so, remove the disobedient secretary who refused to act in the case. In such a case as this the senate has no right, upon the general argument of the message, to interfere. If the senate had a right to interfere in such a case, says the president, it had a right to make its interference effectual. In such a case some future senate might, in order to make such interference effective, omit to perform their own constitutional functions; refuse to pass the necessary appropriation laws, or to confirm proper nominations by the president—thus shadowing out the consequences which might result from such an usurping disposition on the part of the senate, &c. &c.

The message then adverts to circumstances connected with the discussion and passage of the resolution censuring the president, who, it is argued, is the direct representative of the people, whilst the senate only intermediately represents them. The instructions from the legislatures of the states of Maine, New Jersey and Ohio, expressing their attachment to the president, and their hostility to the bank of the United States, and instructing their senators to vote accordingly, are all embodied at length in the message. From these states, the message says, four senators out of the twenty six voted in favor of the censure of the president: had they voted as instructed, 22 only, out of 48, would have sanctioned the accusation against the president, &c.

The message then goes on to depict the awful consequences which might follow from a submission to such usurpations, by the senate, of the rights of the executive; such as aristocracy, anarchy, or dismemberment of the government, &c.

The president also vindicates his private reputation from implications which he conceives to be contained in the vote of censure, &c.

The whole message concludes, for the reasons briefly hinted at above, and other reasons which are not enumerated, (in the course of which the length of term of service and irresponsibility of senators are more than once alluded to), with a solemn protest, which, with the message, the president requests may be entered at large upon the journal of the senate.

The above is a hasty and faint outline, but substantially a correct one of this important executive missive to the senate; which, the reader may very well conceive, produced not a little sensation within the precincts of the capital.

The moment the senate was called to order yesterday, the private secretary of the president of the United States presented a message to the senate, protesting against the resolutions of the senate, touching the removal of the public deposits. The message seemed to have been expected, at least during the morning; for there was gathered an unusually early audience of both sexes. The senate, however, was not full. Mr. Webster, Mr. Chambers and Mr. Bell, were still absent; Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Preston and Mr. Porter, were casually absent—and Mr. Clay had yesterday accompanied his lady, who is in ill health, on her way to a watering place in Virginia, where she is to stay some weeks. As soon as the last word of the message, as its reading was concluded, fell from the lips of the secretary of the senate, Mr. Poindexter addressed the chair. In indignant terms he denounced the message, which he declared could not be considered an executive message, as not pertaining to any of the public occasions on which the president of the United States is authorised by the constitution to address himself to the senate. He considered it an unofficial paper merely, signed by ANDREW JACKSON. In any view, considering it a document not respectful to the senate, he moved that it be not received. On this motion a debate ensued, which continued until 5 o'clock, in which the motion was supported by Mr. Poindexter, Mr. Sprague, Mr. Frelinghuysen and Mr. Southard, and opposed by Mr. Benton and Mr. King, of Alabama. But before taking any question, on motion of Mr. Leigh, the senate adjourned. And so the matter rests.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. John Q. Adams recently said in the house of representatives—

"From the present and approaching pressure upon the nation, it is clear, that no relief is to be expected from any thing that this house will do; and in this hour of difficulty and danger, it is my consolation that nothing that this house can do will have any other effect than merely to refuse or withhold relief. It appears to be the opinion of some, that a decision of this house, whatever it might be, would quiet the agitation of the public mind. That, I believe, is a fallacy. I have seen in the public prints a statement by some of those who have placed some reliance upon appeals to the executive magistrate, that such reliance is in vain. That they must not go to him for relief. However that may be, I tell them, and I believe it is best for them to know the truth, I tell them it is vain for them to come to this house for relief—no such relief will be granted. It is upon themselves that the people must depend for relief—upon themselves alone, and not upon this house, or upon the executive."

Mr. Allan, of Kentucky, when speaking on the resolution offered by Mr. Mardis, said—

"The president having proposed to use the state banks, a question was involved, whether the power of the house, over the public money, was to be surrendered? It then became necessary, before the power was surrendered, to inquire into their condition, that it might be ascertained whether they were capable of performing all that was required of them, and so supply the country with a sound currency. He proceeded to do so, and referring to their number, being 450 throughout the U. States, having a paper circulation of 100 millions of dollars, based on a supply of only 12 millions of specie in their vaults, he inferred that they would not have it in their power to maintain, as the bank of the United States had done, a sound and general circulation throughout the union; and he desired to have the name of any one statesman who could be said to have advocated the state bank, in preference to the United States bank, for such purposes? Such was not to be given. On the contrary, Mr. Jefferson, he proved, by referring to the fourth volume of his correspondence with Mr. Eppes, denounced such institutions, and their paper, as trash; and Mr. Madison acknowledged that, at the formation of the constitution, the mischief of a state bank currency was not foreseen.

But they were to have a metallic currency, while he would be bound to say, that the very party engaged in crying it up, were actively getting up state banks in many places. He instanced Indiana, and other states, and he then argued to prove that after an experience of forty years, such banks were proved to be inadequate to do that agency which had been beneficially done by the bank of the United States. He reverted to and denied the statement that the question of chartering the United States bank was made a question to the people at the last election.

Mr. Ellsworth, when speaking of the resolutions attached to the report of the committee of ways and means contended—

That the executive had drawn to himself a portion of the legislative power of the government. This was the main view which he should present, and in sustaining that view, he did not think it necessary to call in question the motives of the president. The removal of eight or nine millions of dollars was a matter, in itself, of small consideration. But the president had destroyed the legal fiscal agent of the government, and created twenty other fiscal agents. He had entered upon an experiment to put down the bank of the United States, and substitute for it the state banks—to fill up the vacuum created by the withdrawal of the United States bank paper, with the currency of the state banks. The manner in which this was done was bold and daring—and that there was, he believed, some charm in a bold and daring deed, which silenced the dictates of the judgment and even of conscience. The unnatural war waged upon the bank, appeared to him to spring from love of conquest, victory and spoil.

And he asked—

Would any gentleman tell him where the treasury was? Where, he repeated, is the treasury? Does not the president hold in his hands all the money of the government? Does he not claim authority to move the whole public treasure from one bank to another? What guards, what laws, secure the treasury? The treasury was not kept in any known place, under the safeguard of any known laws. Mr. E. declared that he would not give much for all the deposits in the state banks, should this house adjourn, leaving things as they are.

We could not collect the revenue, nor carry on any commercial operations if the experiment should be attempted. But the states were going to extend the paper system. They show no disposition to return to a hard money currency. They are increasing their paper currency to meet the withdrawal of the U. S. paper and we have no control over their operations. He called upon gentlemen to tell him what great interest of the country had suffered from the currency of the United States bank. Had commerce, agriculture or manufactures suffered from it? On the contrary, those interests had been fostered by the bank. This was a young and enterprising country, and required credit as a substitute for capital. In England it was estimated that one dollar in specie afforded to the community a currency of three dollars. The same facilities were still more requisite for us.

The storm was but now beginning which was to pour destruction upon the business interests of this country. His constituents had extensive connexions with the south and west, but their trade was almost entirely cut off. Nothing was made to send abroad, because the difference of exchange was sufficiently great to swallow up all the profits on business. Many large manufacturing establishments had dismissed half of their hands, and some had stopped entirely. No relief was expected from any source, except the abandonment of the experiment attempted by the government.

The correspondent of the "Portland Advertiser" under date of Washington March 13, said—

The offering of memorials is the point on which the senate has almost all their interesting speeches. This was the occasion which brought out Mr. Preston to-day in a speech of about an hour's length. Many of his metaphors were very beautiful, among all of which I must give you one as a specimen. In alluding to Mr. King's remark, that the bank had a lion's strength, he traced out the figure. A lion, it was, he said, but a lion subdued on its lair, shorn of its locks, and folding its limbs to die in peace. As it was breathing its dying breath, and struggling at the last gasp, a huntsman appeared, a huntsman bent upon sport with the noble animal, and determined to try his mettle before he died. He recklessly darts his spear upon him, and the lion arouses in his might, and bounds across the field spreading terror and desolation; and the cry is raised—the horn is sounded, the whole country is alarmed—and I now ask, he exclaimed, after delivering this with the most animated and effective oratory, who is to blame, the noble lion, or the ruthless huntsman?

The following has been published as an extract from a letter from a gentleman of Vermont to a member of congress—

"I am sorry to inform you, that J. S. of T—, has gone by the board. He is one of the few in that place who has traded in both politics and merchandise. Till within a few days of his failure, he persisted in declaring there was no distress! The party obstinacy of such men reminds me of an anecdote of one of Noah's neighbors, which our friend P— tells something after this sort: 'In the time of the flood, one of Noah's neighbors, as the water began to rise, retreated from one hill top to a higher, until he found himself on the highest pinnacle in the vicinity. The water still kept rising, and was actually washing about his middle. While in that predicament, the ark floated along, he called out—'Noah! Noah! for God's sake take us in.' 'No! answer Noah; you had warning of the danger, but took no heed. You must take care of yourself.' 'Well,' says he, 'neighbor Noah, go to thunder with your old ark; I don't think there's going to be much of a storm.'"

MESSRS. MACNEVEN AND SAMPSON.

In consequence of the letter of Dr. Macneven, published in the REGISTER of the 5th inst. he was subjected to much severity of remark from one part of the natives of Ireland resident at or collected in New York, which led to a very large meeting of other "adopted citizens," at the Masonic Hall, for the purpose of sustaining the venerable patriot from the "Emerald Isle;" at which meeting Dr. Hugh Sweeney was called to the chair, supported by John B. Lasata, John Quin, Robert Donaldson, P. S. Casserly, Mr. Flinn and Bernard Graham, vice presidents; and Dudley Perse, Thomas W. Clerke, Michael Burke, William Edmonds, Daniel Geary, William S. Redden and John Benson, were chosen secretaries.

Among others, the following resolutions were adopted unanimously, and with acclamation:

Resolved, That we have full and unshaken confidence in the wisdom, patriotism and integrity of our fellow citizen, William James Macneven, whose clear and plain arguments his opponents have not even attempted to confute, and which they only answer by personalities.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the chair to communicate this resolution to Dr. Macneven.

Resolved, That we have seen with indignation the personal abuse and political slanders, which have been uttered against William James Macneven, having done what every freeman has a right to do in this land of liberty—to express his opinions fearlessly on a great national question.

Resolved, That in coming forward as he has done at this crisis, Dr. Macneven has proved himself to be the same undeviating patriot—the same pure republican—the same defender of constitutional liberty that he was in 1793, when with the lamented Emmet, Tone, Arthur O'Connor and Fitzgerald, bravely, he risked his life in the cause of Irish freedom, and was ready to suffer death sooner than renounce his principles.

Resolved, That we view with disgust the attacks made upon Dr. Macneven's opinions on the currency question, by those very men who privately hold the same opinions—who advocate a national bank, and condemn the removal of the deposits outside of Tammany Hall, but who want the moral courage which he has displayed in preferring honesty and sincerity to mere party bondage, and who have not dared in any of their resolutions to assert those very opinions which they entertain.

Several others of like character were presented and unanimously accepted. One of them pledging to support Mr. Verplanck for the office of mayor of the city.

And also the following—

Resolved, That as adopted citizens of this republic we regard with unfeigned satisfaction the course pursued by our fellow citizen, Judge Porter, of Louisiana, (the first naturalized Irishman who has attained to the distinguished honor of a seat in the senate of the United States), in his manful and strenuous opposition to executive usurpation, and his firm and vigorous support of the constitution and the supremacy of the laws.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, signed by the officers of this meeting, be forwarded to Judge Porter as a token of the estimation in which he is held by the naturalized citizens of New York.

Three more resolutions followed, but having immediate reference to local affairs, are omitted.

The following is Mr. Sampson's letter in reply to the gentlemen who waited on him to request he would preside at the great meeting of adopted citizens above mentioned.

Lispenard street, April 7, 1834.

GENTLEMEN: Gratified as I am by the mark you have given me of your confidence and regard, I must beg leave to decline your invitation to preside at your meeting. I have determined to attend no future meetings of adopted citizens, unless where their interests as such may happen to justify it. The worthy purpose you have in view, might well warrant an exception, were it not that there exists an impediment stronger than my will. A severe and long continued cold has so prostrated my strength, as to render me unfit for any exertion of body or mind.

In approving of the sentiments which were lately expressed by Dr. Macneven, you have my full concurrence except that in respect to the re-establishment of a national bank, I do not find my judgment sufficiently matured to pronounce decidedly. If the wisdom of the national councils shall be able to provide guards and restraints sufficient to prevent its ever becoming a political engine, I should then incline to consider it beneficial and expedient.

As to the letter of Dr. Macneven, in answer to a requisition of his fellow citizens, it is manifestly the production of a sound and vigorous understanding, and I am well convinced the heart of him who penned it is no less sound. It is clear, unsophisticated and unequivocal. He has however been accused of tergiversation and inconsistency, and for this reason, that on the 29th of January, he offered a resolution at his ward, approving the measures of the executive, which in his letter, after a lapse of about two months, he as positively condemned; and for this, without any regard to circumstances, or any account made of the character of the man, gross and unfounded calumnies have been heaped upon his head. It has been maliciously said that he was bribed and corrupted by the bank, and when this was found too revolting, another charge was added, that he had, through pique and disappointment on the refusal of an office, betrayed his friends, his party and his own unsullied reputation.

Is this, my fellow citizens, to be endured? Is this a fair use to be made of the liberty of the press? Are such calumnies to be justified by party spirit, or indulged as electioneering squibs? Are they not blisters on the foul tongue of him who utters them? Is it a maxim to be countenanced by honest citizens, that all is fair in politics, and that the exercise of the most important franchise, upon whose purity all security of our rights and liberties depends, is to be polluted by means so base and unworthy? Is that being true to a party which is false to justice and reckless of common decency? It is from the too great encouragement given to such unworthy means, that I have always stood aloof from party, and rather chosen to renounce its emoluments than bind myself to connive at what ought not to be tolerated.

I have nothing to say against those respectable citizens whose names have been used, I am convinced, against their will, to sanction the denunciation of my honored friend. As to that great and mixed gathering which was brought together on Friday evening at Tammany Hall, for the purpose, as the call expressed it, of removing the imputations of a previous meeting of adopted citizens unfavorable to the present administration, all upon the face of it was fair enough. They had a right to their opinions, and to speak according to their interests, their principles or their feelings. But there is a fact of which I have positive knowledge, and which ought not to be concealed. Before that call was agreed to, another had been proposed, in which the name of Dr. Macneven was specially inserted. It was discontenanced by the more discreet and creditable, and the call upon which the meeting was convened, substituted in its stead; and thus the names of many respectable individuals were artfully brought out to sanction resolutions with respect to Dr. Macneven, which I will confidently assert not one of them approved of. I could as well believe that such men could countenance that emanation from their meeting, which invaded the sanctity of the private abode of my friend, whose hisses and groans, and brutal exclamations, ominous of evil and characteristic of depravity, penetrated the recesses of his dwelling, carrying terror and alarm to the hearts of those females, to whom the ties of nature, and the knowledge of his virtues had rendered him so justly honored and so dear.

But if it be such a crime to change opinions, how many are there that may wince; and why is that indulgence refused to Macneven, which is so largely accorded to others. The times were changeful and eventful. Discussion by the ablest statesmen in the land was daily throwing additional light upon a subject, difficult and intricate in its nature and details; the aspect of public affairs was greatly altered, and those hardy assertions that there existed no pressure or distress became contradicted by facts too positive and peremptory. No man could go abroad into the scene of public affairs or to the seat of business, and shut his ears to the general complaints. Great failures were daily announced, and in those abodes of penury and suffering, where the charitable spirit of Macneven so often directed his steps, he witnessed the too moving instances of the sad truth. And many altered their opinions as the evil became more apparent, the causes more developed, and the subject better understood; and has it not at length been brought to this, that our state is to be laid under mortgage, as our Ireland was once about to be sold to the Jews, and the proceeds applied to stanch the leak.

There is one point, however, upon which I cannot excuse my friend, and upon which I must give him up. That point is the want of worldly policy. In wisdom a man, he is in simplicity a child; in craft or cunning he is unfit to cope with a pigmy. Had he been an artful man, he would have taken pains to show by what steps he arrived at his conclusions, and better prepared his friends, with whom he had acted in confidence, to understand his motives. He would have been circumspect and plausible. But this will be readily forgiven by us who know his nature, and can allow for the abstraction which the examination of such a subject requires. As to the assertion that he has been influenced by pique and disappointment there is this plain answer, that before the resolutions of the 29th January, the three medical offices, including that of which he was deprived by the federal administration, and to which none of the republican governors that have succeeded, neither Mr. Van Buren, nor Mr. Throop, nor Mr. Marcy have thought proper to restore him, were all given away to others, before he offered that resolution so strongly in favor of the measures of president Jackson. Does not this show that, even at the moment when that unworthy slight of one who had devoted so much zeal and talent, and so much of his means to the democratic party, might have been most pungent, he still rose above the mean motives imputed to him, and continued to support his principles. But there are some of such sinister disposition that cannot believe in that generosity which they never felt within themselves, and to whom the heart of an honest and high minded man is a sealed book in which they cannot read.

In one point the adopted citizens have not had fair play, the Truth Teller, to which they look for information, condemned the conduct of the doctor, but omitted the letter to which that censure referred, and some who came to the meeting full of indignation, would have been, I apprehend, somewhat puzzled to say what it was about. But my countrymen have honest and feeling hearts, and will not be long deceived, they will read and judge for themselves, and remember that the man against whom they have been so suddenly inflamed, is the same united Irishman, the same conspicuous and efficient member of the great Catholic committee, whose energies and courage first forced the chain and broke the spell which held the Irish nation in abject slavery. The colleague of the amiable and virtuous Feeling TONE, the bosom friend of that ever memorable hero, the gallant, the accomplished, the lion-hearted THEOBALD WOLFE TONE. They will remember that from these and their interests he has never swerved. That his heart and hand have ever been open to the needy and distressed. That if for their sakes he has sometimes turned from the rich, at no time has he turned his face from the poor man, and if any feelings of gratitude remain, they will come back to him with redoubled affection, and if any honest pride, they will be proud of such a compatriot. I am, gentlemen, with much respect, yours very truly,

WILLIAM SAMPSON.

To Messrs. John B. Lasala, Daniel Geary, William Flinn, B. Graham and Hugh Sweeney.

The following is Dr. Macneven's answer to the deputation from the great meeting of adopted citizens, sent in pursuance of the second resolution:

GENTLEMEN: I sincerely thank you and my fellow citizens whom you represent for this testimony of your approbation. Permit me, at the same time, to use the liberty of a friend and to express to you frankly how much I disapprove of the common distinction taken between native and adopted citizens, as the latter are improperly called. The law knows no such classification, and it is contrary to our interest and our duty to make it ourselves, or countenance it from others. Whenever there is any thing to be lost or gained by it, there will not be wanting persons enough to bring up, without our suggestion that the naturalized is not a native born citizen. We have, on our oaths, renounced every foreign allegiance. We should therefore merge ourselves entirely in the great American family, and whenever we think of any other nation, should only do it in benevolence, or for purposes altogether disconnected from this country.

I will also avail myself of the present opportunity to say, that, with many others, I usually relied, in my estimate of the common effects of political measures, on the sentiments of those of my party who had more time and facility to study them than myself, and conformed to this easy course, until the latter end of January. After this time, in the early part of February, and ever since, the appalling failures of our traders and merchants took place, and that scene of general distress ensued which afflicts us still. This induced me to reflect more seriously on the causes and extent of the evil. I examined and judged for myself, and was struck with those acts of unwise policy, those transgressions against the principles of the constitution and republican government which I have attempted to set forth in my letter. It is no impeachment of my change of opinion, that, in declining to preside at Tammany Hall, I employed expressions of politeness in my answer to two gentlemen whom I respect. But I leave it to any candid mind, whether there is in my note on that occasion any committal of my opinion on the subject for which they met.

Office holders may allege that there is nothing amiss in this community, and perhaps they feel no distress; but persons who have to depend upon productive industry, meet it in their business, and their means of living. How long this state of things shall continue, depends upon the people; but it appears to me clear as noon day, that it must prevail until the general government shall change its measures. As soon as I felt this conviction I was not deterred by obstinacy, false pride or prudential cowardice, from avowing the change.

*An alderman of the city, it appears, was "pretty nearly, if not quite," kicked out of the office of the sons of Emmett, for a charge of this kind against the doctor. Ed. Reg.

I had never come up to that point of subordination, the perfection of the drill, at which the soldier is more in terror of his officers than of the enemy. The only thing I am afraid of is, the being knowingly and wilfully in error. I fear this more than the displeasure of my opponents, such as I respect them, and until they prove to me that I have violated one moral or political principle, they must allow me to hear their abuse with composure.

Be pleased, gentlemen, to accept for yourselves and your constituents, my best wishes and profound respect.

WILLIAM JAMES MACNEVEN.

A LETTER FROM MR. HEISTEL.

Washington, April 9th, 1834.

Messrs. GALES & SEATON:

As it may be interesting to many of my constituents to know why my vote is not found recorded on the very important questions decided in the house of representatives on Friday, the 4th instant, and also how I would have voted on the several propositions reported by the committee of ways and means, if I had been present, I deem it proper to make the following statement in relation thereto; and respectfully request that you will give it an insertion in the Intelligencer for the information of those who have honored me with their confidence and trust, as their representative.

My private business rendering my presence at home essentially necessary in the early part of the present month, I consulted a number of gentlemen of the house, and, amongst those, several prominent friends of the administration, as to the probability of the vote being taken the succeeding week after my leaving here on the all-absorbing subject then under the full tide of discussion. The general opinion was, as far as I could learn, that, as there were a number of members on both sides of the question desirous to express their views, the question would not be forced for at least two weeks from that time. The latter gentleman in particular, assured me that there was no disposition on the part of the majority to cut off debate for a couple of weeks—one of whom said he was going to set out for Philadelphia the same day I left here, and would be absent about as long as I expected to be gone, and that he felt perfectly satisfied that there was no danger that the vote would be taken in that time. He, however, did not leave the city at that time, as he said he would, and voted for the previous question.

Another of them said emphatically he should not give his consent to cut off debate until about the middle of the present month. He also voted for the previous question. It is not my intention to reflect on those gentlemen, for I believe them to have been sincere in what they then said. I merely state facts. Certain it is, however, that I was influenced, and felt safe in then leaving my post, in consequence of those assurances. Under these circumstances I left this on the 28th ult, and returned on the 6th instant, little expecting that the gag law was again to be resorted to so soon after my leaving here. And although my vote would not have changed the result, yet I regret that I missed the opportunity of recording it, so that all concerned might see how the trust confided to me was discharged on that occasion. And in order distinctly to manifest my sentiments to them, I will state that had I been in the house I should have voted against the previous question, which cut off the amendment offered by Mr. White declaring "that the reasons of the secretary of the treasury for removing the deposits were insufficient." And, if the previous question had not been carried, I should have voted for the amendment already quoted. The previous question, however, having been carried, and a separate vote having been taken on each of the resolutions reported by the committee of ways and means, I should have voted against the first resolution of the committee, declaring that "the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered;" because I believe such an institution essentially necessary for the prosperity of the country; and that the continuance of the charter of the present bank, judicially restricted, would subvert the general interests of the community better than could be effected by destroying it and creating a new one.

I should have voted against the second resolution, declaring "that the deposits ought not to be restored." &c. and against the third, declaring that the state banks ought to be continued as the places of deposit, &c. &c. for the two-fold reason, that, in my judgment, they were wrongfully, injudiciously and illegally removed, and that they are now in unsafe repositories—placed there not by the act of the representatives of the people, to whom alone the constitution has entrusted the charge of the public treasure. I should have voted for the fourth resolution, directing an investigation into the conduct and concerns of the bank, and an inquiry into its alleged corruptions and abuses; not because I believe that any good can possibly arise from such investigation, for I am persuaded that the public is already sufficiently informed of the whole course and conduct of that institution, in form a correct judgment in relation to it. And on the action of the house of representatives it can certainly not be designed to have any effect, for by their vote they have prejudged and condemned it already. I should have voted for it, however, to avoid the imputation of shrinking from the investigation, and thereby leaving the impression that it was for fear of the development of mal-practices, which, in my opinion, do not exist.

Thus much I have thought proper to say, as a duty to myself, in warding off any unjust imputation that might be made, that I have skulked from my post to avoid the "responsibility" of voting on a subject now convulsing the whole country—for which, (if I were capable of acting, so unmanly and disingenuous a part), I should most heartily despise myself. Very respectfully,
WM. HEISTEL.

COMPLIMENT TO MR. CAREY.

Philadelphia, March 19, 1834.

On Monday evening, a number of citizens, who had subscribed for the purchase of a pair of silver pitchers,* to be presented to Mr. Carey, as a mark, of respect, assembled at the Mansion House, for the purpose of presentation by col. Fotherall, Adam Ramage and James Ronaldson, the committee to whom that office was appointed. Col. Fotherall, the chairman, delivered the following address:

Philadelphia, March 17, 1834.

To Mathew Carey, esq.

SIR—We have been appointed on behalf a number of citizens, to present you with these two pitchers in token of their high respect for your character, both public and private, the excellence of which has been evinced in your long and unwearied exertions to promote the manufacturing industry of the country, and in your ever attentive anxiety to discharge promptly and efficiently that first of Christian duties, the relief of private distress.

To say to a man who has been so long active on the theatre of life, and who has been so much in the habit of expressing his opinions on controverted subjects, that he has never been in error, would be neither in accordance with the sincerity of our esteem for you, nor complimentary to that good sense which would enable you to distinguish between an unworthy attempt to flatter, and the effusions of good will and true respect. But thus we will say, that for untiring industry, and purity of purpose, we know of no man whom we consider more entitled to the approbation and thanks of his fellow citizens.

Accept for ourselves, who have been so long witness of your active benevolence, our best wishes for your health and happiness.

STEPHEN E. FOTTERALL,
JAMES RONALDSON,
ADAM RAMAGE.

To which address Mr. Carey replied:

GENTLEMEN—The conscientiousness of a correct course of conduct is, to a well constituted mind, not merely an adequate motive, but the highest possible reward for such a course. Next to that reward, is the unbought and unsought for, approbation of fellow citizens, above the suspicion of sinister motives for their suffrages. Under this view of the subject, you may readily conceive how highly I appreciate this very flattering testimony of your regard, and that of your constituents.

To have gratuitously defended—for fourteen years, with all the zeal and energy of my mind, and at a heavy expence of time and money, and—while I continued in trade—at a great loss of business—the glorious cause of the protection of that important portion of the national industry, which furnishes agriculture with those most valuable and extensive markets, that gladden the hearts and enrich the pockets of the farmer, which converts his boundless raw productions into means of comfort and enjoyment for the nation; affords the pabulum for the most important portion of a widely extended and constantly increasing domestic trade, (the best of all trades—a trade, independent, during peace, of foreign regulations and restrictions, and during war, of decrees and orders in council); and at the same time contributes largely to the prosperity of commerce, by immense freights on imported bulky raw materials, (thrice as great as on imported manufactures), and by the exportation of elaborated articles, which form a great and growing item of our foreign trade—to have, I say, thus defended this cause, under almost every possible discouragement, (incomparably more from its wealthy friends than from its inveterate enemies)—a cause in which I never had the least personal interest—will afford me more satisfaction at that serious hour when my accounts with time shall close forever, and those with eternity commence—an hour which, at 74, cannot be very remote—than if I possessed the envied and enormous treasures of a Girard, gloated on and hoarded, till gloating and hoarding were at once terminated by the irrevocable decree of the conquerer death.

How far my efforts in favor of the protecting system, a system so vitally important to national greatness and grandeur, and to individual comfort and happiness—tended to produce the

*The pitchers above referred to are of an Etruscan form, encircled by a wreath of grape vines, and the handles richly chased. The front of each bears the following inscription:—

"Presented to Mathew Carey, esq. by his fellow citizens, as a testimony of the high respect they have for his public and private character, A. D. 1834."

On the side of one of them is the following motto:

"True glory consists in performing acts worthy of record, or in writing matter calculated to render mankind wiser, better and happier."

On the side of the other—

"The constitution: Esto perpetua."

Opposite the mottoes on each is a handsomely engraved device, composed of the Irish harp, decorated with sprigs of Shamrock, and supporting the American eagle.

salutary tariff of 1824—carried by a mere majority of four—to which we owe so large a portion of the prosperity of the country, and its rescue from the abyss of distress and suffering into which it was plunged from 1816 till 1822—3, by the miserable tariff of 1816; to what fatal and infamous conduct we are to describe the deplorable change which has taken place in that benign system; and how easily that change and its ultimate ruinous consequences might have been prevented, by moderate sacrifices, to dispel the wonderful delusion which produced that disastrous result, I leave you to judge.

It would be most extraordinary, if, in the great variety of topics I have discussed since I began to write, above half a century ago, I had not, as you say, fallen into errors occasionally. But when you are so kind as to give me credit for "purity of purpose," I vain would hope you do me no more than justice.

Yours, very respectfully,
MATHEW CAREY.

Philadelphia, March 17, 1834.

REMARKS OF MR. CLAY,

On presenting certain memorials, in the senate, on Monday last. Mr. Clay said he was charged with the pleasing duty of presenting to the senate the proceedings of a public meeting of the people, and two memorials, subscribed by large numbers of his fellow citizens, in respect to the existing state of public affairs.

The first he would offer were the resolutions of the young men of Troy, assembled upon a call of upwards of seven hundred of their number. He had recently visited that interesting city. It is (said he) one of the most beautiful of a succession of fine cities and villages that decorate the borders of one of the noblest rivers of our country. In spite of the shade cast upon it by its ancient and venerable sister and neighbor, it has sprung up with astonishing rapidity. When he saw it last fall, he never beheld a more respectable, active, enterprising and intelligent business community. Every branch of employment was flourishing. Every heart beat high in satisfaction with present enjoyment, and in hopes for the prospect of future success. How sadly has the scene changed! How terribly have all their anticipations of continued and increasing prosperity been dashed and disappointed by the folly and wickedness of misguided rulers!

The young men advert to this change, in their resolutions, and to its true cause. They denounce all experiments upon their happiness. They call for the safer councils which prevailed under the auspices of Washington and Madison, both of whom gave their approbation to charters of a bank of the U. States.

But what gives to these resolutions peculiar interest, in his estimation, is, that they exhibit a tone of feeling which rises far above any loss of property, however great, any distress from the stagnation of business, however intense. They manifest a deep and patriotic sensibility to executive usurpations, and to the consequent danger to civil liberty. They solemnly protest against the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of one man. They would not have consented to such an union in the person of the father of his country, much less will they in that of any living man. They feel that, when liberty is safe, the loss of fortune and property is comparatively nothing; but that when liberty is sacrificed, existence has lost all its charms.

The next document which he had to offer was a memorial, signed by near nine hundred mechanics of the city of Troy. Several of them were personally known to him. And judging from what he knew, saw, and heard, he believed there was not any where a more skillful, industrious and respectable body of mechanics than in Troy. They bear testimony to the prevalence of distress, trace it to the removal of the executive branch of the government, and the recharter of the public depositories; ask their restoration, and the recharter of the bank of the United States. And the committee, in their letter addressed to him, say: "We are, what we profess to be, working men, dependent upon our labor for our daily bread, confine our attention to our several vocations, and trust in God and the continental congress for such protection as will enable us to operate successfully."

The first mentioned depository of their confidence will not deceive them. But I lament to say that the experience, during this session, does not authorise us to anticipate that co-operation in another quarter which is indispensable to the restoration of the constitution and laws, and the recovery of the public purse.

The last memorial he would present, had been transmitted to him by the secretaries to a meeting stated to be the largest ever held in the county of Schenectady, in New York. It is signed by about eight hundred persons. In a few instances, owing to the subscriptions having been obtained by different individuals, the same name occurs twice. The memorialists bring their testimony to the existence of distress, and the disorders of the currency, and invoke the application of the only known, tried and certain remedy, the establishment of a national bank.

And now, Mr. President (continued Mr. Clay) I will avail myself of the occasion to say a few words on the subject-matter of these proceedings and memorials, and on the state of the country as we found it at the commencement of the session, and its present state.

When we met, we found the executive in the full possession of the public treasury. All its barriers had been broken down, and in place of the control of the law was substituted the uncontrolled will of the chief magistrate. I say uncontrolled: for it is idle to pretend that the executive has not unrestrained access to the public treasury, when every officer connected with it is bound to obey his paramount will. It is not the form of keeping the accounts; it is not the place alone where the public money is kept; but it is the power, the authority, the responsibility of independent officers, checking and checked by each other, that constitute the public security for the safety of the public treasure. This no longer exists, is gone, is annihilated.

The secretary sent us in a report containing the reasons (if they can be dignified with that appellation) for the executive seizure of the public purse. Resolutions were promptly offered in this body, denouncing the procedure as unconstitutional and dangerous to liberty, and declaring the total insufficiency of the reasons. Near three months were consumed in the discussion of them. In the early part of this protracted debate, the supporters of the executive measure stoutly denied the existence of distress, pronounced it a panic got up for dramatic effect, and affirmed that the country was enjoying great prosperity. Instances occurred of members asserting that the places of their own residence was in the full enjoyment of enviable and unexampled prosperity, who, in the progress of the debate, were compelled reluctantly to own their mistake, and to admit the existence of deep and intense distress. Memorial after memorial poured in, committee after committee repaired to the capitol to represent the sufferings of the people, until incredulity itself stood rebuked and abashed. Then it was the bank that had inflicted the calamity upon the country—that bank which was to be brought under the feet of the executive, and which it was necessary, at all events, in the opinion of the president, should proceed forthwith to wind up its affairs.

And, during the debate, it was again and again pronounced by the partisans of the executive, that the sole question involved in the resolutions was bank or no bank. It was in vain that we protested, solemnly protested, that that was not the question; and that the true question was of immensely higher import, that it comprehended the inviolability of the constitution, the supremacy of the laws, and the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of one man. In vain did members repeatedly rise in their places, and proclaim their intention to vote for the restoration of the depositories, and their settled determination to vote against the recharter of the bank, and against the charter of any bank. Gentlemen persisted in asserting the identity of the bank question, and that contained in the resolutions; and thousands of the people of the country are, to this moment, deluded by the erroneous belief in that identity.

Mr. President, the arts of power and its minions are the same in all countries and in all ages. It marks a victim; denounces it; and excites the public odium and the public hatred, to conceal its own abuses and encroachments. It avails itself of the prejudices, and the passions of the people, silently and secretly, to forge chains to enslave the people.

Well, sir, during the continuance of the debate, we have been told over and over again, that, let the question of the depositories be settled, let congress pass upon the report of the secretary, and the activity of business and the prosperity of the country will again speedily revive. The senate has passed upon the resolutions, and has done its duty to the country, to the constitution, and to its conscience.

And the report of the secretary has been also passed upon in the other house; but how passed upon? The official relations which exist between the two houses, and the expediency of preserving good feelings and harmony between them, forbid my saying all that I feel on this momentous subject. But I must say, that the house, by the constitution, is deemed the special guardian of the rights and interests of the people; and, above all, the guardian of the people's money in the public treasury. The house has given the question of the sufficiency of the secretary's reasons the go-by, evaded it, shunned it, or rather merged it, in the previous question. The house of representatives has not ventured to approve the secretary's reasons. It cannot approve them; but, avoiding the true and original question, has gone off upon a subordinate and collateral point: It has indirectly sanctioned the executive usurpation. It has virtually abandoned its constitutional care and control over the public treasury. It has surrendered the keys, or rather permits the executive to retain their custody; and thus acquiesces in that conjunction of the sword and the purse of the nation, which all experience has evinced, and all patriots have believed, to be fatal to the continuance of public liberty.

Such has been the extraordinary disposition of this great question. Has the promised relief come? In one short week, after the house pronounced its singular decision, three banks in this District of Columbia have stopped payment and exploded. In one of them the government has, we understand, sustained a loss of thirty thousand dollars. And in another, almost within a stone's throw of the capitol, that navy pension fund, created for our infirm and disabled, but gallant tars, which ought to be held sacred, has experienced an abstraction of $20,000! Such is the realization of the prediction of relief made by the supporters of the executive.

And what is the actual state of the public treasury? The president, not satisfied with the seizure of it, more than two months before the commencement of the session, appointed a second secretary of the treasury since the adjournment of the last congress. We are now in the fifth month of the session; and in defiance of the sense of the country, and in contempt of the participation of the senate in the appointing power, the president has not yet deigned to submit the nomination of his secretary to the consideration of the senate. Sir, I have not looked into the record, but, from the habitual practice of every previous president, from the deference and respect which they all maintained towards a co-ordinate branch of the government, I venture to say that a parallel case is not to be found.

Mr. President, it is a question of the highest importance what is to be the issue, what the remedy, of the existing evils. We should deal with the people openly, frankly, sincerely. The senate stands ready to do whatever is incumbent upon it; but unless the majority in the house will relinquit unless it will take heed of and profit by recent events, there is no hope for the nation from the joint action of the two houses of congress at this session. Still, I would say to my countrymen, do not despair. You are a young, brave, intelligent, and as yet a free people. A complete remedy for all that you suffer, and all that you dread, is in your own hands. And the events, to which I have just alluded, demonstrate that those of us have not been deceived who have always relied upon the virtue, the capacity, and the intelligence of the people.

I congratulate you, Mr. President, and I hope you will receive the congratulation with the same heartfelt cordiality with which I tender it, upon the issue of the late election in the city of New-York. I hope it will excite a patriotic glow in your bosom. I congratulate the senate, the country, the city of New York, the friends of liberty every where. It was a great victory. It must be so regarded in every aspect. From a majority of more than six thousand, which the dominant party boasted a few months ago, if it retain any, it is a meagre and spurious majority of less than two hundred. And the whigs contended with such odds against them. A triple alliance of state placemen, corporation placemen and federal placemen, amounting to about thirty-five hundred, and deriving, in the form of salaries, compensations and allowances, ordinary and extra, from the public chests, the enormous sum, annually, of near one million of dollars. Marshallled, drilled, disciplined, commanded. The struggle was tremendous; but what can withstand the irresistible power of the votaries of truth, liberty and their country? It was an immortal triumph—a triumph of the constitution and the laws over usurpation here, and over clubs and bludgeons and violence there.

Go on, noble city! Go on, patriotic whigs! follow up your glorious commencement; persevere, and pause not until you have regenerated and disenthralled your splendid city, and placed it at the head of American cities devoted to civil liberty, as it now stands pre-eminently the first as the commercial emporium of our common country! Merchants, mechanics, traders, laborers, never cease to recollect that, without freedom, you can have no sure commerce or business; and that without law you have no security for personal liberty, property, or even existence! Countrymen of Tene, of Emmet, of Macneven, and of Saapson, if any of you have been deceived, and seduced into the support of a cause dangerous to American liberty, hasten to review and correct your course! Do not forget that you abandoned the green fields of your native island to escape what you believed the tyranny of a British king! Do not, I adjure you, lend yourselves, in this land of your asylum, this last retreat of the freedom of man, to the establishment here, for you, and for us all, of that despotism which you had proudly hoped had been left behind you, in Europe, forever! There is much, I would fain believe, in the constitutional forms of government. But at last it is its parental and beneficent operation that must fix its character. A government may in form be free, in practice tyrannical; as it may in form be despotic, and in practice liberal and free.

It was a brilliant and signal triumph of the whigs. And they have assumed for themselves, and bestowed on their opponents, a demonstration which, according to all the analogy of history, is strictly correct. It deserves to be extended throughout the whole country. What was the origin, among our British ancestors, of those appellations? The Tories were the supporters of executive power, of royal prerogative, of the maxim that the king could do no wrong, of the detestable doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance. The whigs were the champions of liberty, the friends of the people, and the defenders of the power of their representatives in the house of commons.

During our revolutionary war, the Tories took sides with executive power and prerogative, and with the king, against liberty and independence. And the whigs, true to their principles, contended against royal executive power, and for freedom and independence.

And what is the present but the same contest in another form? The partisans of the present executive sustain his power in the most boundless extent. They claim for him all executive authority. They make his sole will the governing power. Every officer concerned in the administration, from the highest to the lowest, is to conform to his mandates. Even the public treasury, hitherto regarded as sacred, and beyond his reach, is placed by them under his entire direction and control. The whigs of the present day are opposing executive encroachment, and a most alarming extension of executive power and prerogative. They are ferreting out the abuses and corruptions of an administration, under a chief magistrate who is endeavoring to concentrate in his own person the whole powers of government. They are contending for the rights of the people, for civil liberty, for free institutions, for the supremacy of the constitution and the laws. The contest is an arduous one; but, although the struggle may be yet awhile prolonged, by the blessing of God and the spirit of our ancestors, the issue cannot be doubtful.

The senate stands to the breach, ready to defend the constitution, and to relieve the distresses of the people. But, without the concurrence of another branch of congress, which ought to be the first to yield it, the senate alone can send forth no act of legislation. Unaided, it can do no positive good; but it has vast preventative power. It may avert and arrest evil, if it cannot rebuke usurpation. Senators, let us remain steadily by the constitution and the country, in this most portentous crisis; let us oppose, to all encroachments and to all corruption, a manly, resolute and uncompromising resistance; let us adopt two rules from which we will never deviate, in deliberating upon all nominations. In the first place, to preserve untarnished and unsuspected the purity of congress, let us negative the nomination of every member for any office, high or low, foreign or domestic, until the authority of the constitution and laws is fully restored. I know not that there is any member of either house capable of being influenced by the prospect of advancement or promotion; I would be the last to make such an insinuation; but suspicion is abroad, and it is best, in these times of trouble and revolution, to defend the integrity of the body against all possible imputations. For one, whatever others may do, I here deliberately avow my settled determination, whilst I retain a seat in this chamber, to act in conformity to that rule. In pursuing it, we but act in consonance with a principle proclaimed by the present chief magistrate himself when out of power. But, alas! how little has he respected it in power! How little has he, in office, conformed to any of the principles which he announced when out of office!

And, in the next place, let us approve of the original nomination of no notorious brawling partizan and electioneer; but, especially, of the reappointment of no officer presented to us, who shall have prostituted the influence of his office to partizan and electioneering purposes. Every incumbent has a clear right to exercise the elective franchise. I would be the last to controvert or deny it. But he has no right to employ the influence of his office, to exercise an agency which he holds in trust for the people, to promote his own selfish or party purposes. Here, also, we have the authority of the present chief magistrate for this rule; and the authority of Mr. Jefferson. The senator from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) merits lasting praise for his open and manly condemnation of these practices of official incumbents. He was right, when he declared his suspicion and distrust of the purity of the motives of any officer whom he saw busily interfering in the elections of the people.

Senators! we have a highly responsible and arduous position; but the people are with us, and the path of duty lies clearly marked before us. Let us be firm, persevering and unmoved. Let us perform our duty in a manner worthy of our ancestors—worthy of American senators—worthy of the dignity of the sovereign states that we represent—above all, worthy of the name of American freemen! Let us “pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor,” to rescue our beloved country from all impending dangers. And, amidst the general gloom and darkness which prevail, let us continue to present one unextinguished light, steadily burning, in the cause of the people, of the constitution, and of civil liberty.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES—1826.

We give the following curious document without remark—
To the Directors of the bank of the United States:
The memorial of the subscribers, in behalf of themselves and their fellow citizens of Albany, respectfully sheweth—

[*In addition to the specie on that day in the vaults of the Union bank, we have ascertained that there was due to that bank from the other banks in the city of Baltimore, payable on demand in coin, a net balance of $125,007.]

That, since the completion of the northern and western canals of this state, such facilities are given to transportation, that the quantities of country produce brought to this market from the interior of this state are increased to an immense amount; and when to this is added the produce which will be brought to this market from the fertile regions of the north-western parts of Pennsylvania, the state of Ohio, and the territory of Michigan, some idea may be formed of the amount of business which might be done in this place, was there a sufficient moneyed capital located here, to give countenance and support to commercial enterprise. The capital of the banks located here, under state incorporations, is entirely insufficient to afford those facilities to commercial enterprise which the business of the place would warrant, and which the most cautious prudence would justify. The limited capital of our banks forbids the extension of our trade. Merchants of moderate fortune are discouraged from taking up their abode amongst us, from a knowledge that the banking capital of the place is not adequate to the demands which are made upon it for the prosecuting of a sufficiently extensive business to render it profitable; and instances are not wanting of active, intelligent and enterprising merchants removing from this place to the city of New York, to participate in the benefits of an increased banking capital there, although their business has principally been continued with the interior of this state. The western world is pouring its treasures into the market of Albany, but its citizens are doomed, with tantalized feelings, to behold a rich and profitable trade float past them to the city of New York, solely for the want of a sufficient banking capital located amongst them.— Could the produce brought to this place be purchased here, such portion as is not wanted for home consumption might be exported directly from here to a foreign market, (as far as the navigation of the Hudson would permit), and return cargoes, calculated for the interior of the country, might be imported, without the expense of trans-shipment at New York, or the profits of the importing merchant there. These considerations have induced the citizens of Albany ONCE MORE to ask for the establishment of a branch or office of discount and deposit of the bank of the United States in this city.

It is hoped this application will be favorably received, as the same causes which render it desirable to the citizens of Albany to have a branch of the United States bank established here, conclusively shew, that it would be a source of profit to the parent institution. Indeed, it is believed that a branch here would be more profitable in reference to the extent of business done, than several of the branches located in sea port towns. The local situation of Albany renders it an entrepot between the eastern states and the western countries; between the south and the north, and consequently a very extensive currency would be given to the bills issued from a branch here, and the nature of the trade which would be prosecuted here, would in a great measure render the bills of a branch established at this place the circulating medium of the extensive regions whose produce would be brought to this market.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the establishment of a branch here would not only be highly advantageous to this city, but be a source of profit to the parent institution, we hope that the directors of the United States bank will establish an office of discount and deposit at this place.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

April 8th, 1834.

At a meeting of the board of directors held this day, Mr. Eyre, from the committee on the offices, presented the following report, which was read. Whereupon, on motion Mr. Sergeant, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the said report be approved and published.

Extract from the minutes,

S. J. AUDON, cashier.

The committee on the offices deem the close of the first quarter of the year, a proper occasion to present a review of the measures adopted by them, in conformity to the instructions of the board, on the 24th of September, and 21st January last.

During the summer of 1833, it became manifest that the executive of the United States, meditated some signal act of hostility to the bank; and, accordingly, the board took early measures to provide against it. For this purpose, they began by preventing the increase of the business of the bank—by diminishing the time of the loans, so as to make the funds of the bank more available, and finally, in protecting the western offices against a repetition of the effort made during the last year to cause a run upon them.

Accordingly, on the 13th of August, 1833, the board adopted the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That for the present and until the further order of the board, the amount of "bills discounted," shall not be increased at the bank and the several offices.

2. Resolved, That the bills of exchange, purchased at the bank, and all the offices, except the five western offices, shall not have more than ninety days to run.

3. Resolved, That the five western offices be instructed to purchase no bills of exchange, except those payable in the Atlantic cities, not having more than ninety days to run—or those which may be received in payment of existing debts to the bank and the offices, and then not having more than four months to run.

This was the only measure then deemed necessary, the board being anxious to make the bank safe, without incommoding the country. So strong was this conviction, and so reluctant were the board, to diminish its business until it became necessary, that when, on the 16th of August, the government directors offered a resolution "for the gradual reduction of the business of the institution throughout all sections of the country," the board declined even the consideration of it.

It was not until the 24th of September, that as the indications of an approaching act of aggression were multiplied, the board appointed a committee of seven members "to take into consideration what measures it is necessary and proper should be adopted on the part of the bank in consequence of the recent intimations that the deposits of the government are to be moved."

The committee, still unwilling to diminish its accommodation to the community, did not advise any curtailment of the loans, but merely followed out the plan adopted on the 13th of August; of keeping the funds of the bank in a state of activity, and moving them forward gradually to the Atlantic cities, where the bank was most vulnerable by the treasury. They therefore, on the 1st of October proposed resolutions, which were adopted to the following effect:

1st. To extend their third resolution of the 13th of August from the five western offices to the offices of Burlington, Utica, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Natchez and New Orleans.

2d. That all the other offices should likewise purchase bills only on the Atlantic cities, New Orleans and Mobile, not having more than 90 day to run.

3d. To increase the rates of buying bills of exchange.

4th. To restrict the receipt of the state bank notes to those in the same places with the offices;—and

5th. To collect the debts due by distant state banks.

Up then to the 1st of October, 1833, no order had been given to curtail the loans. But all who are familiar with our commerce know that during the summer, in the interval between the old and the new crop, commercial operations and the loans founded on them, subside. This may be seen in the following statement of the reduction of the business of the bank between the 1st of July and 1st of October for many successive years.

That reduction amounted—

In 1833 to 1,940,436 14
1824 to 2,119,291 31
1825 to 1,311,436 75
1826 to 3,012,258 41
1827 to 2,215,818 61
1828 to 1,473,926 98
1829 to 3,258,080 10
1830 to 2,710,644 14
1831 Here there was an increase under the peculiar circumstances of the country during that year.
1832 to 4,723,770 70
1833 to 3,275,694 62

So that, without any orders to that purpose, but in the natural course of business, the loans had diminished from the 1st of July to the 1st of October, 1833, $3,275,694 62—a result occasioned by the voluntary payment at maturity of bills of exchange amounting to..... 3,808,761 00
 And an increase of the local loans..... 533,066 38

Leaving the aggregate reduction..... 3,275,694 62

It was probably in consequence of ignorance of the business of the country that the secretary assigned as a reason for removing the deposits, the "curtailments" and the "oppressive system of policy" of the bank, because the returns of the bank showed a reduction from August to October of $4,066,146 21.

He ought to have seen from the statements furnished to him, that there were no curtailments at all. He ought further to have known that this "oppressive system" consisted of a voluntary reduction by the maturity of bills of exchange drawn at N. Orleans to the amount of.....$2,037,099 59

Of bills drawn at other places.....1,018,215 90

Making.....3,055,315 49
And of a voluntary diminution of local loans of....1,010,830 72

This very reduction in the local loans moreover consisted merely of a voluntary payment by a mercantile house, under an arrangement for paying the 3 per cents. in Europe, by which bills on London were substituted for the sum of $1,046,678 60, advanced to them; so that there was not one dollar of involuntary reduction of the loans at the very moment when the secretary gave as a reason for removing the deposits, the oppressive curtailments of the bank.

About the 1st of October the removal of the deposits took place. Without a moment's previous notice, the bonds actually in the bank were withdrawn from it—and it has since appeared that while the treasury was sending daily and weekly lists, professing to contain all the orders on the bank—secret draughts suppressed from the lists, to the amount of $2,300,000 were distributed for the purpose of being suddenly used, while the bank was ignorant of their existence. It was then for the first time that the bank yielded to the necessity of diminishing its accommodations to the community.

On the 8th of October, the committee appointed on the 24th of September, reported the following resolution, which was adopted.

"That the committee on the offices be authorised to direct such a gradual reduction in the amount and the time of the loans at the respective offices, as may in their judgment be made without inconvenience to the customers of the bank or the community?"

The committee endeavored to execute this authority in such a manner as would accomplish the object of securing the bank without injuring the community, and they accordingly directed a reduction of the loans in conformity to the situation of each office, while at the same time the purchase of domestic bills was left as unrestricted as the state of the bank permitted, in order to facilitate the reduction of the local loans, and also provide the means of transmitting the proceeds of these reductions to the exposed parts of the establishment.

The progress of these reductions will be seen in the annexed comparative statement, marked A, of the condition of the bank on the 1st of October and the 1st of April respectively:

From this table it appears that the total amount of reduction was.....$5,937,385 31
But from this should be deducted the operations in the old suspended debt at the agencies at Cincinnati and Chillicothe, which being settlements in, or for, real estate, are not connected with this movement—they amount to.....239,858 19

So that the actual reduction of loans from the 1st of October to 1st of April, has been only.....$5,057,527 12
During the same period the reduction of deposits was.....7,778,403 41

This will be more perspicuously seen in the following statement:

1833.	Loans.	Public deposits.	Private deposits.
October 1,	60,094,202 93	9,865,435 58	8,008,862 78
November 1,	57,210,604 38	8,232,311 18	7,285,041 88
December 1,	54,453,104 67	5,162,260 63	6,827,173 10
1834.
January 1,	54,911,461 70	4,230,509 63	6,734,866 06
February 1,	54,842,973 64	3,066,561 72	6,715,312 60
March 1,	56,167,829 86	2,604,233 62	7,343,129 92
April 1,	54,806,817 62	2,932,866 74	7,166,038 21
	Reduction on public deposits.....	$6,935,568 84
	private deposits.....	842,334 57
		7,778,403 41
	Reduction of loans.....	5,057,527 12

During the same period the accommodation given to the state banks will be exhibited in the following statement of the balances due from them, and the amount of their notes on hand at these several periods:—

October 1,	$4,719,972	February 1,	$3,211,385
November 1,	4,489,217	March 1,	2,035,985
December 1,	4,083,258	April 1,	2,195,489
January 1,	3,519,385

Leaving the monthly average.....$3,464,956
In the same period the bank has purchased of domestic bills of exchange.....$32,788,704
And of foreign bills.....1,882,620
In the same time it has paid its branch notes, which it was not obliged to pay except where issued, at Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Boston, to the amount of.....19,691,130

Having thus succeeded in bringing the funds of the bank into a state of control, ready to be applied in whatever quarter they be most needed, the committee in the month of March directed the southern offices to abstain from increasing the amount of their purchases of domestic bills of exchange beyond their incomes.

Such is the history and the present state of the reductions directed by the committee.

The examination of it will present the following result:
1st. That the bank never directed any curtailment of its loans until the actual removal of the deposits.

2d. That the only actual reduction of loans took place from the 1st of October to the 1st of December, when the loans were diminished.....$5,641,098 26

While at the same time the public and private deposits were reduced.....5,887,864 63

3d. That from the 1st of December, 1833, to the 1st of April, 1834, the loans have not been reduced, but on the contrary have actually been increasing, and are greater on the 1st of April, 1834, than on the 1st of October, 1833, by.....353,712 95

While during that same period the public deposits, had decreased no less than.....2,239,393 89

4th. That the total reduction of loans from 1st of Oct. to 1st of April, was.....5,057,527 22
While the public deposits had been reduced.....$6,935,568 84
Private deposits.....842,334 57

Making an aggregate of.....7,778,403 41
being a reduction of loans less, by nearly three millions, than the reduction of deposits.

5th. That so far from restricting the trade of the country, it has actually purchased from the 1st of October to the 1st of April of domestic and foreign bills of exchange.....$34,671,324

6th. That the state banks were permitted to be indebted to the bank an average monthly amount of.....3,464,956

These statements may be not inappropriately closed, by a few remarks.

Up to the 1st of October, 1833, the bank of the United States was responsible for the general condition of the currency of the country. After years of effort and sacrifice, it had brought the currency and the exchanges of the union into a condition probably better, in many respects, than existed elsewhere. With this responsibility was mingled the duty of averting every calamity, and mitigating every shock that might, by deranging the currency, injure the community. It was for this purpose that the bank interposed in the disastrous crisis of 1825,—for this that it extended its loans in 1831 until the country could recover from its excessive importations—for this that it defrayed, out of its own funds, the cost of postponing the payment of the three per cents. in 1832—for this that, in the same year, it assumed the payment of the debt to foreigners, lest their demands might add to the troubles of a pestilence which was disordering the commerce of the country. It was for this, in short, that, at all times and under all circumstances, the currency and the exchanges were objects of its constant solicitude.

On the 1st of October, 1833, the violation of the charter of the bank put an end to all that responsibility. On that day, the bank of the United States, as a component part of the financial system established by congress, in which the public revenue was to sustain the public currency, ceased to exist. It became the property of its stockholders—and whether that property should continue to be lent, or should be recalled from the borrowers in greater or less proportions, was a matter for them, and for them alone, to decide. If, therefore, in the effort to sustain its credit, the directors of the bank had reduced its loans more rapidly than consisted with public convenience, the reproach should be on the aggressors who had made this act of self-defence necessary.

It has indeed been asserted, that the bank has made oppressive curtailments; and the motives ascribed for them are unkindness to the executive, and a desire to extort from public suffering a continuance of its charter. Nothing can be more groundless than the allegation, except the causes assigned for it. So far from making any unnecessary curtailments, it has been seen that the bank has made the least possible reduction, consistent with its own security. True it is, that since the bank refused to permit the political interference of the executive officers, it has been the object of embittered hostility; and equally true that this very removal of the deposits was declared, by the secretary of the treasury who refused to make it, to be a "vindictive" act against the institution. But these are feelings which the directors of the bank cannot possibly reciprocate. Nor would they deem so meanly of the spirit and intelligence of their countrymen, as to believe that they would be driven to support what their judgments disapproved by any inconveniences which the bank could occasion. So far from having the remotest wish to cause such sufferings, the bank, if it has erred, has erred on the gentler side of looking less to its own interests than to those of the country. For that extreme forbearance, however, it finds an adequate justification in the extraordinary position in which the country is now placed.

The violation of the laws committed by the executive, is of itself calculated, by destroying confidence, and brenting down the established currency, to afflict and convulse the country. In such a crisis the bank, unwilling to aggravate these evils, has forbore to press its claims, but constantly endeavored to mitigate the severity of the injuries inflicted on the community. It will still continue to do so, whenever it can be done with safety. But that safety is its first duty and must be its chief care.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 9—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, APRIL 26, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,179.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

The protest of the president of the United States to the senate, against a certain resolution which recently passed that body, communicated by message on the 17th instant, will be found, at length, in subsequent pages, and also a second message transmitted on the 21st, explanatory of some matters stated in that of the 17th. These extraordinary proceedings have caused an extraordinary agitation in the senate, as well as in the public mind. It is impossible for us to give the speeches of the senators, though we may briefly notice some of them. They are very animated, and parts of them very severe.

In our journal of the proceedings of the house of representatives, it will be seen that Mr. Wise, of Virginia, and Mr. Peyton, of Tennessee, have introduced certain series of resolutions which have caused much excitement, especially those of the last, as casting a censure on a particular act of the senate. The majority required to suspend the rule concerning the offering of resolutions, was not obtained in either case. We have given the yeas and nays in full. It will be seen that the opponents of the administration generally, with several other gentlemen, supported the motion of Mr. Wise, as well as that of Mr. Peyton—and so it appears that, if the party with whom the latter gentleman acts, had been willing to discuss and support the propositions made by him, the leave asked for would have been easily obtained.

The motion of Mr. Forsyth, in the senate, on Monday last, to insert, in the resolutions of Mr. Poindeexter, a certain paper which these resolutions declared should not be received, must have had for its example a famous decree of the Athenians, who gave the name of a person to the memory of ages yet distant, by declaring it a public offence to pronounce it!

Another strange circumstance appears in this day's proceedings, as we copy them (on this occasion) from the "Globe." The alteration of certain words of the "protest," after it was in possession of the senate, on the suggestion of the private secretary of the president. The practice, in this instance, may have been innocent, but the principle, we think, ought not to be submitted to. The whole paper, and every word on the paper, was the unquestionable property of the senate, and the senate, only, had power to admit an alteration or amendment of it, on application made for that purpose.

The protest, as read to the senate, had been even discussed at considerable length—an action had been had upon it; and yet it was sent forth to the people, not as it was discussed by the senate, but as amended by an individual who had no sort of authority over it, except to keep it safely, and in its original shape. The power to alter a word, extends to the alteration of a paragraph—the change of a part to a change of the whole. It can have no limit.*

Such an excitement as showed itself in the galleries of the senate on Friday the 20th inst. when Mr. Leigh spoke of the compromise of the tariff bill, should not be permitted; and yet spontaneous and involuntary bursts of ap-

*We see it stated by the correspondent of the Philadelphia "American Daily Advertiser" that Mr. Evins said that the word "his," as frequently read to the senate, was altered to the word "the" as published in the "Globe"—and that 40,000 of these altered copies had been printed, &c. In the original, for example, the secretary of the treasury was called his or my [i. e. the president's] secretary, but in the amended copy the secretary.

The account proceeds to say, that, after the secretary of the senate had been called to state the facts, and did state them—Mr. Clay said, "I call upon the senate and the whole country to witness, that the day after a document sent to the senate by the president of the United States was read, and debated, the president sends his secretary to the clerk of the senate, alters the document, and sends it out to the people, with its most odious features concealed."

plause, or of laughter, cannot always be suppressed, even by those who would be among the last men living to treat the senate with disrespect. We think that a distinction might and should be made—though, in all cases, such proceedings ought to be rebuked. The clearing of the galleries, however, is a severe measure—and a general order for the arrest of persons, innocent of the least disposition to offend, will clear the galleries of the senate, without the agency of the sergeant-at-arms—for no freeman, who has a moderate share of respect for the representatives of the people, or for himself, will place himself in a condition in which he may be treated like a felon, because he happens to laugh or make a little noise, inadvertently, as those who are below him oftentimes do. These exertions of "brief authority" should be abated. The general disorderly congregations of individuals, who make up even the always enlightened house of delegates of the state of Maryland, for an example, pushing about in all directions, with hats on or hats off, and loudly talking about what they please—require stillness in the lobby, hats off, and conversation in whispers. If they claim the respect of the people, let these men respect the people. We shall endeavor to "reform" this impudence, in the season for action upon it. We knew not of its existence until at a late period in the last session, or should have brought it before the "bar of the public reason" long ago. We will not lift our beaver, in the presence of any man in America who requires it, and refuses a return of the compliment, unless through the application of force that we are unable to resist by force. There is a sort of puppyism in it, that we will not quietly submit to.

We have briefly referred to the attention paid to Messrs. McDuffie and Preston, in Philadelphia. Several public dinners were given, and innumerable marks of public respect paid to them, by multitudes of the people. That peaceable city was thrown into a state of much bustle and agitation—all other considerations being apparently merged in the great questions which involve the business and prosperity, labor and profits, liberty and safety, of its industrious inhabitants—as they believe.

The enthusiasm of the people was much increased by the arrival of Mr. Webster, on his return to Washington. Masses of the population continually pressed round about him; and he was forced to address a great multitude at the Exchange. His remarks were, of course, strong, and received with shouts of approbation, by the venerable aged and ardent youth gathered together.

On Saturday evening, last Messrs. Webster, McDuffie and Preston were expected to arrive at Baltimore, and, though it rained, about two thousand persons spontaneously assembled on Bowley's wharf to receive them. On the arrival of the steamboat, it was said that neither were on board, and many departed for their homes and places of business; but it was discovered that Mr. Preston was among the passengers, and he was called upon to address the people. He commenced from the steamboat, but the cry of "to the exchange" became general and loud, and, in a few minutes, 2,000 persons were in or about the building. Mr. Preston soon appeared, and delivered a brief but very animated address and exhortation, which was received with peals of applause that shook the lofty dome—the crowd being in a state of feverish excitement.

On Sunday, as it was, Messrs. Webster and Binney arrived in Baltimore, that they might be present in Washington on Monday. It had been given out that they would not come that day, perhaps to prevent the gathering of a crowd; but the people, by thousands, assembled on the wharf. Mr. Webster being called on, made a few animated remarks from the boat, and with a view of dismissing the "friends of the constitution" assembled to meet him. But they would not be dismissed. They formed into a solid body, filling the whole street, and marched up to the City Hotel. Mr. Binney, less personally known to the people than Mr. Webster, nearly effected an escape; but he was recognized and taken into the possession of an enthusiastic multitude. When arrived at the hotel, hardly less than five thousand well dressed persons, very many of them elderly men and of lofty standing in society, were assembled in front of it, and the gentlemen were successively called on to offer a few words of exhortation. They appeared (though with evident reluctance), and addressed the assembly, with much animation and electrical effect. The people were highly excited and oftentimes cheered, but in a subdued tone of voice; and, Mr. Binney having concluded, the crowd retired in an orderly and respectful manner, having cheered the gentlemen on their departure for Washington.

We happened to see both these assemblages of the people—one of them accidentally. We have seen many like gatherings in large cities—but never before witnessed so much earnestness and animation among those classes of persons who attended.

Detailed accounts of the proceedings of the people at various places, and with reference to the late elections in New York—or the more recent protest of the president of the United States against a certain resolution of the senate, would overflow many as closely filled sheets as our numbers of the REGISTER! We must suffer them to pass, with a multitude of speeches, addresses, letters, &c. by or from distinguished individuals, the like of all which we never saw or heard of before. We have passed through several seasons of high excitement, and mixed much with the people, and felt and acted freely with them, at different times, since the year 1797; but a degree of animation now prevails, or is about to prevail, which goes beyond that of past times, and may be considered an augury of exceedingly important public events. And this animation and excitement is hourly increased by the new difficulties experienced in business, and the greatly increasing number of persons cast out of employment. More than 70,000 spindles have been stopped in the neighborhood of Providence, Rhode Island, only; the Union manufacturing company of Maryland have stopped both their great cotton mills, and discharged several hundred persons—another large establishment in the neighborhood is doing only half work, that the people may earn something, and others must soon follow this lead—and a large number of mechanics are without work. All these things add to the excitement. We hope that it will be, every where, and on behalf of all parties, restrained, by just observances of the constitution and laws of the land, and solemn determinations to preserve the public tranquillity, by bearing and forbearing, and rendering such assistance or accommodation to one another as may be in the power of the people, to sustain each other's credit, or relieve each other's wants; and especially with relation to the worthy and industrious of working classes, too generally dependent on their daily labor for actual subsistence.

There was a mighty meeting of the people, and such a feast as was never before prepared in the United States, held near Philadelphia, on Tuesday last, as a rallying "to support the constitution," and "in honor of the late whig victory at New York," a very large delegation from that city being in attendance, bringing with them their frigate rigged and highly finished boat, called the "Constitution," which had been passed through the streets during the "three days." The arrival of the steambot with this delegation on board, and the procession that was then formed, are described in glowing terms. The whole number congregated was supposed not to be less than fifty thousand, multitudes attending from adjacent parts of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, &c. Many cattle and other animals had been roasted whole, and there were 200 great rounds of beef, 400 hams, as many beavers' tongues, &c. and 15,000 loaves of bread, with crackers and cheese, &c. and equal supplies of wine, beer and cider. This may give some idea of the magnitude of the feast. John Sergeant presided, assisted by a large number of vice presidents, &c. Strong bands of music played at intervals, and several salutes were fired from the miniature frigate, which were returned by heavy artillery provided for the purpose, &c. Several speeches were delivered, and a number of regular toasts drunk. At the close of the meeting, nine cheers were given for the "whigs of New York," and the people then, in procession, escorted the delegates from that city to their quarters, and dispersed themselves in peace. On Wednesday a public dinner was given to the New York delegation, &c. Among those who addressed the meeting, was Mr. W. J. Duane.

On Wednesday afternoon a great meeting of the people, certainly the largest that ever assembled in Baltimore on any like occasion,* was held in Monument Square, to adopt certain proceedings with a view of expressing the opinions of the citizens on the late protest of the president of the United States. That venerable soldier of the revolution, and much valued and long useful citizen, gen. William McDonuid, presided, assisted by many vice presidents, &c. The multitude was addressed by John P. Kennedy, Charles C. Harper, Josiah Jones and John V. L. McMahon, esqs. and it is not a little remarkable, (though purely accidental, as we are informed), that each of those gentlemen, in times not long past, were among the most zealous and distinguished supporters of the present president of the United States. A series of resolutions was passed, repudiating the doctrines of the protest and sustaining the senate, and others for the formation of a "state whig society," &c. But all that we can do is to mention such proceedings. If our whole sheet was given up to the insertion of like doings, it would contain only a small portion of them!

We regret to add, that some violent actions were had, with an evident design to disturb or break up the meeting, by persons who had not been invited to attend it—but they were resisted and put down. Surely, every sect or party, religious or political, may assemble together, for the better support or further extension of their own particular opinions—and, if persons holding different opinions attend, uninvited, every principle of common sense, and of respect for themselves, should induce them to remain peaceable. Without the exercise of such mutual regard, our churches, as well as primary assemblies of the people, must be rendered places for battle—for neither party ought or will submit to such interferences. In the perfect freedom which all are entitled to enjoy, there is the best motive of the human heart to protect that freedom in others, that it may be safe for themselves. As decency begets a respect for decency, so does violence beget a spirit of violence, and the end is anarchy unrestrained.

Salutes of one hundred guns are much in fashion, in the eastern states, and several have been fired on account of the result of the New York election, at different places—but we should not have mentioned them, now, perhaps, but for the following incidents:

When the deposits were removed from the office of the bank of the United States, at Portsmouth, N. H. the "democrats" fired a salute of one hundred guns—and when the news of the New York election reached that city, the "whigs" fired a salute of one hundred guns. So far the account was fairly balanced! But in the evening of the day of the latter occurrence, the "democrats" made a great fire of tar-barrels, and burnt certain effigies which were called Webster, Clay, &c. and then the mob proceeded to attack the United States bank, and tore off the sign, eagle, &c. and burnt them, likewise! Some of the rioters were armed, and they drove off the peace-officers and kept-it-up all night. The end is not in these proceedings.

Talking about riots, there was a pretty fair specimen of one in Baltimore, on Tuesday evening last, in South street. Some young "whigs" had met to form a military association, and were attacked by the "democrats"—but the mayor and his posse interfered, and not much harm was done. If it is in this manner that political questions are to be settled—we may well tremble for our country, though resolved to meet the dreadful state of things imposed on a peaceable population. Those who concoct such things have much to answer for, and should be held directly responsible, when dragged forth from their concealments—responsible to public opinion, to the law, or the operation of such force as they had prepared the action of on other persons.

The ardency of the public feeling hourly increases—and its influence is extending with accelerated force over all parts of the country. The result of the New York election, with the now relied on issue in Virginia, have given fresh courage to one party, and even increased the zeal of the other, whose strength is said to be weakening—but these are matters in which we do not interfere. It may be observed, also, that the "anti-Jackson" party are generally assuming the appellation of "whigs"—to this no objection ought to be made, seeing that the "Jackson" party exclusively assumed to itself the "democratic" name; but we think it unjust, and surely inexpedient, for the first to apply the term "tories" to their opponents, though the other side has freely used that of "federalists" in the way of reproach.* "Every good rule works both ways." And, whatever may be the secret purposes or private motives of individuals prominent in the fields of political controversy, the great body of the intelligent members of every party must needs be honest, and ought to be so regarded. The present chief causes which agitate the public mind we do not think, however, should be considered as mere party questions. They involve a condition of things infinitely more important than the upholding of this man, or putting down of that—and new principles of action are pressing themselves on the public attention, in the wreck of confidence, derangement and loss of business, and alarming deficiency of employment for laboring persons, the effect of which no man can yet at all appreciate; and there is a degree of feverishness among the people on these, and other accounts, that indicates a still much worse state of things. Moderation, with firmness, and proper degrees of bearing and forbearing, may relieve present prospects, and restore the nation to the peaceful and prosperous state which we lately enjoyed.

The "Globe" of Tuesday last makes certain "hits" at me—which, for the reason that it is the "official" paper, I shall briefly notice.

The short article in the last REGISTER is quoted, which begins thus:

"It is quite plain, we think, that a great crisis in the history of our country is rapidly approaching, and, perhaps, is closer at hand than is generally apprehended. Things cannot remain and stand still—as they are. There must be a forward or retrograde movement! The usual political questions of parties are merging into personally interesting, or yet loftier considerations," &c.

It is not surprising that the publisher of certain anonymously-murdering-letters should have discovered contemplated breaches of the peace, in this article! The "official" editor knows no more of my principles and practices, than he does of my birth place, to be noticed below. I never, in my whole life, counselled or knowingly excited or aided, in any manner whatsoever, a breach of the public peace, nor encouraged partizans to do what I myself was unwilling or ashamed to do. My education, habits and poor capabilities, have confined me as well to defensive propositions as defensive proceedings. The matters suggested had relation only, and exclusively, to the growing pressure on the money market, and want of employment for laboring men. I had just been informed that several heavy failures were feared, and of large amounts of working people about to be discharged. The first has not yet happened, and I wish that it may not; but the latter is in powerful operation, in this city and its vicinity. I did apprehend, however, that the people, rendered "mad" by the want of subsistence or a waste of means, might commit acts of violence on persons and property, and so lead on to unhappy, but at the same time unpremeditated, events. I do seriously apprehend this. The want of employment has prepared many for a high state of political excitement, and action.

In the same number of the REGISTER it is said that I "complimented" Mr. McDuffie, in simply stating the fact, that he and others had been received with "flattering attentions" at Philadelphia. I paid no other "compliment" than this. Was it not so?

The "Globe" next makes some extracts from a speech of Mr. McDuffie, in which he quoted a few sentences from the REGISTER.

That proceeding was promptly met at the time—and it is not at all necessary to recur to it now.

But—would it have been sinful to have complimented Mr. McDuffie? Are hard words, used in the heat of discussions, to remain as perpetual barriers between individuals, and on all subjects? If so—what would be the relation between president Jackson, and my old brother editor, Mr. Ritchie? I have often heard the personal opinions of the former concerning the latter—and every body has seen the prophecies of Mr. R. as to gen. Jackson's election to the presidency. And how would it be with nearly every person who now is regarded as of the most faithful and familiar friends of the president? It is the fashion of the "organized press" of the present day, to call every man an "apostate," "turncoat," &c. if changing his political opinions against the policy which the president is pleased to prescribe—but the "organized" should recollect that changes to their side are as well the acts of apostates and turncoats! Thus, if a person leaves one religious society and joins himself to another, his old associates may consider him a renegade, but the other respects him as a saint. The difference between revolution and rebellion is only in the success, or want of success, as may happen—and "Treason has never prospered—what's the reason?"

Why—when it prospers none do call it treason?"

And it is possible, also, that we may hate nullification less than consolidation.

The last paragraph of the "Globe" concludes thus, speaking of the editor of the REGISTER—

"Thank God he is not an American by birth. He has not the heart of an American."

Finis coronat opus! As to the land of my nativity—my paternal grandfather, as I have always understood, was born either at "Upland" or Philadelphia—my father at Philadelphia—myself near the banks of the Brandywine, and a few days after my mother had narrowly escaped with her life from the bayonet of a British soldier, who bravely attacked her, just previous to the battle. My father's brother (also born in Philadelphia), died not long ago in that city of extreme old age; and it is now one hundred years since the time of his birth. My mother was born at Wilmington, Del. about eighty-five years ago, and was of the family of the Ways, distinguished among the companions, disciples, or followers of William Penn.

Of my "heart" I shall say nothing—except to thank heaven that such persons as the editor of the "Globe" have no part in, or influence over it.

The following queer paragraph appears in the Philadelphia "Sentinel"—the "by authority" paper—

We understand, that there will be no election for a member of congress in the room of Mr. Lawrence, the newly elected mayor of New York, until November next. By that time, there is reason to hope, that the extraordinary political excitement, which now prevails in our sister city, will have subsided, and the selection of a suitable successor be calmly and dispassionately made.

This idea must have been matured in the same shop in which the notion was entertained of postponing the charter election of Albany, until a more "convenient season."

The "Pennsylvanian" speaking of the senate of the United States, says—

"The democrats never heartily sanctioned it, and now, having the power, should amend or get rid of it once and forever!"

And then cautions the senate against refusing to pass the appropriation bills, adding—

"Let them, if they dare, and hasten the bursting of the storm which is already lowering above their heads. They have yet to learn to what an indignant people may be aroused."

We hope that the sedate and peace-loving editor of the "Globe," will take the editor of the "Pennsylvanian" in charge—lecture him soundly, and tell us from whence he came, and when, and who he is.

Our old friend of the "Richmond Enquirer" is thrown upon two horns of a dilemma by the president's protest, and is in the same "fix" that the proclamation placed him in—that of being compelled to argue on both sides. If we had room, we should give his essay of Tuesday last, for it is, indeed, a funny one. When his rudder escapes Seylla, the prow is in danger of Char-ybdis; and there is no "middle way" of safety unless in the craft of the ink-fish, which sometimes conceals itself, and escapes, by blackening the space that it holds in the sea.

John H. Eaton has been appointed by the president of the United States, with the advice and consent of the senate, to be governor of the territory of Florida, to succeed governor Duval, whose term of service has expired. The nomination, made to the senate some days ago, was confirmed yesterday. [Nat. Int. Ap. 25.]

RHODE ISLAND. Mr. Francis, being supported by the anti-masonic and administration parties, has been re-elected governor of this state, by a majority of about 125 or 150 votes. Last year his majority was 749. The political character of the legislature is disputed.

CONNECTICUT. Contrary to first reports, it appears that, by the division of the votes between three parties, Mr. Foot has not been elected governor, by the majority required. He wants from 40 to 60 votes. So the choice devolves on the legislature.

NEW YORK, (CITY), ELECTION. The following is published as shewing the official returns of votes, at the late election:

NEW YORK. House of assembly, April 19. Mr. Gansevoort reported in favor of the bill from the assembly relating to the city of Albany.

Mr. Livingston moved to refer this bill to the attorney general for his opinion in relation to the constitutionality of that section which authorises some officers of the city of Albany to hold their places for six months after the time for which they have been elected by the people shall have expired. His present opinion was, that if they could be legislated into office for six months, they might be so continued in office for any length of time.

The motion to refer to the attorney general was adopted.

[It is said that the object of this bill is to continue certain persons in office, to avoid a popular election, at the present time—the period fixed in the charter for choosing them being close at hand.]

On another day, in the assembly—
 Mr. Humphrey offered a resolution directing the committee on the militia and the public defence to inquire into the expediency of removing the state arsenal from the city of New York, and selling the lot on which it is situated.

Mr. H. said that recent events had demonstrated that the arsenal situated as it was in the centre of the city of New York, was not a safe depository of the public arms and ammunition. It was evident that at any time an excited mob might get possession of the arsenal and turn the arms intended for the protection of the whole against one portion of our citizens. There was no object of public utility to be answered by retaining them where they were. For all purposes of supplying the militia, an arsenal thirty miles off would be as valuable and convenient as one in the centre of the city. He trusted that extended remarks were not necessary on this subject. It must force itself on the judgment of every member of the house, that it was unsafe to place arms and ammunition where they might be seized by a mob under any pretext which they might choose to assign at a moment of excitement. It was owing to a merciful interposition of Providence in assuaging the passions of a multitude, that the city of New York, was not very recently the theatre of a scene of slaughter that would have disgraced this country forever. He hoped that another opportunity would not be suffered to pass by without guarding against the recurrence of such a calamity in future.

Mr. Myers said he had no objection to the reference, as it proposed simply an inquiry. He conceived it to be a libel on the citizens of New York, to say that they were not to be trusted with arms and ammunition in the centre of the city. The great mass of the people ought not to be held responsible for the acts of the few excited persons who recently broke into the arsenal. Such scenes as the gentleman had referred to, were uncommon, and peculiarly so, considering the very great number of the inhabitants of the city. Still he could not object to an inquiry, and he was in favor of having a report on the subject.

The resolution was then adopted.

NEW JERSEY. The local elections in this state, as referred to by Messrs. Frelighuysen and Southard, in the senate, are said to shew a great revolution in public opinion.

PENNSYLVANIA. The following resolutions were adopted unanimously in the legislature of this state:

Whereas, an application is now pending in the congress of the United States, for the repeal or reduction of the duty on Nova Scotia and Liverpool coal; therefore,
Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, &c.

That in the opinion of this legislature, the repeal of the duty on foreign coal would be against the best policy of the country, and particularly injurious to the interests of the people of Pennsylvania; and that if any alteration be made in the tariff of duties upon these articles, it should be rather increased than diminished.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of the above resolution to each of our senators and representatives in congress, as an expression of the opinion of the legislature of Pennsylvania.

So the legislature of Pennsylvania, two years ago, passed resolutions in favor of rechartering the bank of the United States!

VIRGINIA. The "National Intelligencer" gives what it calls a corrected table of the return of members of the house of delegates, so far as received—and shews that 25 administration and 39 "opposition" members have been chosen. The whole number is 134. It is said—of those who yet remain to be heard from, that a decided majority is anticipated in opposition to the recent measures of the administration.

[We have some further accounts from Virginia. Several more counties are reported against the administration, two of which are changes. Even Culpeper, the late "brag" county of Mr. Ritchie, is against him—375 to 359. Mr. R. expected, at least, 500 votes in this county, and said that Mr. Hill, (the unsuccessful candidate), was the "very strongest man" in it. But the "protest" arrived on the day of the election, and capsize all calculations that had been made on Culpeper. It is the opinion of well informed men, that, if the protest had been published and spread through the state before the elections commenced, the friends of the administration, in the next house of delegates, would have been "like angels' visits—few and far between."]

BANKS—CURRENCY—AND THE TIMES.

The very respectable directors of the bank of Potomac, and Farmers bank of Alexandria, have given notice, under their hands and seals, that they jointly and severally have bound themselves, and their heirs, &c. to guaranty the payment of all notes issued by said banks, or claims against them, on account of deposits or otherwise—which guaranty extends to the period for which they have been elected. This proceeding will do much to quiet the public mind concerning these banks.

A similar guaranty has been made and proclaimed by the directors of the bank of the Valley of Virginia, at Leesburg.

The following shews the state of the currency, at Louisville, Kentucky, on the 12th instant—

United States bank notes, wherever payable—par; bank of Kentucky and Commonwealth bank 15 per cent. dis. Tennessee, best 2½ dis. others 5 dis. Ohio, notes of many banks not received—others 2½ dis. Virginia, all the banks, 2½ dis. Mis-

Mississippi, all the banks, 10 dis. Louisiana, do. 5 per cent. dis. Pennsylvania—many uncertain—Girard bank 2½ dis. Indiana, (one bank), 2½ dis. Michigan 2½ dis. Alabama, all the banks 12 discount.

The Washington Globe lately said the friends of the constitution, (meaning the friends of the administration), will not compromise with their consciences and oaths, by conjuring up alternatives. They have no alternative, but to go resolutely against a national bank, by whomsoever proposed, and in whatsoever form. This is plain English.

George Brown, esq. having resigned the office of president of the Mechanic's bank of Baltimore, with the view of giving his attention to the affairs of the house of Alexander Brown & Sons, which devolved upon him by the death of his father, the board of directors of that institution have unanimously elected John B. Morris, esq. president in his room, and passed a well deserved and highly complimentary resolution concerning Mr. Brown.

It is known that large quantities of specie have lately been imported into the United States. Nearly the whole of it, however, it appears, belongs to the bank of the United States. The Philadelphia National Gazette of Saturday says—"We understand that there has arrived, since October last, at the ports of New York and Philadelphia, no less than two millions three hundred thousand dollars for the bank, and that six hundred thousand more are expected—making an aggregate of nearly three millions; so that the bank itself is the real introducer of specie in those ports."

On the 19th of March, 1816, Alexander J. Dallas, then secretary of the treasury, in a letter to congress, on the national currency, made the following important declaration, founded upon actual practical experience:

"I cannot conclude this letter," says Mr. Dallas, "without an expression of some solicitude at the situation of the treasury. The state banks have ceased to afford any accommodation for the transfer of its funds. The revenue is paid in treasury notes, where treasury notes are below par; and the public engagements can only be satisfactorily discharged in treasury notes, which are immediately funded at 7 per cent. &c. Discount and speculations are abroad; and all the estimates of the amount of the funded debt, created since the commencement of the late war, will probably fail, unless the wisdom of congress shall effectually provide for the restoration of a uniform national currency."

Mr. Dallas, in his annual treasury report to congress, on the 6th of December, 1815, observes:

"Of the services rendered to the government by some of the state banks, justice requires an explicit acknowledgment. It is a fact, however, incontestably proved, that those institutions cannot at this time be successfully employed to furnish a uniform national currency. The failure of an attempt to associate them with that view has already been stated. Another attempt, by their agency in circulating treasury notes, to overcome the inequalities of the exchange, has only been partially successful," &c. "The truth is, that the charter restrictions of some of the banks, the mutual relations and dependence of the banks of the same state, and even banks of different states, and the duty which the directors of each bank conceive that they owe to their constituents, upon points of security or emolument, interpose an insuperable obstacle to any voluntary arrangements, upon national considerations alone, for the establishment of a national medium through the agency of the state banks."

A great deal of suffering has been caused in Baltimore on account of the sudden and unreasonable depression of the current value of the notes of the banks of Virginia—as sound and wholesome, we believe, as those of any other state. A very large part of our common circulation was in these notes. Some were, partially, received in certain of our banks, and the rest used for the discharge of debts and bills not payable in bank, and fifties of thousands of dollars in them changed hands every week, being turned over and over and over again. The baker and the butcher and the grocer, and store-keeper received them as par money, and so they were paid out to working people of every description as a sound currency, which might be converted into bank currency, at 1 per cent. loss only, or a little more. But few of these notes were sent home by those who dealt in them. The brokers exchanged, at their own counters, in one way or another, the amounts received by them; and they were preferred, at a small rate of discount, by those who brought in Virginia flour, cattle, &c. But when the high discount of 5 or even 10 per cent. was demanded, the people fought against and rejected them, and their circulation was only at or from the brokers' offices; and the bank money of the brokers was soon swallowed up in purchases of them, to be relieved only by time and expense in sending them home. It is not easy to fix a probable amount of "Virginia money" circulating in Baltimore and its immediate vicinity, a month ago—but if we said 200,000 dollars, we think that it would be below the real sum. The effect of the sudden retirement of such a large amount from the continually-moving business of the people, superadded to the general want of currency, may be easier anticipated than described.

The Williamsport Banner states "that the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company have resolved to issue its own notes in payment for labor, &c. on the canal. These notes will be redeemed in twelve months, with interest at 4 per cent. (by the sale of the stock of the state of Maryland, and the District corporations) which are to be conveyed to trustees for that purpose. They will also be received by the canal company in payment of all debts due to it, and likewise for tolls. This measure has been resorted to by the company because it was found impracticable, under the existing state of the money market, to convert the stocks it held into money, without great loss."

We have reports of a pressure on the money market at New Orleans that are too extravagant to be believed. They would imply that a season of almost universal bankruptcy had been arrived at.

Rates of discount, &c. on bank notes at Philadelphia, April 19—broken banks, in all cases, excepted. Banks of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and Vermont, 1½ a 2 per cent. discount; New York (city) par a 1; Pennsylvania 2 a 4; New Jersey, several at par—others 1 a 3; Pennsylvania, country banks—several at par, others various, from 1½ to 5; Delaware, at par a 1; Maryland—Baltimore notes, par a 1—country banks 3 a 5; District of Columbia 5 a 10; Virginia 5 a 10—except Wheeling 3 a 5; North Carolina and South Carolina 3 a 5; Georgia 5 a 10; Ohio 3 a 10; Kentucky—Louisville 4 a 6—other 13 a 16; Tennessee 4 a 6; Alabama 7 a 12; Mississippi 7 a 10; Louisiana, at New Orleans, 5 a 8; Michigan 3 a 5; Indiana, Illinois, &c. no sales. Canada banks 6 a 8. These rates are charged on what are called the notes of "specie paying banks"—and the excessive amount of them shows a great scarcity of money, with much want of confidence; for surely, without disparagement to the Philadelphia banks, others are equally solvent, and as able to meet their engagements.

The Globe says—"We learn that on the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th of this month, $1,292,135, was imported into one city north of us. This shows how readily our commerce may supply specie currency for general circulation."

But the Journal of Commerce remarks—"A man may die readily after being beaten until his senses are benumbed. And it is with such a readily that specie is now importing. It is the consequence of an agony in the money market, which forced down the price of exchange lower than it had been for twenty years, which stopped importation, and indeed, suspended all business. We beg to be delivered from these ready operations."

And we add—the money chiefly, if not in its whole amount, belongs to the bank of the United States, who is arming herself for yet worse times, or preparing to make a large profit on the sale of specie, when commerce, in better times, shall require the use of it. Specie is under par, from the want of means to purchase it—that is, because of the low price of commodities and labor in the United States, or the surplus of both.

The Girard bank, Philadelphia, will cease to receive the public deposits on the 1st of July, ensuing.

It is officially announced that the Farmers' bank of Catahoochee, at Columbus, Georgia, has failed.

The "bank of Salisbury," on the eastern shore of Maryland, has failed.

Last week's list of applications for the benefit of the insolvent laws contain 16 names—one of which is from a colored man and two from Baltimore county, leaving 13 for the city. We can identify only three persons on this list; but the names of three of them are found on the "no pressure" memorial from Baltimore.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

April 18. The chair communicated certain resolutions of the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania, on the subject of a general standard of weights and measures; which was read and referred.

Mr. Kent, of Md. presented a memorial from citizens of Prince George's county, favorable to the restoration of the deposits, which was read, referred, &c.

[Mr. Kent, on this occasion, pronounced a long and able speech, which would be gladly made room for—in times less busy than the present.]

Mr. Wright presented five memorials from citizens of the towns of Pittsford and Seneca Falls, and the counties of Rockland and Rensselaer, opposed to the restoration of the deposits, which were referred, &c.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion not to receive the message of the president of the United States on the subject of the resolution of the senate of the 28th ult.; when

Mr. Rich addressed the senate for about two hours. He had (in reply to Mr. King, of Alabama, who had claimed for the present the merit of adjusting the tariff question), just paid an incidental compliment to Mr. Clay and Mr. Letcher for the agency they had in adjusting the tariff question at the last session, when he was interrupted by loud plaudits in the gallery.

The chair suspended the discussion, and ordered the galleries to be cleared.

While the sergeant-at-arms was in the act of clearing the galleries the noise was repeated; whereupon

Mr. Benton moved that the persons who were disturbing the senate should be taken into custody.

Mr. Moore doubted the propriety of the motion, considering it utterly impracticable. The galleries were clearing as rapidly as possible, and he was not disposed to vote for the motion.

Mr. Clayton said, that he regretted the motion had been made; but since it had been, he would vote against it. The gentleman from Missouri placed it on the ground of a contempt of the senate—he did not view it in that light; but as an indirect expression of public opinion; he would not consent that the senate should array itself against the people.

Mr. Benton would not be misunderstood. He did not move to take into custody those who, in an unguarded moment, applauded the sentiments uttered by the senator from Virginia, but those who, long after that gentleman had taken his seat, continued to outrage and insult the senate.

Motions were successively made to adjourn, and to lay Mr. Benton's motion on the table, which were respectively declared out of order by the chair.

Messrs. Calhoun, Poindexter, Ewing and Bibb, severally opposed the order on the ground of its impracticability, its unconstitutionality, inasmuch as any such order would be a general warrant of arrest, which could not be legally issued, as all warrants emanating from the senate, to be within the pale of its constitutional power, must designate the person and the offence committed. A general warrant could not be issued in any free country. The interruption in the galleries was regretted and condemned; and, while the power of the senate to protect its own deliberations was fully maintained, the idea of carrying it to excess was as freely rejected.

Mr. Benton hoped that those who heard him and those who were taking notes, would not represent him as making a motion for a general order of arrest. He then withdrew his motion, assigning as his reason that the people were all gone.

Mr. Leigh then resumed and concluded his remarks; when Mr. Ewing obtained the floor, but forbearing to proceed at so late an hour, yielded the floor for the present; and

Mr. Wilkins then moved the senate to proceed to executive business.

Mr. Clayton opposed the motion on the ground that it did not become the senate to transact any other executive business until the present debate was terminated, and the communication of the president disposed of.

Mr. Wilkins explained, that his only reason was to consider a treaty which would require ratification in a few days, and then withdrew his motion; when the senate adjourned until Monday.

April 21. A message was received from the president of the United States, explanatory of some of the expressions and arguments contained in his message and protest, communicated last week, which was read. [This message will be found in a subsequent page]. It gave rise to an animated debate, in a discussion growing out of the original message, and this amendment to it. Mr. Poindexter rose and said he desired to make the same motion in regard to this, that he had made relative to the original message; he moved to lay this on the table, and would send to the chair the following resolutions which he offered as a modification of his original motion, that the paper be not received, and which he moved to print.

The resolutions were then read as follows:

"Resolved, That the president, in transmitting the paper which he did to the senate, on the 17th instant, which he requested to be placed on its journals, as an executive protest, against a resolution passed by the senate, made a communication not authorised by the constitution, nor warranted by that mutual interchange of communications which the discharge of official duties render necessary and proper between the legislative departments of the government.

"Resolved, That the president, in the paper above referred to, assumes powers in relation to the senate not authorised by the constitution, and calculated, in its consequences, to destroy that harmony which ought to exist between the co-ordinate departments of the general government; to interfere with the senate in the discharge of its duties; to degrade it in the public opinion; and finally, to destroy its independence, by subjecting its rights and duties to the determination and control of the chief magistrate.

"Resolved, That the communication of a paper of such a character, with the declarations that accompanied it, is a plain, an open breach of the constitutional rights and privileges of the senate, and that it cannot be received by the body, without a surrender of the just powers confided to it by the constitution, in trust, to secure the liberty, and promote the prosperity of these states, and which the members are bound to maintain under the sacred obligations of an oath.

"Resolved, therefore, That the paper be not received by the senate."

A debate of some length then ensued, upon the supplemental message of the president, and Mr. Poindexter's motion, in which Messrs. Preston, Forsyth, Ewing, Poindexter, Clayton, Webster and Clay participated.

The supplemental message was then laid on the table, and the senate proceeded to the special order of the day, being the motion of Mr. Poindexter, that the president's protest be not received, as modified by his resolutions.

Mr. Ewing took the floor and spoke at length in support of the motion, and the resolutions, and when he concluded, Mr. Keene rose to speak to the question, but gave way to

Mr. Wilkins, who moved to go into the consideration of executive business; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. Forsyth said, before the senator from Illinois proceeded, he wished to make a motion by way of amendment, and accordingly moved as an amendment to the resolutions, after the words "passed by the senate," in the first resolution, to insert the protest at length, and also the supplemental message.

Mr. Leigh asked whether he was to understand that the mere motion of the gentlemen from Georgia, would have the effect of spreading the protest on the journal.

The presiding officer, (Mr. King, of Ala.) replied that it would.

Mr. Bibb then objected to the motion as being out of order, inasmuch as it went to defeat the very intention of the resolution.

Mr. Calhoun thought it a very novel case. The object of all rules was to carry into effect the intention of the body, and the very point under debate was whether the paper should go on the journals. He, therefore, submitted whether the main object could thus be defeated by a side movement.

Mr. Forsyth desired to incorporate the true character of the message in the resolutions, in order that both might be presented together.

Mr. Calhoun then insisted that Mr. Forsyth's motion be referred to writing in accordance with the rules.

Some conversation then took place between Mr. Clayton, Mr. Clay, and the secretary, about certain alterations alleged to have been made in the protest after it had been presented to the senate—the printed copy not being identical with the manuscript message.

The secretary being called on to explain that matter, stated that the private secretary of the president, Mr. Donelson, called on him the day following the presentation of the message, and desired to make a few verbal corrections of errors, which existed in the message. But the secretary believing that he had no authority to allow any, the least alteration to be made in the paper, told Mr. Donelson so, who was perfectly satisfied with the answer. The secretary afterwards made pencil marks of the corrections suggested by Mr. Donelson, above the words in the manuscript proposed to be struck out, which now appear on the paper.

Mr. Forsyth then sent to the chair the original paper, as his motion reduced to writing, in accordance with the requisition of Mr. Calhoun to that effect.

Mr. Poindexter and Mr. Calhoun then objected that the document itself could not be so used—that it was out of order. The chair decided that it was in order.

Mr. Calhoun then appealed from the decision of the chair. Mr. Webster approved of the appeal. If the motion was rejected, the gentleman from Georgia might put the document in his pocket, and move off with it. It was our own document, not that he had any particular desire to have it, but he would rather have it in our own power. The gentleman had no right to the document of the senate.

Mr. Preston said, it was remarkable how gentlemen contrived to make one document perform so many offices. One day it was a protest—another an answer. And while in discussion here, it assumes another shape by the interposition of the private secretary of the president, and now it is an amendment to a resolution.

Mr. Calhoun said he would not hesitate to withdraw his objection, if the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw his motion, and send the paper back where it came from.

Mr. Forsyth said he might suppose from the manner in which his motion had been treated, that gentleman intended to deprive him of his right to have his proposed amendment on the journals. The rules of the senate did not require him to have his motion written out expressly for the purpose; for if he should be required to copy the message, it would take him several hours, and the time for offering it would pass away. The gentlemen were to use it as a means of invective against the president, and he (Mr. F.) was not to be permitted to use it in his defence. As respects the alleged alterations, he would say, that the paper was the president's till it was received by the senate, and he had a right to alter it till it was received by the senate. And what were the alterations? Was there any attempt at fraud or covertly effecting them? The president did not desire, nor was he inclined to shrink from anything that he had ever said or done, either here or elsewhere.

Mr. Frelinghuysen then moved that the senate adjourn; which was agreed to on a division of 19 to 18.

The senate adjourned.

April 22. The chair communicated the annual commercial statements from the treasury department.

Mr. Webster rose and said, it would be remembered that not long before he left his seat, on leave of absence, he had had the honor of presenting a memorial from citizens of Albany, complaining of recent measures of government. He had been authorized on that occasion to state, and had stated, that the number of signers was about 2,800. He soon saw that this statement was denied, and that only thirteen or fourteen hundred names were on the memorial; and the gentleman from New York, Mr. Wright, alluded to this apparent deficiency. This mistake arose from a long roll of names being left out of the package handed to him. This omission has been supplied, and, to be sure against further error, he had asked an officer of the senate to have these additional names counted, and he certifies them to amount to 1,455. Here they are, sir—the original signatures, and here comes with them a regular affidavit, verifying the paper and accounting for the omission. This makes up, sir, the number as originally stated; and I hope will be satisfactory. If it should not be, and if it would give gentlemen any gratification to receive an additional five hundred, or thousand names.

he imagined little pains would be necessary to furnish them that gratification.

Mr. President, (said Mr. W.) in one of those unrivaled speeches of Mr. Burke, in which he indulged his admiration of America, he says, when speaking of the growth of our population, "whether I put the present numbers too high or too low, is a matter of little moment. Such is the strength with which population shoots in that part of the world, that, state the numbers as high as we will, while the dispute continues the exaggeration ends. While we are discussing any given magnitude, they are grown to it."

Sir, a similar sentiment would be just, in regard to the numbers among our fellow citizens, who are rallying to oppose the recent measures of government. State the numbers as we will, if the statement be not true to-day, it will yet probably be true to-morrow.

Mr. Wright rose to move the printing of the names. He added, that the senate would do him the credit to say, that he had expressed his belief that there was some mistake about the matter. He moved that these names be printed.

Mr. Webster expressed his wish that the names might be printed. He would do the justice to the honorable member to say, that he understood him to have expressed himself as he had stated.

The paper was then referred and the names ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster then said he had to present to the senate a memorial from the farmers, manufacturers, mechanics and traders of the town of Adams, Massachusetts, complaining of the recent measures of the government. The memorialists state that there were 1,200 persons in that town who have been engaged in manufacturing, who had catered into those pursuits under the assurance of protection from government. That, amidst prosperity, their career has been suddenly arrested, some of the establishments have been obliged to stop, and others to dismiss their hands, more or less, and many individuals have fallen into great want and distress.

These memorialists aver, sir, that that is true, which I have more than once predicted would soon be found true; and that is, that the measures of the administration tend to make some of the rich richer, and all the poor poorer; and all, they say, of whatever tongue or kindred, who have foreign capital at command, enjoy advantages over American industry and perseverance. As Americans, then, they address themselves to congress: they say to congress, "restore the currency, restore the confidence of the people, restore the character and credit of the nation, restore our prosperity and happiness. One act of yours can do all this."

Sir, as one of the representatives of the people of North Adams, I respond to them by saying, that, so far as depends on my efforts here, and on those of my colleague, and on those of their own able and excellent representative in the other house, and most of his colleagues, there will be no abandonment of present object and present purpose, till their prosperity be restored, till the credit of the nation be restored, and till the constitution of the country be restored also. Let them be of good cheer. Permanent distress, from mere misgovernment, can hardly be the lot of an intelligent people.

Mr. Bibb presented certain proceedings and resolutions adopted at a meeting at floppinsville, Ky. and Mr. Mangum a memorial from sundry citizens of North Carolina, disapproving the removal of the deposits, &c. which were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Frelinghuysen presented a certified copy of certain resolutions and a memorial adopted at a meeting of the friends of the president and the administration at a county meeting held in Somerville, Somerset county, New Jersey.

Mr. Frelinghuysen said, I take pleasure in assuring the senate of the respectability of the gentlemen who conducted this meeting, and that their opinions are entitled to receive from me and this body, respectful consideration. It was with satisfaction, and some consolation too, that I find these proceedings conveyed in decorous and dignified language. While I say this, however, sir, I am constrained to dissent from the opinions of these, my respectable constituents. I especially advert to the fifth resolution, wherein, speaking of the late instructions of the legislature, they resolve in the following terms: "We believe they expressed the sentiments of the state—we know they gave the voice of the county of Somerset." Mr. President, this matter of belief and knowledge is a voluntary exercise—it cannot be forced; and as this meeting has not instructed me to believe with them, I shall certainly continue to think according to my own lights, and the conclusions of my own mind.

Now, I do not believe, either in the majority of the state, and I certainly can not know, and do not believe, the alleged state of public sentiment, in the county of Somerset. This ancient, honored county, sustain the encroachments of arbitrary power! If I was to select a district in the state, where the pure, pervading, uncompromising whig principles of the revolution prevailed, it would be the good old county of Somerset. Sir, it has been true to these principles from its earliest history. The first war note that ever disturbed the tranquillity of its valleys, was in that eventful hour when resistance to arbitrary power was resolved. Yes, sir, it was against its encroachments that our fathers buckled on their armor—and the plains of Monmouth, Trenton and Princeton, still hold a language that has lost none of its energy by time, but will, when needs be, warm every patriot bosom into enthusiasm.

Sir, the true issue was not yet formed at the date of this meeting. The bank is certainly denounced for sufficient variety of charges and misconduct, in the resolutions and memorial before us, but the great question of power, on the one hand, and the majesty and dominion of our laws on the other, was not then raised. But I rejoice to know that the people are now coming up to the ensue, with the spirit and solemnity becoming enlightened freemen, jealous of their liberties.

Mr. F. in proof of this, referred to the resolutions and memorial of a public meeting held at Princeton, New Jersey, and of the townships of Montgomery, in Somerset, and West Windsor, in Middlesex counties, signed by more than 200 citizens, and a memorial of more than 1,100 farmers, mechanics, merchants and citizens of the county of Middlesex and city of New Brunswick, which he also presented. These respective memorials with like justice and truth, complain of the general interruption of commerce and business, induced by unlawful and unconstitutional executive interference.

Mr. F. then proceeded to explain the state of things in New Jersey, and said—

Thus far, then, sir, have my colleague and myself been sustained in our reference to the people of New Jersey. We have put the matter fairly and fearlessly before them. We have no anxieties about the issue. I believe, sir, that an inquisition is going forward, that will make the very pillars of power tremble. I make, sir, the usual motion, that the memorials and resolutions be read and printed, and referred to the committee on finance.

Some remarks were made by Mr. Southard and Mr. Benton, after which the reference was ordered.

The chair then announced the special order, being the resolutions offered by Mr. Poindexter, as a modification of his motion that the messages be not received.

Mr. Forsyth having yesterday moved to amend these resolutions, so as to introduce the messages into the resolutions—

The question being on the appeal of Mr. Calhoun from the decision of the chair, that the amendment of Mr. Forsyth was in order—

Mr. Poindexter requested the withdrawal of the appeal, in order that he might submit the question of the general order. He objected to the reception of the amendment, because, whether it was adopted or rejected, it destroyed the object of the original proposition, and defeated the purpose of the pending discussion.

Mr. Calhoun withdrew his appeal.

At this point of the discussion, a doubt arose as to the fact whether any decision on the point of order had been made by the chair, and the chair being pressed, declined stating any thing more explicitly than that the writing which Mr. Forsyth had put in, was, in the opinion of the chair, such a writing of the amendment as was contemplated by the rule of the senate.

The chair, in reply to a question by Mr. Clay, expressed a willingness to receive the opinions of the senate.

The question of order was then again discussed, by Messrs. Wright, Clay, Forsyth, Calhoun and Bibb; Mr. Forsyth handing in a copy of the messages, and asking for the yeas and nays on the question of receiving them as an amendment; after which, the chair (Mr. King) decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. Poindexter appealed from the decision of the chair, and expressed a hope that the question would be taken without debate. He asked for the yeas and nays, but before the question was taken, on motion of Mr. Webster, the senate adjourned.

April 23. Memorials condemning the removal of the deposits and praying their restoration, were presented by Mr. MeKeon from citizens of Chester and Mifflin counties, Pa.; by Mr. Southard from the city of Trenton and county of Warren, New Jersey. Mr. Southard also presented the proceedings of the delegates assembled at the seat of government of the state of New Jersey, stating, as their opinion, that the removal of the deposits is the cause of the existing distress, and as proceeding from an unwarranted assumption of power by the executive. These several memorials, proceedings, &c. were severally read, referred, &c. after observations by Messrs. Southard, Clay, Preston, Forsyth, Webster and Chambers, which occupied until 3 o'clock.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the appeal against the decision of the chair, that the amendment of Mr. Forsyth was in order.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and the question was taken without discussion, and determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Binck, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, of Alabama, King, of Geo. Linn, McKeon, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Leitch, Mangum, Moore, Poindexter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggoner, Webster—26.

So the decision of the chair was reversed, and the amendment offered by Mr. Forsyth was declared to be out of order.

Mr. Forsyth then demanded that the question be taken on the resolutions separately.

Mr. Clay then moved to strike out all the resolutions after the first "Resolved," in the first resolution, and to insert the following:

Resolved, That the protest communicated to the senate on the 10th inst. by the president of the United States, asserts powers as belonging to the president which are inconsistent with the just authority of the two houses of congress, and inconsistent with the constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That while the senate is and ever will be, ready to receive from the president all such messages and communications as the constitution and laws and the usual course of business authorise him to transmit to it, yet it cannot recognise any right in him to make a formal protest against votes and proceedings of the senate, declaring such votes and proceedings to be illegal and unconstitutional, and requesting the senate to enter such protest on its journals.

Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of the senate, and that it be not entered on the journal.

Mr. C. explained that his modification varied only from the original resolutions in two particulars. The modification places on record what must indeed have otherwise been obvious, the readiness of the senate to record, at all times, such proceedings and messages as the president may think proper to transmit, in compliance with his constitutional duties. There was another difference, consisting in this. The proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi is, not to receive the messages. The last resolution of the modification proposes not to record it on the journal. In his opinion, the recording of a paper was its reception. According to the uniform practice, the messages are all recorded. The last resolution marks the distinction between the regular and usual messages of the president and the present, and refuses to the latter that place on the journal to which all messages, agreeably to the constitution, are entitled. Mr. Poindexter expressed his readiness to take either course which might be most agreeable to the senate. After some few remarks, he moved to lay the resolutions and modifications on the table, in order to give time for reflection on the subject. He withdrew his motion.

Some discussion ensued, in which Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clayton, Mr. Preston and Mr. Bibb took part.

Mr. Bibb sent the chair the following amendment, which he proposed to move when the amendment proposed by Mr. Clay should be called up:

After the words "president of the United States," in the second line of the amendment, strike out the residue of the amendment, and insert "he not received."

Mr. Poindexter expressed his intention to accept this modification.

On motion of Mr. Kane, the senate then adjourned.

April 24. Memorials, &c. condemning the removal of the deposits were presented—by Mr. Webster from 490 farmers, traders and mechanics of Union county, Pennsylvania; by Mr. Clayton from a public meeting, and also from 736 citizens of Kent county, Delaware; by Mr. Robbins from Providence, R. Island; which were read, referred, &c. after

Some remarks from the gentlemen, respectively, were made on the presentations.

The senate then took up the resolutions, on the subject of the president's protest, offered by Mr. Poindexter, as modified by Mr. Clay.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Bibb—Mr. Kane addressed the senate in defence of the protest and the executive, until near 3 o'clock.

Mr. Bibb then rose to reply, but gave way to Mr. Wilkins.

Mr. Wilkins then moved to postpone the consideration of the special order till to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and

On motion of Mr. Wilkins the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and remained for some time therein.

At half past 4 o'clock, the doors were re-opened, when

Mr. Hendricks offered a resolution allotting Fridays and Saturdays of each and every week to the consideration of bills. The senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 18. Mr. Heath rose and remarked, that, as one of the guardians of the people's interest on this floor, he felt it to be his duty to make an effort to secure their money, and which induced him to offer a resolution with that object in view. As to the money already taken from the United States bank, he never expected its return, and his object now was to secure all that would be received hereafter. He, therefore, asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to deposit in the bank of the United States and its branches, from the first day of May next, and until the expiration of its charter, all the accruing resources of the government.

Objection being made to granting leave, Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling him to offer this resolution.

Mr. Williams demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, stood as follows: yeas 83, nays 89. Not being two-thirds, the house of course refused to suspend the rules to allow the resolution of Mr. Heath to be proposed.

Mr. Lincoln asked leave to offer a resolution calling on the postmaster general for certain information connected with the appointment and number of clerks, &c.

Objection being made, Mr. L. moved to suspend the rules so as to allow him to move it; but the house refused. Yeas 78, noes not counted.

Mr. Jarvis now renewed the request he had made yesterday to suspend the rules so as to allow him to move a resolution calling for certain information relative to the failure of the District banks. After some explanation, the rule was suspended, whereupon Mr. J. moved his resolution; and

Mr. Hardin moved an amendment to extend the inquiry to the bank of the Metropolis; but before it was read the morning hour expired, and the resolution and amendment lie over.

Mr. Polk moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into committee of the whole on the general appropriation bill.

Mr. McKim demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and stood, yeas 91, nays 60. So the house refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. Wise, of Virginia, now asked leave to offer resolutions declaring the custody of the public treasure to be in congress; that no further legislation is necessary to empower congress to create an agency for the custody of the public money; and that they can take the custody out of the executive hands, &c. [See next day's proceedings.]

Objection being made, Mr. Wise moved to suspend the rules of the house, and asked the yeas and nays, whereupon, on motion of Mr. Love, a call of the house was ordered.

After the call had preceded a considerable time, a motion was made to adjourn, (lost by 4 votes only); and the call of the house was at length suspended, and the doors thrown open.

Mr. Wise renewed his motion to suspend the rules of the house—on which Mr. Beardley demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and stood 103 yeas, 95 nays. So the rule was not suspended, two thirds being required.

Mr. Wise then gave notice that he should renew the same motion every day, until leave should be given to introduce the resolutions.

Mr. Peyton, of Tennessee, asked for a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer a series of resolutions acquitting the president of censure in relation to the removal of the public deposits; condemning the senate, and conceding to congress the power of selecting the places of deposit for the public moneys. [See next day's proceedings.]

These resolutions having been read, a very strong sensation was excited by a large portion of the house; when

Mr. Peyton withdrew them, but gave notice that he should continue to offer them whenever those of Mr. Wise were offered. The house then adjourned.

Saturday, April 19. Mr. Clayton asked leave to offer a resolution: objection being made, he moved for the suspension of the rules, to allow him to move it, which motion prevailed, by a vote of yeas 127, nays 16. So the house having agreed to suspend the rules, Mr. C. offered the following resolution, which was read.

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of equalizing and reducing the salaries of officers, and all other expenses of government, in every department thereof where the same can be constitutionally done, and also to abolish such offices as may be deemed unnecessary, and that they have power to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Jarvis suggested an amendment extending the inquiry to the cases where an increased compensation might be expedient.

Mr. Plummer moved an amendment to include the pay of members of congress; and

Mr. Hardin moved to include mileage also.

Mr. Clayton accepted these several resolutions, and the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution as amended, by yeas and nays, and appeared as follows, yeas 183, nays 2.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Wise now asked consent of the house to offer, in a modified form, the resolutions he had desired to offer yesterday.

Objection being made, he moved to suspend the rules, to allow him to move them, and demanded the yeas and nays which were ordered.

The resolutions were then read as follows:

Resolved, That the custody and control of the moneys of the United States, not appropriated by law, and not disbursed under appropriations by law, are, by the constitution, placed under the order and direction of the congress of the United States.

Resolved, That no change of the constitution of the United States is necessary to authorise the congress of the United States to entrust the custody of the public money, not appropriated by law, to other agency than that of the executive department, and that the custody of the public money must not be, necessarily, under the constitution, entrusted to the executive department.

Resolved, That congress can take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, or a subversion of the first principles of the constitution, by the repeal and enactment of such laws as may be necessary to that end.

The yeas and nays being taken upon the question of suspending the rule, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Wm. Allen, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barutz, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Beale, Beatty, James M. Bell, Bouldin, Briggs, Bull, Burd, Burgess, Bynum, Cagle, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Claiborne, William Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Crockett, Darlington, Amos Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Duncan, Ellsworth, Evans, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Foot, Fowler, W. White—91.

Two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Peyton renewed his motion for leave to offer the resolutions he had brought forward yesterday. Objection being made, he moved for a suspension of the rules, to allow him to offer them. The resolutions were read as follows:

Resolved, That the president of the United States, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has not assumed "upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws," but that he has acted in conformity to both.

Resolved, That the senate of the United States, in a late resolution passed by that body, in the words following, to wit: "Resolved, That the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," have, by that resolution, not with a view to legislative action, but as a solemn censure upon the president, infringed upon the rightful and legitimate powers and prerogatives of the house of representatives.

Resolved, That congress have the power, by law, to select the places of depositing the public money and providing for its safe keeping.

Mr. Hardin said he hoped that every member would vote to suspend the rules to allow the introduction of these resolves.

Mr. Wilde demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. Moore, of Virginia, inquired of the chair whether the resolutions did not involve a violation of the rules of order, which forbade any reference in one house to words spoken or measures pending in the other branch.

The chair replied that that question would arise when the resolutions came to be considered.

Mr. Ellsworth inquired whether any body objected to the introduction of the resolutions.

The chair said that that would be decided when the question should be put.

Mr. Mercer inquired whether the question of consideration would not be in order.

The chair said it would, after the rules should have been suspended.

The yeas and nays were now taken on suspending the rules, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Clifton Allan, Win. Allen, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barritz, Barrington, Bates, Baylies, Beale, Beatty, James M. Bell, Blair, Briggs, Bull, Burd, Burgess, Bynum, Cage, Campbell, Casey, Chambers, Chilton, Clubbome, Wm. Fuller, Fulton, Garland, Gholson, Gordon, Gorham, Grayson, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Haunegan, Hard, Hardin, Hazeltine, Heath, Heister, Jabez W. Huntington, William C. Johnson, Seathon Jones, Lay, Leavitt, Lincoln, Love, Loyall, Martindale, Marshall, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Patton, Peyton, Pierson, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Selden, Wm. Slade, Sloane, Stewart, Wm. F. Taylor, Plimeton Thomas, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmough, Edward D. White, Elisha Whittlessey, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Wise, Young—98.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Adams, Anthony, Bean, Beardsey, Benumout, J. Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bunch, Caubreleng, Carmichael, Carr, Chaney, Samuel Clark, Coffee, Cramer, Davenport, Day, Deberry, Duncan, Dunlap, Fillmore, Forrester, Fowler, W. K. Fuller, Gamble, Gillet, Gilmer, Graham, Joseph Hall, Halsey, Jos. M. Harper, Harrison, Hathaway, Hawkins, Howell, Hubbard, Abel Huntington, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kavanagh, King, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Thos. Lee, Lucas, Lyon, J. K. Mann, Mardis, J. Y. Mason, Moses Mason, McIntire, McKay, McKim, McKinley, McLene, McVean, Moore, Murphy, Osgood, Page, Parks, Parker, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, F. Pierce, Plummer, Polk, Pope, Ramsay, Schenck, Schley, Aug. H. Shepperd, Chas. Slade, Smith, Speight, Standifer, Stoddert, Wm. Taylor, Thomson, Turrell, Vanderpool, Van Houten, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Whalon, C. P. White—35.

So the house refused to suspend the rules, two-thirds of the house not sustaining the motion.

Several private bills being considered and disposed of, The house took up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Decatur, when Mr. Hubbard explained his views at large in favor of the claim.

Amendments being offered and rejected, the bill was laid aside. When the bill for the relief of Richard W. Meade, (involving a claim of $490,000) was taken up in committee of the whole.

After being sometime engaged therein, the committee rose, and reported progress, on both bills—and had leave to sit again. The house then adjourned.

Monday, April 21. This being petition day, the first question which came up was on the motion of Mr. Evans, of Maine, that the memorial presented by him on Monday last, be referred to the committee of ways and means, with instructions "to report two resolutions—one declaring that the reasons of the secretary of the treasury for the removal of the public money from the bank of the United States, are insufficient and unsatisfactory—and the other declaring that a bank, created by authority of congress, is necessary, expedient, and ought to be established."

Mr. Evans took the floor, and addressed the house in a speech, in which he took a general view of the bank question. After he had concluded,

Mr. Wise renewed and offered his resolutions as an amendment to Mr. Evans' resolutions.

The chair deciding that Mr. Wise could not offer them as an amendment, because they were on a different subject—

Mr. Wise stated that Mr. Evans was willing to adopt them as a modification of his own proposition; and the resolutions being thus before the house, he entered into a very free and animated course of remarks, assigning his reasons for offering his resolutions.

Mr. Peyton, of Tennessee, renewed his motion, to substitute the resolutions he had twice before proposed to offer last week as a substitute for those of Mr. Wise, and replied to Mr. W. but becoming discursive, was called to order by the chair.

Mr. Wise rejoined.

Mr. Turrell, of N. Y. moved to lay the memorial, resolutions of instruction and amendments thereto on the table.

Mr. Evans then withdrew from his proposition the resolutions accepted by him from Mr. Wise, so as to leave the motion to lay on the table, to apply only to the memorial and instructions as originally moved by himself.

Mr. Turrell then, on request, withdrew his motion; and Mr. Evans moved to postpone the whole subject until Monday next.

Mr. Filmore, of N. Y. moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. McKim demanded the yeas and nays; and they were taken on the motion to lay on the table, which motion prevailed—yeas 107, nays 91; when the house adjourned.

Tuesday, April 22. On motion of Mr. Clayton, it was

Resolved, That the committee appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of equalizing and reducing the salaries of officers, and for other purposes, contained in a resolution passed by this house on the 19th inst. be authorized to send for persons and papers, in executing the objects of said resolution.

Mr. Cambreleng presented a memorial of 235 Poles now in the city of New York, praying for a grant of land.

Various business of a private or local character being attended to,

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the annual commercial statements.

Mr. Jarvis' resolution authorising an investigation of the affairs of those district banks which have suspended specie payments, was taken up, but, before it was disposed of, the house proceeded to the orders of the day.

Mr. Polk reported a bill regulating the deposits of the moneys of the United States in certain local banks, which after some discussion, was twice read and committed.

The residue of the day was occupied in the consideration of the general appropriation bill. The house adjourned.

Wednesday, April 23. The journal having been read—

Mr. J. Q. Adams moved that the journal be amended, so as to present the following as an entry therein:

"After some time spent therein, [that is, in the committee of the whole], the speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. Hubbard reported that the committee had, according to order, had the said bill [i. e. the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1834] under consideration, and finding itself without a quorum, had risen and directed him to report that fact to the house."

Again; to amend the journal, in another part thereof, so as to read as follows:

"The house again resolved itself into the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, and proceeded in the consideration of the said bill; and after some time spent therein, the speaker again resumed the chair, and Mr. Hubbard reported that the committee, finding itself again without a quorum, had risen and directed him to report that fact to the house."

Mr. A. supported his motion by a speech of great animation. Toward the close of it, Mr. A. was called to order by Mr. Boon, and by the chair.

Mr. Adams asked and obtained leave to that effect, and made an explanation.

The speaker went into an explanation in reference to Mr. Adams' amendment and speech.

Mr. Polk then claimed the floor, and the speaker decided that he was entitled to it.

An appeal being taken from the decision of the chair, after some explanations between Mr. Adams and that officer,

Mr. Adams was allowed to proceed and conclude his speech. Mr. Polk replied with warmth, and was repeatedly called to order by Mr. Adams.

Messrs. Hubbard and Speight, who had occupied the chair, explained their conduct, respectively.

The question of order was argued at great length by Messrs. Reed, Foot, Speight, Briggs, Binney, Mercer, Wayne, Sulzerland, McKinley and Chilton; when

Mr. Boon moved to lay the motion of Mr. Adams on the table. Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays. They were ordered and stood as follows: yeas 100, nays 89. So the motion of Mr. Adams was laid on the table.

Mr. Adams then moved, that the following paragraph be placed on the journal of the house, of yesterday:

"Mr. J. Q. Adams moved, that there be a call of the house. The speaker (the chair being temporarily occupied by Mr. Speight, of North Carolina) refused to put the question. Upon which Mr. Adams appealed from the decision of the speaker, who refused to entertain the motion, and left the chair; which was immediately resumed by Mr. Hubbard, as chairman of the committee of the whole."

Mr. Boon moved to lay this also on the table. Mr. Grennell demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken, stood as follows: yeas 94, nays 95. So the house refused to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. Adams again addressed the house at considerable length, and was replied to by Mr. Polk. After other proceedings—

Mr. Harper moved to lay the amendment on the table. Mr. Wilde moved an adjournment, which was negatived.

The yeas and nays being taken on Mr. Harper's motion stood as follows: yeas 98, nays 90.

The other proceedings of the day will sufficiently appear hereafter.

Thursday, April 24. Several private bills and other business being attended to,

The resolution of Mr. Mardis was again considered. Mr. McKennan, of Pa. took the floor and spoke, in opposition, till the expiration of the hour.

The general appropriation bill was then taken up, and occupied the house till a late hour of the day, when, without leaving gone through it, the house adjourned.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE SENATE.

IN SENATE APRIL 17, 1834.

Several messages were received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private secretary; among them the following

PROTEST:

To the senate of the United States:

It appears by the published journal of the senate, that on the 26th of December last, a resolution was offered by a member of the senate, which, after a protracted debate, was on the 28th day of March last, modified by the mover, and passed by the votes of twenty-six senators out of forty-six,* who were present and voted in the following words, viz:

"Resolved, That the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Having had the honor, through the voluntary suffrages of the American people, to fill the office of president of the United States during the period which may be presumed to have been referred to in this resolution, it is sufficiently evident that the censure it inflicts was intended for myself. Without notice, unheard and untried, I thus find myself charged on the records of the senate, and in a form hitherto unknown in our history, with the high crime of violating the laws and constitution of my country.

It can seldom be necessary for any department of the government, when assailed in conversation, or debate, or by the strictures of the press or of popular assemblies, to step out of its ordinary path for the purpose of vindicating its conduct, or of pointing out any irregularity or injustice in the manner of the attack. But when the chief executive magistrate is, by one of the most important branches of the government, in his official capacity, in a public manner, and by its recorded sentence, but without precedent, competent authority, or just cause, declared guilty of a breach of the laws and constitution, it is due to his station, to public opinion, and to a proper self respect, that the officer thus denounced should promptly expose the wrong which has been done.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Ala. King, of Geo. Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Sneypley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—20.

In the present case, moreover, there is even a stronger necessity for such a vindication. By an express provision of the constitution, before the president of the United States can enter on the execution of his office, he is required to take an oath or affirmation in the following words:

"I do solemnly swear, (or affirm), that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States; and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend, the constitution of the United States."

The duty of defending, so far as in him lies, the integrity of the constitution, would indeed have resulted from the very nature of his office; but by thus expressing it in the official oath or affirmation, which, in this respect, differs from that of every other functionary, the founders of our republic have attested their sense of its importance, and have given to it a peculiar solemnity and force. Bound to the performance of this duty by the oath I have taken, by the strongest obligations of gratitude to the American people, and by the ties which unite my every earthly interest with the welfare and glory of my country; and perfectly convinced that the discussion and passage of the above mentioned resolution were not only unauthorised by the constitution, but in many respects repugnant to its provisions and subversive of the rights secured by it to other co-ordinate departments, I deem it an imperative duty to maintain the supremacy of that sacred instrument, and the immunities of the department intrusted to my care, by all means consistent with my own lawful powers, with the rights of others, and with the genius of our civil institutions. To this end, I have caused this, my solemn protest, against the aforesaid proceedings, to be placed on the files of the executive department, and to be transmitted to the senate.

It is alike due to the subject, the senate and the people, that the views which I have taken of the proceedings referred to, and which compel me to regard them in the light that has been mentioned, should be exhibited at length, and with the freedom and frankness which are required by an occasion so unprecedented and peculiar.

Under the constitution of the United States, the powers and functions of the various departments of the federal government, and their responsibilities for violation or neglect of duty, are clearly defined or result by necessary inference. The legislative power subject to the qualified negative of the president, is vested in the congress of the United States, composed of the senate and house of representatives. The executive power is vested exclusively in the president, except that in the conclusion of treaties and in certain appointments to office, he is to act with the advice and consent of the senate. The judicial power is vested exclusively in the supreme and other courts of the U. States, except in cases of impeachment, for which purpose the accusatory power is vested in the house of representatives, and that of hearing and determining, in the senate. But, although for the special purposes which have been mentioned, there is an occasional intermixture of the powers of the different departments, yet with these exceptions, each of the three great departments is independent of the others in its sphere of action; and when it deviates from that sphere is not responsible to the others, further than it is expressly made so in the constitution. In every other respect, each of them is the equal of the other two, and all are the servants of the American people, without power or right to control or censure each other in the service of their common superior, save only in the manner and to the degree which that superior has prescribed.

The responsibilities of the president are numerous and weighty. He is liable to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, and, on due conviction, to removal from office, and perpetual disqualification; and notwithstanding such conviction, he may also be indicted and punished according to law. He is also liable to the private action of any party who may have been injured by his illegal mandates or instructions, in the same manner and to the same extent of the humblest functionary. In addition to the responsibilities which may thus be enforced by impeachment, criminal prosecution, or suit at law, he is also accountable at the bar of public opinion, for every act of his administration. Subject only to the restraints of truth and justice, the free people of the United States have the undoubted right, as individuals or collectively, orally or in writing, at such times, and in such language and form as they may think proper, to discuss his official conduct, and to express and promulgate their opinions concerning it. Indirectly, also, his conduct may come under review in either branch of the legislature, or in the senate when acting in its executive capacity, and so far as the executive or legislative proceedings of these bodies may require it, it may be examined by them. These are believed to be the proper and only modes, in which the president of the United States is to be held accountable for his official conduct.

Tested by these principles, the resolution of the senate is wholly unauthorised by the constitution, and in derogation of its entire spirit. It assumes that a single branch of the legislative department may for the purposes of a public censure, and without any view to legislation or impeachment, take up, consider, and decide upon, the official acts of the executive. But in no part of the constitution is the president subjected to any such responsibility; and in no part of that instrument is any such power conferred on either branch of the legislature.

The justice of these conclusions will be illustrated and confirmed by a brief analysis of the powers of the senate, and a comparison of their recent proceedings with those powers.

The high functions assigned by the constitution to the senate, are in their nature either legislative, executive or judicial. It is only in the exercise of its judicial powers, when sitting as a court for the trial of impeachments, that the senate is expressly authorised and necessarily required to consider and decide upon the conduct of the president, or any other public officer. Indirectly however, as has already been suggested, it may frequently be called on to perform that office. Cases may occur in the course of its legislative or executive proceedings, in which it may be indispensable to the proper exercise of its powers, that it should inquire into, and decide upon, the conduct of the president or other public officers; and in every such case its constitutional right to do so is cheerfully conceded. But to authorise the senate to enter on such a task in its legislative or executive capacity, the inquiry must actually grow out of and tend to some legislative or executive action, and the decision when expressed must take the form of some appropriate legislative or executive act.

The resolution in question was introduced, discussed and passed, not as a joint, but as a separate resolution. It asserts no legislative power, proposes no legislative action; and neither possesses the form nor any of the attributes of a legislative measure. It does not appear to have been entertained or passed, with any view or expectation of its issuing in a law or joint resolution, or in the repeal of any law or joint resolution, or in any other legislative action.

Whilst wanting both the form and substance of a legislative measure, it is equally manifest, that the resolution was not justified by any of the executive powers conferred on the senate. These powers relate exclusively to the consideration of treaties and nominations to office; and they are exercised in secret session, and with closed doors. This resolution does not apply to any treaty or nomination, and was passed in a public session.

Nor does this proceeding in any way belong to that class of incidental resolutions which relate to the officers of the senate, to their chamber, and other appurtenances, or to subjects of order, and other matters of the like nature—in all which either house may lawfully proceed without any co-operation with the other, or with the president.

On the contrary the whole phraseology and sense of the resolution seem to be judicial. Its essence, true character, and only practical effect, are to be found in the conduct which its charges upon the president, and in the judgment which it pronounces on that conduct. The resolution, therefore, though discussed and adopted by the senate in its legislative capacity, is, in its office, and in all its characteristics, essentially judicial.

That the senate possesses a high judicial power, and that instances may occur in which the president of the United States will be amenable to it, is undeniable. But under the provisions of the constitution, it would seem to be equally plain that neither the president nor any other officer can be rightfully subjected to the operation of the judicial power of the senate, except in the cases and under the forms prescribed by the constitution.

The constitution declares that "the president, vice president and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors"—that the house of representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment"—that the senate "shall have the sole power to try all impeachments"—that "when sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation"—that "when the president of the United States is tried, the chief justice shall preside"—that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present"—and that "judgment shall not extend further than to remove from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit, under the United States."

The resolution above quoted, charges in substance that in certain proceedings relating to the public revenue, the president has usurped authority and power not conferred upon him by the constitution and laws, and that in doing so he violated both. Any such act constitutes a high crime—one of the highest, indeed, which the president can commit—a crime which justly exposes him to impeachment by the house of representatives, and upon due conviction, to removal from office, and to the complete and immutable disfranchisement prescribed by the constitution.

The resolution, then, was in substance an impeachment of the president; and in its passage amounts to a declaration by a majority of the senate, that he is guilty of an impeachable offence. As such it is spread upon the journals of the senate—published to the nation and to the world—inade part of our enduring archives—and incorporated in the history of the age. The punishment of removal from office and future disqualification, does not, it is true, follow this decision; nor would it have followed the like decision, if the regular forms of proceeding had been pursued, because the requisite number did not concur in the result. But the moral influence of a solemn declaration, by a majority of the senate, that the accused is guilty of the offence charged upon him, has been as effectually secured, as if the like declaration had been made upon an impeachment expressed in the same terms. Indeed, a greater practical effect has been gained, because the votes given for the resolution, though not sufficient to authorise a judgment of guilty on an impeachment, were numerous enough to carry that resolution.

That the resolution does not expressly allege that the assumption of power and authority, which it condemns, was intentional and corrupt, is no answer to the preceding view of its character and effect. The act thus condemned, necessarily implies volition and design in the individual to whom it is imputed, and being unlawful in its character, the legal conclusion is, that it was prompted by improper motives, and committed with an unlawful intent. The charge is not of a mistake in the exercise of supposed powers, but of the assumption of powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both, and nothing is suggested to excuse or palliate the turpitude of the act. In the absence of any such excuse, or palliation, there is room only for one inference; and that is, that the intent was unlawful and corrupt. Besides, the resolution not only contains no mitigating suggestion, but on the contrary, it holds up the act complained of as justly obnoxious to censure and reprobation: and thus as distinctly stamps it with impurity of motive, as if the strongest epithets had been used.

The president of the United States, therefore, has been by a majority of his constitutional triers, accused and found guilty of an impeachable offence; but in no part of this proceeding have the directions of the constitution been observed.

The impeachment, instead of being preferred and prosecuted by the house of representatives, originated in the senate, and was prosecuted without the aid or concurrence of the other house. The oath or affirmation prescribed by the constitution, was not taken by the senators: the chief justice did not preside; no notice of the charge was given to the accused; and no opportunity afforded him to respond to the accusation, to meet his accusers face to face, to cross examine the witnesses, to procure counteracting testimony, or to be heard in his defence. The safe-guards and formalities which the constitution has connected with the power of impeachment, were doubtless supposed by the framers of that instrument, to be essential to the protection of the public servant, to the attainment of justice, and to the order, impartiality, and dignity of the procedure. These safe-guards and formalities were not only practically disregarded, in the commencement and conduct of these proceedings, but in their result, I find myself convicted by less than two thirds of the members present, of an impeachable offence.

In vain it may be alledged in defence of this proceeding that the form of the resolution is not that of an impeachment; or of a judgment thereupon; that the punishment prescribed in the constitution does not follow its adoption, or that in this case, no impeachment is to be expected from the house of representatives. It is because it did not assume the form of an impeachment, that it is more palpably repugnant to the constitution; for it is through that form only that the president is judicially responsible to the senate; and though neither removal from office nor future disqualification ensues, yet it is not to be presumed, that the framers of the constitution considered either or both of those results, as constituting the whole of the punishment they prescribed. The judgment of guilty by the highest tribunal in the union; the stigma it would inflict on the offender, his family and fame; and the perpetual record on the journal, handing down to future generations the story of his disgrace, were doubtless regarded by them as the bitterest portions, if not the very essence of that punishment. So far, therefore, as some of its most material parts are concerned, the passage, recording and promulgation of the resolution, are an attempt to bring them on the president, in a manner unauthorised by the constitution. To shield him and other officers who are liable to impeachment, from consequences so momentous, except when really merited by official delinquencies, the constitution has most carefully guarded the whole process of impeachment. A majority of the house of representatives, must think the officer guilty, before he can be charged. Two-thirds of the senate must pronounce him guilty, or he is deemed to be innocent. Forty-six senators appear by the journal to have been present when the vote on the resolution was taken. If, after all the solemnities of an impeachment, thirty of those senators had voted that the president was guilty, yet would he have been acquitted, but by the mode of proceeding adopted in the present case, a lasting record of conviction has been entered up by the votes of twenty-six senators, without an impeachment or trial; whilst the constitution expressly declares that to the entry of such a judgment an accusation by the house of representatives, a trial by the senate, and a concurrence of two-thirds in the vote of guilty, shall be indispensable prerequisites. Whether or not an impeachment was to be expected from the house of representatives, was a point on which the senate had no constitutional right to speculate, and in respect to which, even had it possessed the spirit of prophecy, its anticipations would have furnished no just grounds for this procedure.

Admitting that there was reason to believe that a violation of the constitution and laws had been actually committed by the president, still it was the duty of the senate, as his sole constitutional judges, to wait for an impeachment until the other house should think proper to prefer it. The members of the senate could have no right to infer that no impeachment was intended. On the contrary, every legal and rational presumption on their part ought to have been, that if there was good reason to believe him guilty of an impeachable offence, the house of representatives would perform its constitutional duty, by arraigning the offender before the justice of his country. The contrary presumption would involve an implication derogatory to the integrity and honor of the representatives of the people.

But suppose the suspicion thus implied were actually entertained, and for good cause, how can it justify the assumption by the senate of powers not conferred by the constitution?

It is only necessary to look at the condition in which the senate and the president have been placed by this proceeding, to perceive its utter incompatibility with the provisions and the spirit of the constitution, and with the plainest dictates of humanity and justice.

If the house of representatives shall be of opinion that there is just ground for the censure pronounced upon the president, then will it be the solemn duty of that house to prefer the proper accusation, and to cause him to be brought to trial by the constitutional tribunal. But in what condition would he find that tribunal? A majority of its members have already considered the case, and have not only formed but expressed a deliberate judgment upon its merits. It is the policy of our benign system of jurisprudence, to secure, in all criminal proceedings, and even in the most trivial litigations, a fair, unprejudiced, and impartial trial. And surely it cannot be less important, that such a trial should be secured to the highest officer of the government.

The constitution makes the house of representatives the exclusive judges, in the first instance, of the question, whether the president has committed an impeachable offence. A majority of the senate, whose interference with this preliminary question, has, for the best of all reasons, been studiously excluded, anticipate the action of the house of representatives, assume not only the function which belongs exclusively to that body, but convert themselves into accusers, witnesses, counsel and judges, and prejudice the whole case. Thus presenting the appalling spectacle, in a free state of judges going through a labored preparation for an impartial hearing and decision, by a previous ex parte investigation and sentence against the supposed offender.

There is no more settled axiom in that government whence we derived the model of this part of our constitution than, that "the lords cannot impeach any to themselves, nor join in the accusation, because they are judges." Independently of the general reason on which this rule is founded, its propriety and importance are greatly increased by the nature of the impeaching power. The power of arraigning the high officers, of government, before a tribunal whose sentence may expel them from their seats and brand them as infamous, is eminently a popular remedy—a remedy designed to be employed for the protection of private right and public liberty, against the abuses of injustice and the encroachments of arbitrary power. But the framers of the constitution were also undoubtedly aware, that this formidable instrument had been, and might be abused: and that from its very nature, an impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, whatever might be its result, would in most cases be accompanied by so much of dishonor and reproach, solicitude and suffering, as to make the power of preferring it, one of the highest solemnity and importance. It was due to both these considerations, that the impeaching power should be lodged in the hands of those who, from the mode of their election and the tenure of their offices, would most accurately express the popular will, and at the same time be most directly and speedily amenable to the people.

The theory of these wise and benignant intentions is in the present case, effectually defeated by the proceedings of the senate. The members of that body represent, not the people, but the states; and though they are undoubtedly responsible to the states, yet, from their extended term of service, the effect of that responsibility, during the whole period of that term, must very much depend upon their own impressions of its obligatory force. When a body, thus constituted expresses, beforehand, its opinion in a particular case, and thus indirectly invites a prosecution, it not only assumes a power intended for wise reasons to be confined to others, but it shields the latter from that exclusive and personal responsibility under which it was intended to be exercised, and reverses the whole scheme of this part of the constitution.

Such would be some of the objections to this procedure, even if it were admitted that there is just ground for imputing to the president the offences charged in the resolution. But, if, on the other hand, the house of representatives shall be of opinion that there is no reason for charging them upon him, and shall therefore deem it improper to prefer an impeachment, then will the violation of privilege as it respects that house, of justice as it regards the president, and of the constitution, as it relates to both, be only the more conspicuous and impressive.

The constitutional mode of procedure on an impeachment has not only been wholly disregarded, but some of the first principles of natural right and enlightened jurisprudence, have been violated in the very form of the resolution. It carefully abstains from averring in which of "the late proceedings in relation to the public revenue, the president has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws." It carefully abstains from specifying what laws or what parts of the constitution have been violated. Why was not the certainty of the offence—"the nature and cause of the accusation"—set out in the manner required in the constitution, before even the humblest individual, for the smallest crime, can be exposed to condemnation? Such a specification was due to the accused, that he might direct his defence to the real points of attack; to the people, that they might clearly understand in what particulars their institutions had been violated; and to the truth and certainty of our public annals. As the record now stands, whilst the resolution plainly charges upon the president at least one act of usurpation in "the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," and is so framed that those senators who believe that one such act, and only one, had been committed, could assent to it, its language is yet broad enough to include several such acts; and so it may have been regarded by some of those who voted for it. But though the accusation is thus comprehensive in the censures it implies, there is no such certainty of time, place, or circumstance, as to exhibit the particular conclusion of fact or law which induced any one senator to vote for it. And it may well have happened, that whilst one senator believed that some particular act embraced in the resolution, was an arbitrary and unconstitutional assumption of power, others of the majority may have deemed that very act both constitutional and expedient, or if not expedient, yet still within the pale of the constitution. And thus a majority of the senators may have been enabled to concur, in a vague and undefined accusation, that the president, in the course of "the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," had violated the constitution and laws; whilst, if a separate vote had been taken in respect to each particular act, included within the general terms, the accusers of the president might, on any such vote, have been found in the minority.

Still further to exemplify this feature of the proceeding, it is important to be remarked, that the resolution, as originally offered to the senate, specified, with adequate precision certain acts of the president, which it denounced as a violation of the constitution and laws; and that it was not until the very close of the debate, and when, perhaps, it was apprehended that a majority might not sustain the specific accusation contained in it, that the resolution was so modified as to assume its present form. A more striking illustration of the soundness and necessity of the rules which forbid vague and indefinite generalities, and require a reasonable certainty in all judicial allegations, and a more glaring instance of the violation of those rules, has seldom been exhibited.

In this view of the resolution it must certainly be regarded, not as a vindication of any particular provision of the law or the constitution, but simply as an official rebuke or condemnatory sentence, too general and indefinite to be easily repelled, but yet sufficiently precise to bring into discredit the conduct and motives of the executive. But whatever it may have been intended to accomplish, it is obvious that the vague, general and abstract form of the resolution, is in perfect keeping with those other departures from first principles and settled improvements in jurisprudence, so properly the boast of free countries in modern times. And it is not too much to say, of the whole of these proceedings, that if they shall be approved and sustained by an intelligent people, then will that great contest with arbitrary power, which had established in statute, in bills of rights, in sacred charters, and in constitutions of government, the right of every citizen, to a notice before trial, to a hearing before conviction, and to an impartial tribunal for deciding on the charge, have been waged in vain.

If the resolution had been left in its original form, it is not to be presumed that it could ever have received the assent of a majority of the senate, for the acts therein specified as violations of the constitution and laws were clearly within the limits of the executive authority. They are the "dismissing the late secretary of the treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the U. States in deposit with the bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the president's opinion; and appointing his successor to effect such removal—which has been done." But as no other specification has been substituted, and as these were the "executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue," principally referred to in the course of the discussion, they will doubtless be generally regarded as the acts intended to be denounced as "an assumption of authority and power not conferred by the constitution or laws, but in derogation of both." It is therefore due to the occasion that a condensed summary of the views of the executive in respect to them, should be here exhibited.

By the constitution, "the executive power is invested in a president of the United States." Among the duties imposed upon him, and which he is sworn to perform, is that of "taking care that the laws be faithfully executed." Being thus made responsible for the entire action of the executive department, it was but reasonable that the power of appointing, overseeing and controlling those who execute the laws—a power in its nature executive—should remain in his hands. It is, therefore, not only his right, but the constitution makes it his duty, to "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate appoint," all "officers of the United States whose appointments are not in the constitution otherwise provided for," with a proviso that the appointment of inferior officers may be vested in the president alone, in the courts of justice, or in the heads of departments.

The executive power vested in the senate, is neither that of "nominating" nor "appointing." It is merely a check upon the executive power of appointment. If individuals are proposed for appointment by the president, by them deemed incompetent or unworthy, they may withhold their consent, and the appointment cannot be made. They check the action of the executive, but cannot, in relation to those very subjects, act themselves, nor direct him. Selections are still made by the president, and the negative given to the senate, without di-maintaining his responsibility, furnishes an additional guarantee to the country that the subordinate executive, as well as the judicial officers, shall be filled with worthy and competent men.

The whole executive power being vested in the president, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence, that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties, and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts. In strict accordance with this principle, the power of removal, which, like that of appointment, is an original executive power, is left unchecked by the constitution in relation to all executive officers, for whose conduct the president is responsible, while it is taken from him in relation to judicial officers, for whose acts he is not responsible. In the government from which many of the fundamental principles of our system are derived, the head of the executive department originally had power to appoint and remove at will all officers, executive and judicial. It was to take the judges out of this general power of removal, and thus make them independent of the executive, that the tenure of their offices was changed to good behaviour. Nor is it conceivable, why they are placed, in our constitution, upon a more different footing from that of all other officers appointed by the executive, unless it be for the same purpose. Be it then, there were any just ground or doubt on the face of the constitution, whether all executive officers are removable at the will of the president, it is obviated by the contemporaneous construction of the instrument, and the uniform practice under it.

The power of removal was a topic of solemn debate in the congress of 1789, while organizing the administrative departments of the government, and it was finally decided, that the president derived from the constitution, the power of removal, so far as it regards that department for whose acts he is responsible. Although the debate covered the whole ground, embracing the treasury as well as all the other executive departments, it arose on a motion to strike out of the bill to establish a department of foreign affairs, since called the department of state, a clause declaring the secretary "to be removable from office by the president of the United States." After that motion had been decided in the negative, it was perceived that these words did not convey the sense of the house of representatives, in relation to the true source of the power of removal. With the avowed object of preventing any future inference, that this power was exercised by the president in virtue of a grant from congress, when in fact that body considered it as derived from the constitution, the words which had been the subject of debate were struck out, and in lieu thereof a clause was inserted in a provision concerning the chief clerk of the department, which declared that "whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the president of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy," the chief clerk should, during such vacancy, have charge of the papers of the office. This change having been made for the express purpose of declaring the sense of congress, that the president derived the power of removal from the constitution, the act as it passed has always been considered as a full expression of the sense of the legislature on this important part of the American constitution.

Here then we have the concurrent authority of president Washington, of the senate, and the house of representatives, numbers of whom had taken an active part in the convention which framed the constitution, and in the state conventions, which adopted it, that the president derived an unqualified power of removal from that instrument itself, which is "beyond the reach of legislative authority." Upon this principle the government has now been steadily administered for about forty-five years, during which there have been numerous removals made by the president or by his direction, embracing every grade of executive officers, from the heads of departments to the messengers of bureaus.

The treasury department, in the discussions of 1789, was considered on the same footing as the other executive departments, and in the act establishing it, the precise words were incorporated indicative of the sense of congress, that the president derives his power to remove the secretary from the constitution, which appear in the act establishing the department of foreign affairs. An assistant secretary of the treasury was created, and it was provided that he should take charge of the books and papers of the department "whenever the secretary shall be removed from office by the president of the United States." The secretary of the treasury being appointed by the president, and being considered as constitutionally removable by him, it appears never to have occurred to any one in the congress of 1789, or since, until very recently, that he was other than an executive officer, the mere instrument of the chief magistrate in the execution of the laws, subject, like all other heads of departments, to his supervision and control. No such idea as an officer of the congress can be found in the constitution, or appears to have suggested itself to those who organized the government. There are officers of each house, the appointment of which is authorised by the constitution, but all officers referred to in that instrument, as coming within the appointing power of the president, whether established thereby or created by law, are "officers of the United States." No joint power of appointment is given to the two houses of congress, nor is there any accountability to them as one body, but as soon as any office is created by law, of whatever name or character, the appointment of the person or persons to fill it, devolves by the constitution upon the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, unless it be an inferior office, and the appointment be vested by the law itself "in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

But at the time of the organization of the treasury department, an incident occurred which distinctly evinces the unanimous concurrence of the first congress in the principle that the treasury department is wholly executive in its character and responsibilities. A motion was made to strike out the provisions of the bill making it the duty of the secretary "to digest and report plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit," on the ground that it would give the executive department of the government too much influence and power in congress. The motion was not opposed on the ground that the secretary was the officer of congress and responsible to that body, which would have been conclusive, if admitted, but on other grounds which conceded his executive character throughout. The whole discussion evinces an unanimous concurrence in the principle, that the secretary of the treasury is wholly an executive officer, and the struggle of the minority was to restrict his power as such.

From that time down to the present, the secretary of the treasury, the treasurer, register, comptrollers, auditors and clerks, who fill the offices of that department, have in the practice of the government, been considered and treated as on the same footing with corresponding grades of officers in all the other executive departments.

The custody of the public property, under such regulations as may be prescribed by legislative authority, has always been considered an appropriate function of the executive department in this and all other governments. In accordance with this principle, every species of property belonging to the U. States, (excepting that which is in the use of the several co-ordinate departments of the government, as means to aid them in performing their appropriate functions), is in charge of officers appointed by the president, whether it be lands, or buildings, or merchandise, or provisions, or clothing, or arms and munitions of war. The superintendents and keepers of the whole are appointed by the president, responsible to him, and removable at his will.

Public money is but a species of public property. It cannot be raised by taxation or customs, nor brought into the treasury in any other way, except by law; but whenever or howsoever obtained, its custody always has been, and always must be, unless the constitution be changed, intrusted to the executive department.—No officer can be created by congress for the purpose of taking charge of it, whose appointment would not, by the constitution, at once devolve on the president, and who would not be responsible to him for the faithful performance of his duties. The legislative power may undoubtedly bind him and the president, by any laws they may think proper to enact; they may prescribe in what place particular portions of the public money shall be kept, and for what reason it shall be removed, as they may direct that supplies for the army or navy shall be kept in particular stores; and it will be the duty of the president to see that the law is faithfully executed—yet will the custody remain in the executive department of the government. Were the congress to assume, with or without a legislative act the power of appointing officers independently of the president, to take charge and custody of the public property contained in the military and naval arsenals, magazines and storehouses, it is believed that such an act would be regarded by all as a palpable usurpation of executive power, subversive of the form as well as the fundamental principles of our government. But where is the difference in principle whether the public property be in the form of arms, munitions of war, and supplies or in gold and silver, or bank notes? None can be perceived—none is believed to exist. Congress cannot, therefore take out of the hands of the executive department, the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution.

The congress of the United States have never passed an act imperatively directing that the public moneys shall be kept in any particular place or places. From the origin of the government to the year 1816, the statute book was wholly silent on the subject. In 1789, a treasurer was created, subordinate to the secretary of the treasury, and through him to the president.—He was required to give bond, safely to keep, and faithfully to disburse the public moneys, without any direction as to the manner or places in which they should be kept. By reference to the practice of the government, it is found, that from its first organization, the secretary of the treasury, acting under the supervision of the president, designated the places in which the public moneys should be kept, and specially directed all transfers from place to place. This practice was continued, with the silent acquiescence of congress, from 1789, down to 1816; and although many banks were selected and discharged, and although a portion of the moneys were first placed in the state banks, and then in the former bank of the United States, and upon the dissolution of that, were again transferred to the state banks, no legislation was thought necessary by congress, and all the operations were originated and perfected by executive authority. The secretary of the treasury, responsible to the president, and with his approbation, made contracts and arrangements in relation to the whole subject matter, which was thus entirely committed to the direction of the president, under his responsibilities to the American people, and to those who were authorised to impeach and punish him for any breach of this important trust.

The act of 1816, establishing the bank of the United States, directed the deposits of public money to be made in that bank and its branches, in places in which the said banks and branches thereof may be established, "unless the secretary of the treasury should otherwise order and direct," in which event, he was required to give his reasons to congress. This was but a continuation of his pre-existing powers as the head of an executive department, to direct where the deposits should be made, with the superadded obligation of giving his reasons to congress for making them elsewhere than in the bank of the United States and its branches. It is not to be considered that this provision in any degree altered the relation between the secretary of the treasury and the president, as the responsible head of the executive department, or released the latter from his constitutional obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." On the contrary, it increased his responsibilities, by adding another to the long lists of laws, which it was his duty to carry into effect.

It would be an extraordinary result, if, because the person charged by law with a public duty, is one of the secretaries, it were less the duty of the president to see that law faithfully executed, than other laws enjoining duties upon subordinate officers or private citizens. If there be any difference, it would seem that the obligation is the stronger in relation to the former, because the neglect is in his presence, and the remedy at hand.

It cannot be doubted that it was the legal duty of the secretary of the treasury to order and direct the deposits of the public money to be made elsewhere than in the bank of the United States, whenever sufficient reasons existed for making change. If, in such a case, he neglected or refused to act, he would neglect or refuse to execute the law.

What would then be the sworn duty of the president? Could he say that the constitution did not bind him to see the law faithfully executed, because it was one of his secretaries, and not himself upon whom the service was specially imposed? Might he not be asked whether there was any such limitation to his obligations prescribed in the constitution? Whether he is not equally bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, whether they impose duties on the highest officer of state, or the lowest subordinate in any of the departments? Might he not be told, that it was for the sole purpose of causing all executive officers, from the highest to the lowest, faithfully to perform the services required of them by law—that the people of the United States have made him their chief magistrate, and the constitution has clothed him with the entire executive power of this government? The principles implied in these questions appear too plain to need elucidation.

But here, also, we have a contemporaneous construction of the act, which shows that it was not understood as in any way changing the relations between the president and secretary of the treasury, or as placing the latter out of executive control, even in relation to the deposits of the public money. Nor on this point are we left to any equivocal testimony. The documents of the treasury department show that the secretary of the treasury did apply to the president, and obtain his approbation and sanction to the original transfer of the public deposits to the present bank of the United States, and did carry the measure into effect in obedience to his decision. They also show that transfers of the public deposits from the branches of the bank of the United States to state banks at Chillicothe, Cincinnati and Louisville in 1819, were made with the approbation of the president, and by his authority. They show, that upon all important questions appertaining to his department, whether they related to the public deposits or other matters, it was the constant practice of the secretary of the treasury to obtain for his acts the approval and sanction of the president.

These acts, and the principles on which they were founded, were known to all the departments of the government, to congress, and the country, and, until very recently, appear never to have been called in question.

Thus was it settled by the constitution, the laws, and the whole practice of the government, that the entire executive power is vested in the president of the United States; that as incident to that power, the right of appointing and removing those officers who are to aid him in the execution of the laws, with such restrictions only as the constitution prescribes, is vested in the president; that the custody of the public property and money is an executive function, which, in relation to the money, has always been exercised through the secretary of the treasury and his subordinates; that in the performance of these duties, he is subject to the supervision and control of the president, and in all important measures having relation to them, consults the chief magistrate, and obtains his approval and sanctions; that the law establishing the bank, did not as it could not, change the relation between the president and the secretary, did not release the former from his obligation to see the law faithfully executed; nor the latter from the president's supervision and control; that afterwards, and before, the secretary did in fact consult, and obtain the sanction of the president, to transfers and removals of the public deposits, and that all departments of the government, and the nation itself, approved or acquiesced in these acts and principles, as in strict conformity with our constitution and laws. During the last year, the approaching termination, according to the provisions of its charter, and the solemn decision of the American people, of the bank of the United States, made it expedient, and its exposed abuses and corruptions, made it in my opinion, the duty of the secretary of the treasury, to place the moneys of the United States in other depositories. The secretary did not concur in that opinion, and declined giving the necessary order and direction. So glaring were the abuses and corruption of the bank, so evident its fixed purpose to persevere in them, and so palpable its design, by its money and power, to control the government and change its character, that I deemed it the imperative duty of the executive authority, by the exertion of every power confided to it by the constitution and laws, to check its career, and lessen its ability to do mischief, even in the painful alternative of dismissing the head of one of the departments. At the time the removal was made, other causes sufficient to justify it existed; but if they had not, the secretary would have been dismissed for this cause only.

His place I supplied by one whose opinions were well known to me, and whose frank expression of them, in another situation, and whose generous sacrifices of interest and feeling, when unexpectedly called to the station he now occupies, ought forever to have shielded his motives from suspicion, and his character from reproach. In accordance with the opinions long before expressed by him, he proceeded, with my sanction, to make arrangements for depositing the moneys of the United States in other safe institutions.

The resolution of the senate, as originally framed, and as passed if it refers to these acts, presupposes a right in that body to interfere with this exercise of executive power. If the principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive where it may end. If, by a mere denunciation like this resolution, the president should ever be induced to act, in a matter of official duty, contrary to the honest convictions of his own mind, in compliance with the wishes of the senate, the constitutional independence of the executive department would be as effectually destroyed, and its power as effectually transferred to the senate, as if that end had been accomplished by an amendment of the constitution.

But if the senate have a right to interfere with the executive powers, they have also the right to make that interference effective; and if the assertion of the power implied in the resolution be silently acquiesced in, we may reasonably apprehend that it will be followed, at some future day, by an attempt at actual enforcement. The senate may refuse, except on the condition that he will surrender his opinions to theirs and obey their will, to perform their own constitutional functions, to pass the necessary laws, to sanction appropriations proposed by the house of representatives, and to confirm proper nominations made by the president. It has already been maintained (and it is not conceivable that the resolution of the senate can be based on any other principle) that the secretary of the treasury is the officer of congress, and independent of the president; that the president has no right to control him, and consequently none to remove him. With the same propriety, and on similar grounds, may the secretary of state, the secretaries of war and navy, and the postmaster general, each in succession, be declared independent of the president, the subordinates of congress, and removable only with the concurrence of the senate. Followed to its consequences, this principle will be found effectually to destroy one co-ordinate department of the government, to concentrate in the hands of the senate the whole executive power, and to leave the president as powerless as he would be useless—the shadow of authority, after the substance had departed.

The time and the occasion which have called forth the resolution of the senate, seem to impose upon me an additional obligation not to pass it over in silence. Nearly forty five years had the president exercised, without a question as to his rightful authority, those powers for the recent assumption of which he is now denounced. The vicissitudes of peace and war had attended our government; violent parties, watchful to take advantage of any seeming usurpation on the part of the executive, had distracted our councils; frequent removals, or forced resignations, in every sense tantamount to removals, had been made of the secretary and other officers of the treasury; and yet, in no one instance is it known, that any man, whether patriot or partisan, had raised his voice against it as a violation of the constitution. The expediency and justice of such changes, in reference to public officers of all grades, have frequently been the topics of discussion; but the constitutional right of the president to appoint, control, and remove the head of the treasury, as well as all other departments, seems to have been universally conceded. And what is the occasion upon which other principles have been first officially asserted? The bank of the United States, a great moneyed monopoly, had attempted to obtain a renewal of its charter, by controlling the elections of the people and the action of the government. The use of its corporate funds and power in that attempt, was fully disclosed; and it was made known to the president that the corporation was putting in train the same course of measures, with the view of making another vigorous effort, through an interference in the elections of the people, to control public opinion and force the government to yield to its demands.

This, with its corruption of the press, its violation of its charter, its exclusion of the government directors from its proceedings, its neglect of duty and arrogant pretensions, made it, in the opinion of the president, incompatible with the public interest and the safety of our institutions, that it should be longer employed as the fiscal agent of the treasury. A secretary of the treasury, appointed in the recess of the senate, who had not been confirmed by that body, and whom the president might or might not at his pleasure nominate to them, refused to do what his superior in the executive department considered the most imperative of his duties, and became in fact, however innocent his motives, the protector of the bank. And on this occasion it is discovered for the first time, that those who framed the constitution misunderstood it; that the first congress and all its successors have been under a delusion; that the practice of near forty-five years is not a continued usurpation; that the secretary of the treasury is not responsible to the president; and that to remove him is a violation of the constitution and laws, for which the president deserves to stand forever dishonored on the journals of the senate.

There are also some other circumstances connected with the discussion and passage of the resolution, to which I feel it to be, not only my right, but my duty to refer. It appears by the journal of the senate, that among the twenty-six senators who voted for the resolution on its final passage, and who had supported it in debate, in its original form, were one of the senators from the state of Maine, the two senators from New Jersey, and one of the senators from Ohio. It also appears by the same journal, and by the files of the senate, that the legislature of these states had severally expressed their opinions in respect to the executive proceedings drawn in question before the senate.

The two branches of the legislature of the state of Maine, on the 25th of January, 1834, passed a preamble and series of resolutions in the following words:

"Whereas, at an early period after the election of Andrew Jackson to the presidency, in accordance with the sentiments which he had uniformly expressed, the attention of congress was called to the constitutionality and expediency of the renewal of the charter of the United States bank: And whereas, the bank has transcended its chartered limits in the management of its business transactions, and has abandoned the object of its creation, by engaging in political controversies, by wielding its power and influence to embarrass the administration of the general government, and by bringing insolvency and distress upon the commercial community. And whereas, the public security from such an institution consists less in its present pecuniary capacity to discharge its liabilities than in the fidelity with which the trusts reposed in it have been executed: And whereas, the abuse and misapplication of the powers conferred have destroyed the confidence of the public in the officers of the bank, and demonstrated that such powers endanger the stability of republican institutions: Therefore, Resolved, That in the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States, as well as in the manner of their removal, we recognize in the administration an adherence to constitutional rights, and the performance of a public duty.

"Resolved, That this legislature entertain the same opinion as heretofore expressed by preceding legislatures of this state, that the bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered."

"Resolved, That the senators of this state in the congress of the United States be instructed, and the representatives be requested, to oppose the restoration of the deposits and the renewal of the charter of the United States bank."

On the 11th of January, 1834, the house of assembly and council composing the legislature of the state of New Jersey, passed a preamble and a series of resolutions in the following words:

"Whereas the present crisis in our public affairs calls for a decided expression of the voice of the people of this state; and whereas we consider it the undoubted right of the legislature of the several states to instruct those who represent their interests in the council of the nation, in all matters which intimately concern the public weal, and may affect the happiness or well being of the people: Therefore "Be it resolved by the council and general assembly of this state, That while we acknowledge with feelings of devout gratitude our obligations to the Great Ruler of nations for his mercies to us as a people, that we have been preserved alike from foreign war, from the evils of internal commotions, and the machinations of designing and ambitious men who would prostrate the fair fabric of our union; that we ought, nevertheless, to humble ourselves in His presence and implore His aid for the perpetuation of our republican institutions, and for a continuance of that unexampled prosperity which our country has hitherto enjoyed.

"2. Resolved, That we have undiminished confidence in the integrity and firmness of the venerable patriot who now holds the distinguished post of chief magistrate of this nation, and whose purity of purpose and elevated motives have so often received the unqualified approbation of a large majority of his fellow citizens.

"3. Resolved, That we view with agitation and alarm the existence of a great moneyed incorporation, which threatens to embarrass the operations of the government, and by means of its unbounded influence upon the currency of the country, to scatter distress and ruin throughout the community; and, that we, therefore, solemnly believe the present bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered.

"4. Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our members of the house of representatives be requested to sustain, by their votes and influence, the course adopted by the secretary of the treasury, Mr. Taney, in relation to the bank of the United States and the deposits of the government moneys, believing as we do the course of the secretary to have been constitutional, and that the public good required its adoption.

"5. Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward a copy of the above resolutions to each of our senators and representatives from this state in the congress of the United States."

On the 21st day of February last, the legislature of the same state reiterated the opinions and instructions before given by joint resolutions, in the following words:

"Resolved by the council and general assembly of the state of New Jersey, That they do adhere to the resolutions passed by them on the 11th day of January last, relative to the president of the United States, the bank of the United States, and the course of Mr. Taney in removing the government deposits.

"Resolved, That the legislature of New Jersey have no seen any reason to depart from such resolutions since the passage thereof; and it is their wish that they should receive from our senators and representatives of this state in the congress of the United States, that attention and obedience which are due to the opinion of a sovereign state openly expressed in its legislative capacity."

On the 2d of January, 1834, the senate and house of representatives composing the legislature of Ohio, passed a preamble and resolutions in the following words:

"Whereas there is reason to believe that the bank of the U. States will attempt to obtain a renewal of its charter at the present session of congress: And whereas it is abundantly evident that said bank has exercised powers derogatory to the spirit of our free institutions and dangerous to the liberties of these U. States: And whereas, there is just reason to doubt the constitutional power of congress to grant acts of incorporation for banking purposes out of the District of Columbia: And whereas, we believe the proper disposal of the public lands to be of the utmost importance to the people of these United States, and that honor and good faith require their equitable distribution: therefore

"Resolved by the general assembly of the state of Ohio, That we consider the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States as required by the best interests of our country, and that a proper sense of public duty imperiously demanded that that institution should be no longer used as a depository of the public funds.

"Resolved, also, That we view, with decided disapprobation, the renewed attempts in congress to secure the passage of the bill providing for the disposal of the public domain upon the principles proposed by Mr. Clay, inasmuch as we believe that such a law would be unequal in its operations, and unjust in its results.

"Resolved, also, That we heartily approve of the principles set forth in the late veto message upon that subject, and

"Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives requested, to use their influence to prevent the rechartering of the bank of the United States; to sustain the administration in its removal of the public deposits; and to oppose the passage of a land bill containing the principles adopted in the act upon that subject, passed at the last session of congress.

"Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of our senators and representatives."

It is thus seen that four senators have declared by their votes that the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, had been guilty of the impeachable offence of "assuming upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both," whilst the legislatures of their respective states had deliberately approved those very proceedings, as consistent with the constitution, and demanded by the public good. If these four votes had been given in accordance with the sentiments of the legislatures, as above expressed, there would have been but twenty-four votes out of forty-six for censuring the president, and the unprecedented record of his conviction could not have been placed upon the journals of the senate.

In thus referring to the resolutions and instructions of state legislatures, I disclaim and repudiate all authority or design to interfere with the responsibility due from members of the senate to their own consciences, their constituents and their country. The facts now stated belong to the history of these proceedings, and are important to the just development of the principles and interests involved in them, as well as to the proper vindication of the executive department; and with that view, and that view only, are they here made the topic of remark.

The dangerous tendency of the doctrine which denies to the president the power of supervising, directing and removing the secretary of the treasury, in like manner with the other executive officers, would soon be manifest in practice, were the doctrine to be established. The president is the direct representative of the American people, but the secretaries are not. If the secretary of the treasury be independent of the president in the execution of the laws, then is there no direct responsibility to the people in that important branch of this government, to which is committed the care of the national finances. And it is in the power of the bank of the United States, or any other corporation, body of men or individuals, if a secretary shall be found to accord with them in opinion, or can be induced in practice to promote their views, to control, through him, the whole action of the government, (so far as it is exercised by his department), in defiance of the chief magistrate elected by the people and responsible to them.

But the evil tendency of the particular doctrine adverted to, though sufficiently serious, would be as nothing in comparison with the pernicious consequences which would inevitably flow from the approbation and allowance by the people, and the practice by the senate, of the unconstitutional power of arraigning and censuring the official conduct of the executive, in the manner recently pursued. Such proceedings are eminently calculated to unsettle the foundations of the government; to disturb the harmonious action of its different departments; and to break down the checks and balances by which the wisdom of its framers sought to ensure its stability and usefulness.

The honest differences of opinion which occasionally exist between the senate and the president, in regard to matters in which both are obliged to participate, are sufficiently embarrassing. But if the course recently adopted by the senate shall hereafter be frequently pursued, it is not only obvious that the harmony of the relations between the president and the senate will be destroyed, but that other and graver effects will ultimately ensue. If the censures of the senate be submitted to by the president, the confidence of the people in his ability and virtue, and the character and usefulness of his administration, will soon be at an end, and the real power of the government will fall into the hands of a body, holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people, and not to them directly responsible. If, on the other hand, the illegal censures of the senate should be resisted by the president, collisions and angry controversies might ensue, discredit to their progress, and in the end compelling the people to adopt the conclusion, either that their chief magistrate was unworthy of their respect, or that the senate was chargeable with calumny and injustice. Either of these results would impair public confidence in the perfection of the system, and lead to serious alterations of its frame work, or to the practical abandonment of some of its provisions.

The influence of such proceedings on the other departments of the government, and more especially on the states, could not fail to be extensively pernicious. When the judges in the last resort of official misconduct themselves overleap the bounds of their authority, as prescribed by the constitution, what general disregard of its provisions might not their example be expected to produce? And who does not perceive that such contempt of the federal constitution, by one of its most important departments, would hold out the strongest temptation to resistance on the part of the state sovereignties, whenever they shall suppose their just rights to have been invaded? Thus all the independent departments of the government, and the states which compose our confederated union, instead of attending to their appropriate duties, and leaving those who may offend, to be reclaimed or punished in the manner pointed out in the constitution, would fall to mutual crimination and recrimination, and give to the people confusion and anarchy, instead of order and law; until at length some form of aristocratic power would be established on the ruins of the constitution, or the states be broken into separate communities.

Far be it from me to charge, or to insinuate, that the present senate of the United States intend, in the most distant way, to encourage such a result. It is not of their motives or designs, but only of the tendency of their acts, that it is my duty to speak. It is, if possible, to make senators themselves sensible of the danger which lurks under the precedent set in their resolution, and at any rate to perform my duty, as the responsible head of one of the coequal departments of the government, that I have been compelled to point out the consequences to which the discussion and passage of the resolution may lead, if the tendency of the measure be not checked in its inception.

It is due to the high trust with which I have been charged; to those who may be called to succeed me in it; to the representatives of the people, whose constitutional prerogative has been unlawfully assumed; to the people of the states; and to the constitution they have established; that I should not permit its provisions to be broken down by such an attack on the executive department, without at least some effort "to preserve, protect, and defend them." With this view, and for the reasons which have been stated, I do hereby solemnly protest against the aforementioned proceedings of the senate, as unauthorized by the constitution; contrary to its spirit and to several of its express provisions; subversive of that distribution of the powers of government which it has ordained and established; destructive of the checks and safeguards by which those powers were intended, on the one hand, to be controlled, and on the other to be protected; and calculated by their immediate and collateral effects, by their character and tendency, to concentrate in the hands of a body not directly amenable to the people, a degree of influence and power dangerous to their liberties, and fatal to the constitution of their choice.

The resolution of the senate contains an imputation upon my private as well upon my public character; and as it must stand forever on their journals, I cannot close this substitute for that defence which I have not been allowed to present in the ordinary form, without remarking, that I have lived in vain, if it be necessary to enter into a formal vindication of my character and purposes from such an imputation. In vain do I bear upon my person, eulogies and memorials of that contest in which American liberty was purchased—in vain have I since periled property, fame, and life, in defence of the rights and privileges so dearly bought—in vain am I now, without a personal aspiration, or the hope of individual advantage, encountering responsibilities and dangers, from which, by mere inactivity in relation to a single point, I might have been exempt—if any serious doubts can be entertained as to the purity of my purposes and motives. If I had been ambitious, I should have sought an alliance with that powerful institution which even now aspires to no divided empire. If I had been venal, I should have sold myself to its designs—had I preferred personal comfort and official ease to the performance of my arduous duty, I should have ceased to molest it. In the history of conquerors and usurpers, never, in the fire of youth, nor in the vigor of manhood, could I find an attraction to lure me from the path of duty; and now, I shall scarcely find an inducement to commence, their career of ambition, when gray hairs and a decaying frame, instead of inviting to toil and battle, call me to the contemplation of other worlds, where conquerors cease to be honored, and usurpers expiate their crimes.

The only ambition I can feel, is to acquit myself to Him to whom I must soon render an account of my stewardship; to serve my fellow men, and live respected and honored in the history of my country. No; the ambition which leads me on, is an anxious desire, and a fixed determination, to return to the people, unimpaired, the sacred trust they have confided to my charge; to heal the wounds of the constitution and preserve it from further violation; to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness, or their liberties protection; but in a plain system, void of pomp, protecting all, and granting favors to none—dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt, save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce. It is such a government that the genius of our people requires—such an one only under which our states may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous, and free. If the Almighty Being who has hitherto sustained and protected me, will but vouchsafe to make my feeble powers instrumental to such a result, I shall anticipate with pleasure the place to be assigned me in the history of my country, and die contented with the belief, that I have contributed, in some small degree, to increase the value and prolong the duration, of American liberty.

To the end that the resolution of the senate may not be hereafter drawn into precedent, with the authority of silent acquiescence on the part of the executive department; and to the end, also, that my motives and views in the executive proceedings denounced in that resolution, may be known to my fellow citizens, to the world, and to all posterity, I respectfully request that this message and protest may be entered at length on the journals of the senate.

IN THE SENATE—APRIL 21.

To the senate of the United States:

Having reason to believe that certain passages contained in my message and protest, transmitted to the senate on the 17th instant, may be misunderstood, I think it proper to state that it was not my intention to deny, in the said message, the power and right of the legislative department to provide by law for the custody, safe keeping, and disposition of the public money and property of the United States.

Although I am well satisfied that such a construction is not warranted by any thing contained in that message, yet aware, from experience, that detached passages of a argumentative document, when disconnected from their context, and considered without reference to previous limitations, and the particular positions they were intended to refute or to establish, may be made to bear a construction varying altogether from the sentiments really entertained and intended to be expressed; and deeply solicitous that my views on this point should not, either now or hereafter, be misapprehended, I have deemed it due to the gravity of the subject, to the great interests it involves, and to the senate, as well as to myself, to embrace the earliest opportunity to make this communication.

I admit, without reserve, as I have before done, the constitutional power of the legislature to provide by law the place or places in which the public money or other property is to be deposited; and to make such regulations concerning its custody, removal or disposition, as they may think proper to enact. Nor do I claim for the executive any right to the possession or disposition of the public property or treasure, or any authority to interfere with the same, except when such possession, disposition, or authority, is given to him by law; nor do I claim the right in any manner to supervise or interfere with the person entrusted with such property or treasure, unless he be an officer whose appointment, under the constitution and laws, is devolved upon the president alone, or in conjunction with the senate, and for whose conduct he is constitutionally responsible.

As the message and protest referred to may appear on the journal of the senate, and remain among the recorded documents of the nation, I am unwilling that opinions should be imputed to me, even through misconception, which are not contained in it; and more particularly am I solicitous that I may not be supposed to claim for myself, or my successors, any power or authority not clearly granted, by the constitution and laws, to the president. I have, therefore, respectfully to request that this communication may be considered a part of that message, and that it may be entered therewith on the journals of the senate.

ANDREW JACKSON.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 10—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, MAY 3, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,180.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

To dispose of some portion of a large quantity of matter which has accumulated in type (being postponed last week and in the present), we shall, with our next number, issue a supplement to this, and be also compelled to give others to keep decently posted-up in our record of public papers and proceedings.

The president, it appears, again nominated the old bank directors who had been rejected by the senate—and, on Thursday evening last, (the injunction of secrecy being removed), we learn that they were again rejected by the great vote of 30 to 11. The proceedings on their case will soon be published.

The votes are not given, and the absentees are unknown. It is stated that Messrs. Moore, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, and Tipton, of Indiana, voted with the majority.

There are several fearful reports in circulation—such as that the president will issue a proclamation as soon as the senate decides not to receive his protest, and that a gathering is already making at Washington to support him, in certain ulterior measures. We question the propriety of mentioning such things, unless there should be a very good foundation for them—but as they have been freely intimated, we think it right to notice them; observing, however, that in times of such high excitement as the present, the people should receive like reports with great caution—for they are, indeed, of awful import.

It is freely stated that a clause will be inserted in the general appropriation bill, forbidding the payment of their salaries to persons in office, whose appointment shall not have been approved by the senate.

The United States insurance company, at Baltimore, stopped payment on Wednesday last.

This company, and another establishment in the same street, we believe are on the principle of the "Life and Fire insurance company," which, some time ago, "flourished" its brief day, and died in New York. If we are rightly informed of the nature and operation of these insurance companies, they run thus: a person wishing to "raise the wind," and distrusting the credit of his own note, or to prevent its exposure in the "market," or having securities of any description, or goods or other property, deposits, or makes a lien of, such notes, securities, goods or property with the insurance company, promising the payment or redemption of them at a particular time—on which, as agreed upon, and for a certain per centum charged, the insurance company issues what is called a policy, promising payment on a certain day of the amount stipulated; which policy goes into the "market," instead of the credit or property of the insured. The selling price of these policies, (whose parent, or at least nurse, was in the removal of the public deposits from the bank of the United States), has been from 1½ to 2½ per cent. per month, discount—and, at this rate, there is reason to believe that several millions have been shaved in Baltimore within the period of the last six months. It might have endured yet a while longer, perhaps—but confidence in these policies declined, or their amount was greater than the state of the money market would bear, and it became difficult to sell them; and then it naturally followed, that, as the insured could not raise funds to meet their obligations, the insurers were rendered unable to comply with theirs, and the parties fell together—though in fact, either party, or both parties, may be, or would be, entirely solvent in a different state of affairs, when credit and money should be nearly synonymous terms, which they are not now!!!

On the subject of certain things which have happened in the management of credits in this city, for some months past, perhaps, we shall feel it a public duty to speak freely. If the whole could be unravelled, strange tales would be unfolded! But we think it best, at present, to refrain, that honest men may escape, if it be possible, some greater proportion of the suffering that impends on account of the derangement of the money market, than they probably would do under the exposure of speculators and gamblers and shavers, as suggested.

We present the views of the secretary of the treasury as to the future regulations of the currency. We think they are defective, in several material points—even if practical men, and others, who have reflected upon the principles of currency and laws of exchange, should admit the possibility of some of the facts proposed. The state banks cannot, and, if they can, will not, furnish us with a circulating medium of equal value in all parts of the United States, nor carry on the interior commerce of the country, as dependent upon the promptitude and safety of exchanges of values. The individual interest, or particular condition, of each of the independent banks, forbids the hope that, by any possible arrangement, they can be brought to act together, for a common purpose. Such an event never has happened, and never will, over so wide a country as the United States. There are parts of the secretary's letter, however, that we most heartily approve of—such as fixing a just valuation on our gold coins, and the abolition of small bank notes, as long since suggested by us.

But we think that the general effect of the plan must be to encourage the establishment of many new banks, or fresh manufactories of paper money. Much alarm is expressed at the power of the bank of the United States, because of the amount of its capital—35 millions; but the contemplated creation of certain new state banks, with proposed aggregate capitals of some 75 or 80 millions, did not at all startle these alarmed individuals! Is it not better to have one "monster" than ten monsters? One whose interest is the prosperity of the whole people of the country, or ten whose power is in action against one another, for the benefit of adverse sets of gambling speculators? The power of a bank of the United States may be restrained, and ought to be restrained, if rechartered—but how is the power of the state banks, charged with the keeping of the public money, to be restrained? Why, the right of congress to inquire even into the condition of the bank of the Metropolis, the deposit bank in the District of Columbia, is "questioned" by some of the leaders of the anti-bank party in congress, though chartered by congress! Many of the local banks are admitted to act on old fashioned and just principles of banking, their management being in the hands of intelligent and worthy men—but the nature of their constitution, and the laws which govern the currency, incapacitate them to carry on the exchanges, unless at ruinous rates—rates equal, in practice, to the cost of transporting specie from one place to another, as balances accumulate; but the bank of the United States, in the exchanges which it made in one year, (250 millions!) to and from distant places, charged only an average rate of one-eleventh of one per cent. which, certainly shews that a small expense, only, could have been incurred in transmission of specie, else the bank would have lost much money by its exchanges, and these give life and vigor to business—money, coin, deposited at New Orleans, being made available at Portland, without trouble or risk to the owner, or even at Canton, through the parent bank at Philadelphia. Such is the effect of harmonious co-operations, which may thus be exemplified, for an example: the cashier of the office of the bank at New York notifies the cashier of the parent bank in Philadelphia, that a million of dollars is required by the merchants of New York to purchase cotton, at N. Orleans. The cashier at Philadelphia, by order of the board, informs the cashier at N. Orleans that such draughts will be upon him, and directs the purchase of bills on the north more freely, if offered, or a restriction of the domestic loans, that he may meet this new demand, as rendered necessary by the actual condition of the New Orleans office; and so the million sold at New York, is paid at New Orleans, and repaid at New York, without the passing of a single silver dollar between the two cities, the bills either way, being better than coin, at either place, as needed.* But the state deposit banks, each acting for itself only, cannot proceed thus, unless to a very limited extent, and are altogether incompetent to afford those facilities upon which the mighty internal trade of the country depends. Such are the results of experience against "the experiment" that is making—and such they must be.

We have heard some curious anecdotes of certain of the "perish credit" members of congress. None of them send any portion of their pay home in bills of the bank of the Metropolis!—and they will take precious care, at the close of the session, to carry with them their surplus money remaining in notes or bills of the bank of the United States. They will not suffer their own money to "perish" in their pockets, out of the dear sweet regard that they have for the "poor," or in earnest of their own belief in truth of those doctrines which they support in the house! No—verily, no!

The late proceedings at Baltimore have offended Mr. Forsyth, and he has arraigned the people before the senate, especially on account of gathering on Sunday, when Messrs. Webster and Binney briefly addressed them. He is charged with having said that they made a "wretched clamor," as being "factious" and "almost guilty of treason;" but on the following day—

Mr. Forsyth rose against fearful odds, but he recollected a saying of the poet, that "thrice is he armed that hath a quarrel just." He did not say that the meeting in Baltimore was a faction, but that they were prompted by factious feelings. He spoke not of treason either, but of designs to exasperate the people to treasonable acts, unless they submitted to the power of a great moneyed corporation. Here Mr. F. read a passage from a Baltimore paper to sustain this remark.

Mr. Webster said that, as allusion had been made to occurrence in which he had some part, he would state, that when he arrived in Philadelphia, on Sunday morning last, he heard of the late extraordinary occurrence in sending the protest here, which induced him to come on to Washington without delay. When he arrived at Baltimore, he saw a great multitude of people assembled; they were not noisy or clamorous, but a deep feeling seemed to pervade them. When the boat reached the wharf, a venerable person came on board and said to him, these were revolutionary times, and the people had come down to express their hopes and fears. They were not exasperated by a spirit of faction, but they felt an exasperation of patriotism; they were exasperated by suffering, by threats of usurpation, feelings which called crowds to the streets, though it was Sunday. These masses of people assembled from the general spirit and feeling of oppression, fearing the worst. But the streets of Baltimore were filled by this spirit of faction, and against whom? That city was remarkable for its hospitality, its virtue, its high spirit of patriotism and enterprise, and its former devotion to the present chief magistrate, and was moved by no spirit of faction.

On which the "Baltimore Gazette" remarks—

We cannot answer for the secret intentions or feelings of the meeting in Baltimore described by Mr. Forsyth as prompted by factious feelings, but to our own knowledge the assemblage who received Mr. Webster and Mr. Binney, on Sunday last, comprised many of our most estimable citizens, and was generally composed of persons as respectable in appearance, and as orderly in deportment, as could be collected together in any city, on an occasion of public interest and moment. They certainly did not deserve the appellation used by Mr. Forsyth in another part of his remarks, of a "brawling crowd."

Previous to Mr. Forsyth's explanations, Mr. Chambers earnestly defended the character of the Baltimoreans. Certainly, ours has long been one of the most peaceable and orderly cities in the world; and, whatever objections may be made to the gathering to meet Messrs. Webster and Binney, a more respectable and better behaved people cannot be found, than was shewn on that occasion.

[We have since received a full report of these debates, but cannot make room for it now.]

*It is proper, however, to add that this late state of things is much embarrassed by the existing hostile acts of "the government," and that the bank is compelled, in many cases, to rely on coin, for the regulation of exchanges.

Mr. McDuffie reached Baltimore in the afternoon of Saturday last, on his return to Washington, and was received by from 1,500 to 2,000 people, who were waiting on the wharf for the purpose. He was escorted to the City Hotel, and, from the steps, addressed the crowd, (now increased to about 3,000 persons), in as earnest a speech, perhaps, as he ever pronounced—and the manner of its delivery was not less forcible than the matter of his remarks. Mr. McD. spoke for about half an hour; and, while at one moment he produced a roar of laughter, in the next he commanded the entire attention of the audience, or elicited loud shouts of applause.

The brief addresses of Messrs. Webster, Binney, McDuffie and Preston, to assembled multitudes in Baltimore, and the manner in which they were received, shew a new state of feelings and of things in this city. When Mr. McDuffie said that ten days after the entrance of soldiers into the senate chamber, to send the senators home, that 200,000 volunteers would be in Washington—there was such a shout as we have seldom before heard.

Concerning the appointment and duration of officers, the "Globe," in reply to the charge that the president has violated the constitution in so long withholding from the senate the nominations of several members of the present cabinet, quotes the provision of the constitution empowering the president to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

This goes to the extent, that the president may fill the offices perpetually, unless a vacancy happens during the sittings of the senate; and Mr. Taney, for an example, may remain in his place, though not approved, during the whole of the presidential term:—for Mr. T. may resign, and be reappointed, the day after the rising of congress.

The prompt submission of Mr. Rives to the "right of instruction" by the legislature of a state, by way of an appeal to the people of Virginia, being accepted of in the recent elections, brought up some extracts from the "Richmond Enquirer" of Jan. 13, 1820, of which it is only necessary to use the following:

Resolutions, debate and vote on the Missouri question and right of instruction.

The 4th resolution reported by Mr. Miller, of Powhattan, from a select committee on the Missouri question, instructed the senators of Virginia, to oppose the imposition of restrictions upon the state of Missouri, on entering the union.

The 4th resolution being under consideration, Mr. Henry Carrington, of Charlotte, moved to amend the same by striking therefrom the words, instructing the senators of Virginia in congress.

Mr. Carrington contended that the legislature had no right to instruct them on a constitutional subject. They being by their oaths bound to support the constitution, the legislature could not dictate to them on questions of conscience.

Mr. Miller, of Powhattan, contended it had been the uniform practice of Virginia to instruct her senators; it had been sanctioned by Patrick Henry; and now, when Pennsylvania had just abandoned the doctrine, it was peculiarly incumbent upon us to adhere to it.

Mr. Stevenson (Andrew) hoped we should not in this case, imitate the conduct of Pennsylvania; and believing the right of instruction to be a vital one, he should move for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Selden (present register of the land office) expressed himself strongly in favor of the right of instruction—that even Mr. Giles, the Ajax Telamon of the other side, admitted the power of the legislature to instruct, though he asserted the right of the senator to judge in the last resort.

Mr. RIVES was strongly opposed to the right of instruction: he remarked that the doctrine set up by Mr. Giles, involved a quibble unworthy of his distinguished mind; that what we mean by the right of instruction was, that we might command the senator, and that he was bound to obey.

The question was put upon Mr. Carrington's motion, and it was rejected, yeas 38, nays 142.

Mr. Rives was one of the thirty-eight who voted in the affirmative.

Mr. Leigh was elected a senator from Virginia by a majority of twelve votes, and certain papers say that the "clear gain against him" is already sixteen; so Mr. L. will not be re-elected, and his period of service expires on the 4th of March, 1835! But—though it appears probable that the senate of Virginia will remain as it was, other papers inform us, that the returns as heard from shew 68 delegates chosen who will certainly vote for him, and 35 delegates who may not vote for him, the whole number being 134.

Mr. Ritchie is much distressed about these things—but says that Virginia will go against a reclaimer of the bank, and vindicate the principles of the constitution.

"Blessed are they who bring consolation!"

The following extract of a letter from Amherst (published in the "Enquirer"), may shew the manners of the times:

"The election for Amherst is over, and her democracy lies prostrate at the feet of the bank." The myrmidons of power in Lynchburg, holding a fair portion of the county in "bonds," and owning no inconsiderable portion of her soil, poured forth their utmost strength—the Jupiter of aristocracy

"Shook his ambrosial locks, and gave the nod,

The stamp of fate and fiat of a God."

It is supposed that the house of delegates will stand about 50 "Jackson" and 84 "opposition." There is still a "Jackson" majority of 2 in the senate, as heretofore. The effect of the "protest," however, on the members elected before it was received in Virginia, is yet to be seen. The "Enquirer" freely admits that it has been adverse to the administration.

The "Whig" has added up the returns of the first 52 counties received, and says that, in 1832, they gave a majority of about 10,000 to "Jackson and Van Buren"—but now a majority of 3,257 against them.

In Westmoreland, "the native county of Washington," the late member has been dismissed, and a decided anti-administration man put in his place, by a majority of nearly two to one.

At the holding of the election in Jefferson county, the people also voted for or against a restoration of the deposits—the votes taken were 299—to wit: for 275, against 24.

The steamboat arrived yesterday at Baltimore, brought returns of the election, in Accomack. The vote is reported 2 to 1 against "Jackson"—last year it was nearly divided. The "protest," however, arrived only on the day of the election.

It is stated, in the way of reproof, that a Tennesse member of congress franked many packages of political matters to certain persons in Virginia, just previous to the late election. This is not a new thing. Nearly every voter in one of the election districts in Maryland, some few years ago, was supplied with such matters by favor of a member of congress from Kentucky, three hundred packages arriving by one mail.

It is stated that every county in Mr. Speaker Stevenson's district, has entered a "protest" against the political course pursued by him, by electing anti-Jackson members to the legislature of Virginia, having dismissed even Mr. Roane, who was one of the chiefs of the party in the late house of delegates, and also one of the most distinguished citizens of Virginia. Will Mr. S. receive this "instruction?"

There is no manner of doubt, if the elections of members of congress were now to take place, that a large majority would be returned opposed to "the experiment," and other proceedings of "the government." There would be three changes in Maryland—perhaps four, or of all who support these proceedings.

The following article, with all its capitals and italics, is copied from the "New York Standard," the official in that city. It needs no comment. It refers to the reception of the protest.

Guilt and terror were depicted on the countenances of the USURPERS in the senate. The facts and reasoning of the document were too conclusive for reply, and its eloquence powerful enough to reach the heart of every patriot and honest man. After a pause, Poindexter, who skulked at the battle of New Orleans, and has never forgiven general Jackson for refusing to certify to his bravery, ventured to break ground, and pour out a torrent of abuse upon the head of the old patriot. He moved that the protest should not be entered on the journals. He was followed by those traitors to their constituents, Sprague and Fitchinglyusen. Benton then obtained the floor, and poured forth a torrent of eloquence, of which it is sufficient to say, he exceeded all his former efforts. He gave notice that he should move to EXPUNGE THE UNCONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION FROM THE JOURNALS OF THE SENATE. The opposition were more terrified than ever. Southard followed in a miserable apology for voting for the resolution, and betraying his constituents. He was followed by Mr. King, of Alabama, in an eloquent defence of the president. Mr. Leigh then obtained the floor, and moved an adjournment, which was carried.

The USURPERS of the senate will not suffer the protest to go upon their journals. Having found the president guilty without a trial, they will not allow him the last privilege of condemned innocence—that of saying why sent. ec should not be pronounced against him, and stand forever recorded in the journals of the senate.

There has been a great meeting in N. York to receive the report of the "Whig delegation," sent to Philadelphia, to unite in the "jubilee," at which, after the delivery of several speeches, many resolutions were passed, and a strong committee raised to call a meeting of those opposed to the principles set forth in the late protest of the president, &c. of which Mr. Gallatin is the chairman.

A man has been arrested, and is to be tried at New York, for having off red a bribe to another to enlist him in an attack upon the Mercantile Exchange, at the late election! He said that he had engaged "a company of 100 stout Irishmen at a dollar each," for that purpose.

Many incidents like the following, copied from the Taunton, Massachusetts, "Whig," may be expected, in the present state of things. Wages must be reduced, or the demand for labor more rapidly diminished. The idea of perilling the lives of persons, however, because they will not pay high wages, cannot be tolerated, though the practical operation of it is one of the results that we have feared from "the experiment," which, having first struck at employers, is now being felt by the employed, and will yet make the "poor poorer."

We understand (says the Taunton Whig) that a very serious riot occurred on the line of the rail road in Mansfield, on Monday last. The Irish laborers to the number of about four hundred, struck for higher wages and demanded a daily allowance of grog. They armed themselves with clubs, &c. attacked one of the contractors, whose life was put in imminent peril. Great alarm was felt by the inhabitants in the vicinity of the road. The high sheriff of Norfolk proceeded to the scene of hostilities, with a company of militia, and succeeded in arresting nine of the ringleaders, who were lodged in the jail at Dedham. Mr. L. Sweet, a deputy sheriff of this county, also called out a company of militia, and arrested six of the rioters, who were brought to the jail in this town, yesterday morning. The militia continued under arms all night, and yesterday, we are informed, order was fully restored.

A new paper, entitled "The North American," was recently established at Washington, as, it is said, for the support of Mr. Van Buren as the next president of the United States, by means of a national convention. The character of the paper may be appreciated from the following extracts made from it. To show its purposes, the editor says—

"However unfounded the supposition [that Mr. Blair is influenced by interested motives] the editor of the Globe is obliged to act with reference to it. He is no doubt, obliged, by the peculiar position in which the supposition places him, to be more circumscribed in his support of the administration, and more lenient and forbearing to its enemies, than is demanded by the ends of truth and justice, and the good of the country, and of the cause in which he is engaged."

We shall add another—

"It but remains for us to say, in addition to this explanation of our opinions, and intended course, that we shall urge upon the attention of the national convention, Martin Van Buren as our favorite candidate for the next presidency. We have long noted with attention and interest, the public life of that gentleman, and have never failed to find him orthodox in his democracy, sound and enlightened in his views of public measures, and able and manly in his intellectual efforts. He has been true to the republican party, and in his friendship to Jackson, amid all the assaults of his enemies, and as Jacksonian and democrats we will stand by him until the convention shall pronounce him wanting and prefer another, when we shall cheerfully acquiesce in that choice, let it be for whom it will, as we have a perfect confidence that it cannot fall on any man unworthy of the presidency."

Though it seemed due to the record of events which it is the leading purpose of this work to make—we have endeavored to keep our skirts clear of controversial publications concerning masonry and anti-masonry, having had more of other matters on hand than we could dispose of. The recently re-elected governor of Rhode Island is an anti-mason, and was not long ago a "national republican," but he received the undivided support of the administration, or Jackson party, in that state. The simple mention of these things seemed necessary to introduce the following address to the printer:

Socrates, that great sage and moralist of antiquity, was once told that a certain man had spoken evil of him. Socrates replied, "I have no doubt he had some reason for saying so, but I shall endeavor so to live for the future, that the world may believe that he did not tell the truth of me."

This is my story: now for the application. While I was fighting in the anti-masonic party, I was often charged by my opponents, that, if we should procure from the general assembly all we asked of them, or all they could give, we should still keep up the party, merely for power and office, regardless of the good of the country.

I always resented this foul charge against me with indignation, and trusted to a clear conscience, and the testimony of future time, for a justification.

Having procured from the general assembly all we could ask, or they could give, I yesterday purged myself from the above charge, by voting, as I thought, for the good of the state and nation, without reference to masonry or anti-masonry.

In conclusion, I will now declare—not rashly—not from any feeling of disappointment, but from a well settled and deliberate conviction, that I believe, and I know many candid men who sustain me in it—that the adhering political anti-masons of Rhode Island have injured the state and nation more, by their conduct yesterday, than the freemasons of Rhode Island have since the days of Roger Williams.

WM. I. TILLINGHAST.

Providence, April 17, 1834.

It will be recollected that when Messrs. Benton, Samuel, and others, talked so much and so loudly about "retrenchment" and "reform," that a very long and exciting debate took place in the house of representatives on a proposition to abolish the place of draughtsman to the house, as many supposed, on account of the accomplished gentleman who happened to fill it! The correspondent of the "Portland Advertiser," noticing a late debate, on the proposition of Mr. J. Q. Adams to strike out the amount in the general appropriation bill providing for the payment of an additional clerk in the department of state, says—

"And so the debate run on, as water runs down a hill, or the fountain flows in front of the capitol—but there was not much in it—till col. Crockett arose. Now every pen was dropped—every head was aroused—every eye was fixed—every whisker was hushed! None but orators can throw such a calm over the stormy waters—and, therefore, the colonel must be an orator: Friends and enemies rallied around. The galleries hurried to the balustrades—and the colonel began. There is some men whom you cannot report. The colonel is one. His leer you cannot put upon paper—his curious drawl—the odd cast of his body and his self-congratulation. He is an original in every thing, in the tone and structure of his sentences, in the force and novelty of metaphors, and his range of ideas. 'I thought,' said the colonel, 'when in 1836 the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Cambreleng) was for cutting down the office of draughtsman, it was reforming a little to get more. It was like the children on the branch of a great tree hanging over the river, sitting there and fishing with pin hooks to catch minnows. It was like shearing a hog—great squeal and little wool.'

"McDuffie's most potent thunder, Burges' wit, Binney's logic, could not have won such a burst of applause from the magnates of the land. The colonel sat down with delight—and the members here and there gave him a shake of the hand, as they often do when a man does a wonderful thing."

Speaking of "retrenchment and reform" we may add the following from a bill reported in the house of representatives, by the committee on public buildings.

For alterations and repairs of the president's house, flooring the terraces, and erecting stables	$6,670
For the gardener's salary, and for laborers employed upon the grounds and walks of the president's house, and for planting	2,850
For paving foot ways at the north front of the president's house, and making a Macadamized carriage way	13,744
For planting trees and repairing the fence in Lafayette square, north of the president's house	1,000
For completing the water works at the president's house, and executive buildings	1,052
For completing the furniture of the president's house	6,000
For excess of expenditures beyond the appropriations made by the late commissioner of the public buildings during the last year	22,930

One of the most beautiful excursions in the United States may now be made, with much promptitude and without fatigue, from Baltimore to Harper's Ferry, by the Baltimore and Ohio rail road and the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, uniting in this pleasant little journey all that is sublime and beautiful in the works of nature, with the most splendid specimens of the works of art, condensing, as it were, every variety of mountain or valley, rocks piled on rocks, or fertile plains, mighty streams or silver rivulets—viaducts and aquaducts, and all that interests us in the construction of rail roads or canals, including deep-cuts and side-cuts and embankments, &c. on the greatest scale. A packet boat leaves the Point of Rocks for Harper's Ferry, immediately after the arrival of the rail road cars. The distance, about 80 miles, is performed in 10 or 11 hours.

Mr. Mills made a second ascent in his balloon, from Fair Mount, Baltimore, on Thursday evening last. It was the most grand as well as most beautiful exhibition of the kind that we ever witnessed. He stood suspended nearly over the city for more than half an hour, when, a current of air springing up, drove the balloon a S. S. E. course. He landed safely.

The grand jury of Davidson county, North Carolina, has solemnly presented Andrew Jackson, as having disappointed the reasonable expectations of the people; and for his arbitrary, despotic and unconstitutional conduct, &c. We give place to this proceeding in a subsequent page as one of the curiosities of these our days—not as approving of such doings by grand juries.

The notorious Weirick, the postmaster and mail robber, has been released from the penitentiary by the president of the United States, to which he was sentenced for 21 years—and a son of the postmaster at Middletown, Maryland, has been arrested for robbing the mail. He has confessed his guilt. His robberies amount to 2,000 dollars.

The town of York, Upper Canada, is now called the City of Toronto—and among the aldermen lately chosen is Mr. McKenzie, so often voted into parliament by the people, and so often cast out through the influence of the officers of the crown.

We have heard a great deal about the horrors of Sing Sing prison, New York; and the sympathy of the "dear sweet people" have been called upon to relieve the poor sufferers! Comparatively honest persons, we well know, are oftentimes the inmates of our penitentiary establishments—there are individuals whose depredations on society have a greater amount than lots of an hundred inhabitants of our state prisons, and there is a prospect that we shall have more "rag-barons," gamblers in the stocks, and more honest "blacklegs," and every sort of speculators, than all of them will contain—comfortably; as the chaplain of New-Gate said, on examining a new "drop," that "six might hang there comfortably!" But how is it that so many encounter the "horrors" of Sing Sing, and other state prisons, a second and a third time? In the language of the poet, do they not say in their conduct—

"Horrors all hail?"

A large business has been lately done at Washington, in the pocket-picking line, even in the senate chamber, or in the gallery of the senate, during the exciting debates that have recently happened. Two of the gentlemen have just been apprehended, and, among other odd things found in their possession was a poem on the cruelties of Sing Sing!

There has been a large importation of well-dressed, and seemingly well-bred scoundrels from Europe, especially from England—all in favor of a removal of deposits; but even "the government" of New York thinks it right to deposit them, and retain them, in the vaults of Sing Sing. The depredations of these knaves may be counted by tens of thousands of dollars a year. We wish that "Father Bull" would keep them at home: they will write accounts of American manners!

CHARLESTON RAIL ROAD. The locomotive E. L. Miller, arrived yesterday afternoon at the depository with a train of sixteen cars, containing three hundred and six United States soldiers, under the command of major Heileman, in company with the locomotive Charleston with eight cars, containing the baggage of the troops. The trip was performed from Aiken in ten and a half hours. The spectacle drew a large concourse of spectators, who were highly gratified. [Patriot April 11.]

VIRGINIA. A public dinner was given at Richmond, to gen. John Floyd, on the occasion of his retirement from the office of governor of the state. Besides the toast complimentary to him, the following were among the "regular" toasts, and will show the general temper of the company:

The senate of the United States—Representing the states, and nobly discharging the high functions assigned to it by the constitution, it stands a bulwark to protect the liberties of the people.

James Madison and Albert Gallatin—When the patriarchs of the republic are found in the ranks of the opposition to power, its supporters can have no right to appropriate to themselves the title of "the republican party."

"Reform"—The text was, that the patronage of the government should not be brought in conflict with the freedom of elections—the practical comment is the systematic prostitution of it to the subsidizing of the press and the reward of devoted partisans.

The retrenchment so vauntingly promised by the present administration—After five year's possession of power, the fulfilment of the promise is found in the insolvency of the post-office department, and the augmentation of the annual charges of the government from 13 to 22 millions.

The regency, in New York or Virginia—Its principle is to acquire power by intrigue, and rule the people by the instrumentality of their own offices and their own money. Virginia "will touch not, taste not, handle not, the unclean thing."

SWITZERLAND. The following is the plan of the federal constitution of Switzerland, which was to be presented to the assembly of the Zofingen, on the 26th February.—It is divided into two parts—general principles and special provisions. Among the general principles, the most important is that which declares the sovereignty of the nation. Paragraph 8 declares the Swiss territory to be one and indivisible, and stipulates a complete equality of rights for all the inhabitants. The liberty of the press and the freedom of discussion, are acknowledged without any restrictions. The first part of the compact, which comprises the general principle in 12 paragraphs, can never be altered. Among the special provisions, we observe by paragraph 13 the nation is divided into tribes, and the country into cantons. Paragraph 14 is in the following terms:

"The executive of the federal constitution is entrusted to a diet, the members of which are to be elected by the tribes in the proportion of the amount of their population.—Paragraph 17. The tribes of Switzerland are to contribute in proportion to their resources to the support and the expenses of the state.—Paragraph 18. The confederation will establish at its own charges such patriotic institutions as the tribes of themselves are enabled to establish.—Paragraph 19. The tribes will have the right of giving themselves special constitutions, but on the express condition that they are not at variance with the general federal constitution." [National Gazette.]

BANKS—CURRENCY—AND THE TIMES.

We regret that a line or two, intended to have been added to our notice concerning the notes of the banks of Virginia, was omitted—the purport of which was, that these notes were rapidly returning to a more moderate rate of discount, and then were only 2½ to 3 per cent. below par, or bank money, in Baltimore, at which rate they remain, and probably will be, for some time to come.

A letter from one of the most distinguished gentlemen of Mississippi, to the editor of the REGISTER, says—

"We are in as much distress in this quarter, and in those, I believe, than the people of your neighborhood, in consequence of the interruption which has taken place in our currency. We are an enterprising people—have a new country to settle, a valuable staple, and can use bank facilities to great advantage; and we deal largely in exchange, foreign and domestic." [He then speaks of great political changes which were happening because of the derangement of business, and general distress that attends it.]

The insolvent list for Baltimore, for the last week, has sixteen names, one of them from the county. We cannot identify one of the fifteen in the city, but find the names of three of them on the "no pressure" memorial to congress.

The New York papers say that treasury draughts on one of the deposit banks in that city, for the sum of $400,000, have been made, for the purpose of placing the money in Baltimore or at Washington: 150,000 dollars in specie, arrived in Baltimore a few days since, whether to remain here, or pass on to Washington, we are not informed.

The bank committee of the house of representatives commenced business at Philadelphia last week. Richard Rush, former secretary of the treasury, has been appointed their secretary.

There are reports that the committee had demanded possession of the books, and the keeping of them, at their "own inn"—and that the same was, of course, refused. If one could laugh at things so grave—this presence of the committee of the house of representatives to possess the books of the bank of the United States, while Mr. Beardsley, and others, contend that congress has no power even to examine the books of the bank of the Metropolis, one of the deposit banks, and also chartered by congress—he might well laugh at such consistent doings.

It may well be questioned also, whether in the present relations of the government and the bank, there is any just right in congress to make a special examination of the affairs of the bank, unless as simple holders of a part of its stock? The deposits are withdrawn! But in any case, we much doubt whether such committee has power, (though heretofore partially exercised), of looking into the accounts of private individuals—that power not being vested in the directors themselves, unless on special occasions.

A sufficient amount of subscription has been made to the stock of the new state bank of North Carolina, (recently incorporated as a successor or substitute for the old state bank, now winding up), to authorise the bank's going into operation.

It is stated in the Albany Daily Advertiser that the tonnage received from New York, from the west, was 4,475 tons up to the 22d April, 1833—up to same date in the present year, 1,550 tons.

The board of directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, have determined to issue promissory notes of five, ten and twenty dollars, payable one year after date, with four per cent. interest; and for the redemption of which, stocks of the state of Maryland, and of the corporation of Washington and Georgetown, will be placed in the hands of Phineas Janney, John P. Van Ness and William Price, as trustees, to an amount greater than it is proposed to issue notes; with authority in the trust to sell the stocks, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the notes when at maturity.

On the 3d and 4th ult. there were 200 protests in N. Orleans—but no others of consequence had happened up to the 10th, first rate paper being then only 15 per cent.

Mr. Hardin, in a speech concerning the banks of the District of Columbia, and especially to obtain an examination into the affairs of the bank of the Metropolis, gives a table of the public deposits, specie and circulation of the several deposit banks, the sums of which are as follows:

Public deposits.....	$11,485,525*
Specie.....	3,376,309
Circulation.....	10,202,995

The deposit banks are 25.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

H. Johnson has consented to be a candidate to represent the New Orleans district in congress, at the next election.

Judge Porter, of the U. S. senate, from Louisiana, is a native of Ireland. His father, though a clergyman, fell a victim, in 1793, to the tyranny that destroyed the Emmetts and Tones, of Ireland, or drove them into exile from their native land.

We have a long list of reappointments made by the president and senate—and a few new appointments, chiefly in the revenue service.

Mr. Gates, the celebrated merchant at Montreal, recently died in that city; and a day or two afterwards, Mr. Bancroft, his associate in business, suffered an apoplectic attack, and also departed for that land whence no traveller returns. These events spread a general gloom over the people of Montreal.

Died on Monday last, in Baltimore, in the 64th year of his age, Philip Moore, esq. president of the Franklin bank in this city. He was an "honest man."

The house of capt. John C. Kissinger was lately destroyed by fire in Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, and with it nine of his children, the oldest about 19 years of age. Capt. K. and his wife were on a visit to her parents, about 8 miles distant. It is not known how this awful calamity happened. The bones of the deceased were found in the relative positions in which they slept, and renders it probable that they were all smothered before the fire reached them. The barn was also consumed, and with it one horse, two oxen, two hogs and a dog.

Col. Crockett arrived in Philadelphia on Saturday last, and in the evening attended the theatre, where he was received with great glee, by a very numerous body of the people.

*This sum, perhaps, does not exceed 11 millions—for in two cases, one of them of no importance, the deposits, public or private, are returned en masse.

About 100,000 lbs. of wool were recently sold at public sale, in Boston. The sale went off with animation, and the prices equalled the expectations of the owners, though they were from 15 to 20 per cent. lower than last fall. Fleeced wool brought from 38 to 55 cents. After the public sale, about 60,000 pounds were taken at private sale, at some improvement on the auction prices.

The steamboat Protector was lately consumed by fire a few miles below Claiborne, Alabama. The passengers and crew narrowly escaped, but 200 bales of cotton, &c. were consumed in the boat.

As a steamboat was leaving Natchez on the 6th ult. a shot was fired from a house near the wharf, and a passenger killed. No cause is assigned for this atrocious act. It is the third time that the like has happened!

The complete returns of the late election in Connecticut give the following results:

Foot ("whig") .....	18,411
Edwards (Jackson) .....	15,844
Storrs (anti-mason) .....	2,398
Scattering .....	503

Total.....36,958

Foot's plurality over Edwards .....	2,557
Do. majority over Edwards and Storrs.....	169

According to calculation, said to be exact, made from the Almanacs of Paris, and the different departments, there are in France, 1,700,843 doctors, and 1,400,651 sick persons; 1,900,492 lawyers, and last year only 993,000 suits.

The assessment upon the Liverpool and Manchester railway, for parish rates, is estimated on a rental of £3,200 per mile, or £96,000 for the whole thirty miles.

Mr. Potter, cashier of the Union bank, at Columbia, Tenn. was knocked down near the bank, at 10 o'clock at night, and rendered insensible, and then badly stabbed—after which the keys were taken from him, and the bank robbed of $19,000. Mr. P. was accidentally discovered some time after the whole affair had been finished. It was expected that he would recover.

Alouzo Phelps, a murderer and highwayman, broke jail at Vicksburg, on the day previous to the one appointed for his execution, and, while running from the prison, was killed by the sheriff with a rifle.

Perfect toleration on religious subjects has been proclaimed in Venezuela, and the bishop of Barbadoes had arrived at Lagaira to establish an Episcopal church there. The president, Paez, would assist at the ceremony. Under such proceedings, we hope for a better state of things.

The Pittsburgh Gazette of Saturday mentions that about nine hundred old soldiers have been paid their pensions, at the branch bank of the United States, in that city, since the 3d of March. The total amount paid exceeds forty thousand dollars.

—•••••
 TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

April 25. Mr. Webster presented a memorial from 3,000 citizens of Ontario county, New York, against the removal of the deposits—referred, &c.

Mr. Clay presented the proceedings and resolutions of a public meeting in the district of Hanover, York county, Pa. against the removal of the deposits. There was considerable debate on the presentation of these proceedings, in which Messrs. Clay, Forsyth, McKean and Brown took part. They were, temporarily, on motion of Mr. Wilkins, laid on the table.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the modified resolutions of Mr. Poindexter, on the president's protest, &c.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Bibb to amend, Mr. Bibb obtained the floor at half past 2, and addressed the senate in favor of his amendment; but before he had concluded, he gave way to a motion to adjourn; when the senate adjourned till Monday.

April 28. Memorials, proceedings of public meetings, &c. disapproving of the removal of the deposits were presented as follows: by Mr. Tyler, from the young men of Richmond and Manchester, Va.; by Mr. Leigh, from citizens of Gloucester county, Va.; and by Mr. Webster, from 6,000 of the freemen of the city of Utica, and the county of Oneida, New York; which were severally read, referred, &c.

Memorials, &c. approving the conduct of the executive in the removal of the deposits were presented, by Mr. Wilkins from a meeting of citizens in Huntingdon county, Pa.; and by Mr. Brown, from a public meeting in Edgecomb county, N. Carolina; which were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Clay submitted two resolutions which were considered and adopted, the first directing the secretary of the treasury to report to the senate, the gross amount of the proceeds of the sales of public lands and the number of acres sold during 1833, distinguishing the number of acres sold in each state—and the second inquiring the manner by which the 20th part of the nett proceeds of the sales of the lands within the state of Ohio, set apart for roads, is ascertained.

After the presentation, &c. of various petitions and the report and disposition of several private bills,

The senate proceeded to consider Mr. Poindexter's resolutions as modified. The question being on the amendment of Mr. Bibb; and Mr. Bibb resumed and concluded his remarks; when on motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate adjourned.

April 29. The chair communicated a report from the secretary of the senate, made in obedience to the resolution of the 29th instant, showing the number of memorials, proceedings and resolutions, presented to the senate for and against the removal of the deposits. The number against the removal, is stated to be 114,918, and that for it 8,721.

Mr. Bell presented a memorial from Somersworth, and another from Dover, New Hampshire, the first signed by 452 and the latter by 500 citizens, opposed to the removal of the deposits, which were read, &c.

Mr. Poindexter reported a bill making a grant of land for the Polish patriots; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Chambers submitted the following resolution, which lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate, whether any other treasury draughts, called at the department transfer draughts on the United States bank, have been drawn since his report of the 11th December, 1833; and the purposes to which the amounts of such draughts, if any, have been applied.

Mr. Webster gave notice, that he would move to-morrow to take up the military appropriation bill; and also to go into executive business.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the protest of the president, &c. The question being on Mr. Bibb's amendment,

Mr. Grundy rose and addressed the senate until a quarter past 4 o'clock, when, on motion of Mr. Clay, the senate adjourned.

April 30. A memorial opposed to the removal of the deposits, was presented by Mr. Sprague from citizens of Hallowell, Maine; which was read, referred, &c.

Mr. Kent presented the memorial of certain citizens of Baltimore, praying for the adoption of the warehousing system.

The senate then again took up the resolutions offered by Mr. Poindexter, as modified by Mr. Clay, on the president's protest. The question being on the motion of Mr. Bibb to amend, Mr. Clay addressed the senate until a quarter after 3 o'clock, when on motion of Mr. Wright, the senate adjourned.

May 1. Mr. McKean presented memorials from Northumberland, Susquehanna and Bradford counties, Pa. Mr. McKean stated that he had been requested to present the memorial of about two hundred and sixty inhabitants of the borough of Milton, in Northumberland, one of the middle counties of Pennsylvania. They speak in the usual language of their embarrassments and pecuniary distress. They are opposed to the removal of the deposits, and in favor of rechartering the United States bank. A large number of them were the original friends of general Jackson, and supported him in 1832. Many of them he knew had been the active friends of the general.

The second came nearer home; it was signed by 1,300 citizens of Susquehanna county; adjoining the one in which he resided. A warm political friend of his own, and a uniform supporter of general Jackson, authorized him to say, that it contained the names of at least two-thirds of the whole number of voters, and that at least 500 of the signers voted for general Jackson in 1832.

The third came from his own county, a strong Jackson county, signed by about 1,600 citizens without distinction of party. They say, in transmitting the memorial, they desire it to be distinctly understood that they are actuated by no party or political motives, and they sincerely regret and deplore the manner in which this question has, by artful means and designing men, been mingled with the party conflicts of the day. They deem it a subject too deeply affecting the interests of every class of the community, to be prostituted to the base purposes of personal aggrandizement, and express a hope that every patriot will discontinue the connexion of this question with the politics of the country.

Mr. Webster said—Now, with great respect to the senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. McKean), he should not like to make an inquiry of him that would create any embarrassment, but as he said he had presented the names of those, some of whom were friends of the administration, and most of whom he knew, and as he resided in one of the counties, he, (Mr. W.) would like to know of him, if he would not take it amiss, whether there was or was not a deep and growing disapprobation of the measure of the executive in relation to the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States?

Mr. McKean replied that he had not the slightest objection to answering the inquiry. He stated the fact that, so far as he knew the county of Northumberland, it contained a number of persons who were actively engaged in the support of the present executive. They themselves stated that they were the original friends of general Jackson, and voted for him in 1832. He also stated that, in his own county, their memorial was signed without distinction of party. Although he did not know the sentiments of every gentleman in his county, yet those gentlemen who were responsible to him for the memorial authorized him to state that fact.

In his desire, Mr. McK. said, was to reply to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts distinctly. As far as he knew, the people of the counties with which he was acquainted, (although he unfortunately differed with them on some points), were much dissatisfied with the removal of the public depositories. There was much discontent, and he believed that the people were against the administration for its late measures, though they attributed them only to error of judgment. He did not mean to be understood, Mr. McK. said, as conveying the idea that the people of Pennsylvania were opposed to the executive; he only meant that they were generally opposed to the removal of the depositories, which they attributed, as before said, to error.

Mr. McKean also presented a memorial from Northampton county, Pa. approving the measures of the executive in the removal of the depositories.

These memorials were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Clay rose to present a memorial which would neutralize the last one presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. McK.). The memorial, with the presentation of which he was charged, was from Bald Eagle township, in Centre county, Pennsylvania. It is accompanied by a letter which states that three-fourths of the subscribers to the memorial have been, until very recently, the most unyielding friends of the administration; and he would further state, for the comfort of the supporters of the executive, that the letter adds, "that the presidential protest has reached us, and I feel safe in assuming you that its dangerous doctrines will excite almost universal reprobation."

The numerous subscribers to this memorial testify that, in voting for the re-election of general Jackson they did not intend to decide against the bank of the United States.

The memorial was read, referred, &c.

Mr. Chambers presented the proceedings of a large and respectable meeting recently held in the city of Baltimore, disapproving of the measures of the administration in relation to the bank of the United States, and particularly condemning the late protest of the president.

A long and interesting debate then followed, in which Messrs. Chambers, Grundy, Clay, Brown and McKean took part. On motion of Mr. Forsyth, the proceedings were laid on the table.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and, after remaining some time with closed doors, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, April 24. The resolution of Mr. Mardis was again resumed, when Mr. McKean, of Pa. occupied the morning hour in opposition to it, without concluding.

On motion of Mr. Polk, the house, as in committee of the whole, again resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. McKay objected to strike out two items in the bill, one for a clerk in the topographical bureau, of 1,000 dollars, and another in the clothing bureau of 700 dollars. A long debate arose, and the motion was finally negatived, eyes 61, noes 63.

A motion was then made to strike out an item of $5,000 for additional clerk hire in the pension office.

This motion led to an animated and protracted debate, in which the authority of the head of a department to employ extra clerks at his pleasure, and then to demand from congress an appropriation to pay them, was warmly denied. It was incidentally admitted in debate, that the necessity for the employment of these additional clerks arose in part from the transfer of the pension agency from the bank of the United States. The committee continued to sit until about 6 o'clock; when

Mr. Vinton moved that it rise, which motion prevailed—eyes 75, noes 71.

Mr. Polk now moved for leave to introduce a resolution making the present bill the order of the day, at 12 o'clock, every day, Mondays and Saturdays excepted.

Mr. Vinton objected, and

Mr. Polk moved to suspend the rules; but before any decision was had, on motion of Mr. Vinton, the house adjourned.

Friday, April 25. Mr. Chilton made an adverse report on the expediency of repealing the law which requires two witnesses to establish a pension for wounds received during the revolutionary war, &c.

Mr. Duncan asked and obtained leave of the house to lay on the table and have printed, a bill to modify and extend an act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States, with certain limitations and conditions; which bill, he gave notice, he intends to offer as a substitute for a bill reported from the committee of ways and means to regulate the depositories of the public money in the local banks.

[The bill introduced by Mr. Duncan proposes that the charter of the present bank of the United States shall be continued for twenty years from the 4th day of March, 1836, provided that the United States shall surrender the whole of its stock, and the present stockholders shall surrender half of the stock in the bank held by them respectively; the several states to have the right to subscribe, at par value, in proportion to their respective representation in the house of representatives of the United States, for the twenty-one millions of dollars of stock so to be surrendered, or the citizens thereof, in the event of any state's declining to subscribe and pay in the amount of the quota on or before the 1st day of February, 1836. The amendment embraces several other new features; such as limiting the dividend on stock to seven per cent. per annum, the surplus, after the accumulation of a contingent fund of three millions, to be paid over into the treasury of the United States; prohibiting the issue of any notes of a denomination less than ten dollars; requiring a bonus of $300,000 per annum, to be appropriated to internal improvements, &c. &c. This being the first practical proposition in the house of representatives, contemplating, in any form, the extension of the charter of the present bank of the United States, we have thought this brief note of it might be acceptable to our readers.]

The resolution of Mr. Jarvis, for an investigation of certain of the district banks, was again taken up for consideration; when Messrs. Hardin and Chilton addressed the house.

On motion of Mr. Polk, the house went into committee of the whole on the general appropriation bill.

The question under debate being the item of $31,731, for additional clerk hire in the post master general's department.

A very warm and interesting debate ensued, in which Messrs. Lincoln, Pope, Reed, Parker, Evans, Wardwell, Polk, H. Everett, Connor, Chilton, Hardin, Ewing and Hancock took part.

In the course of Mr. Chilton's remarks, he referred to the report of the retrenchment committee of 1828, in which, in speaking of the post office department, it was affirmed, that, under the able administration of its then chief (judge McLean) it had been brought up, from an annual charge to the government of upwards of $58,000, to yield in 1827, a net profit of $100,312, with an extension of post routes and post offices. But alas! how now? The department by its own showing, has borrowed at a per centage, and without law, $400,000, and as admitted by the gentleman from North Carolina $170,000 besides; and how much more it owes, no one can tell. In the same time, an increase in the number of clerks and other officers, involving an expense of about $50,000. That when Mr. McLean left the department in 1828, the number of clerks was 33, while it is now 92.

The question to strike out the item was negatived without a count.

Mr. Lincoln moved to reduce the item from $31,700 to 17,000. The question was taken on Mr. Lincoln's motion and negatived, eyes 53, noes 85.

On motion of Mr. Polk an item of $3,500 for additional clerk hire to bring up the arrears, and transcribing the field notes of the post office department, was stricken out; when the committee rose, and, on motion of Mr. Williams, the house adjourned.

Saturday, April 26. The resolution moved by Mr. Bealy, on the 16th instant, authorising a survey and examination of the Cumberland river, with a view of rendering it navigable for steamboats, was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. E. D. White reported a bill authorising the secretary of the navy to cause improvements on the steam engine to be made.

Mr. Boon moved the consideration of his resolution fixing a day of adjournment; but it being objected to, he moved to dispense with the rule, and demanded the yeas and nays; they were taken accordingly and stood as follows: yeas 91, nays 57.

Two thirds not voting in the affirmative, the motion was negatived.

Mr. Polk then moved the consideration of the general appropriation bill, which was refused.

After attending to several private bills, the house passed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Susan Decatur, as in committee of the whole; which, having been gone through, was reported to the house; and then the house adjourned.

Monday, April 28. Mr. Garland, a member elect from the state of Louisiana, vice Mr. Bullard, resigned, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

Messrs. Hall and Graham, of North Carolina, who had each presented memorials from their respective districts, on the last petition day, addressed the house on the subject, the former in a speech of two hours. The memorials of each were read, referred, &c.

Mr. Gable who had also, on the last petition day, presented the memorial of 183 persons, nearly all voters, of Savannah, Geo. opposed to the removal of the depositories, paid some very flattering compliments to the character of the memorialists. Mr. G. stated that the memorialists represent that since the 1st of October last, the fall in the price of cotton, the great southern staple, has been at least one fourth of its actual value at that time. The entire value of the cotton crop is estimated at forty millions of dollars, and the direct loss of the cotton planters may be fairly stated at from six to eight millions of dollars; of which more than a million falls on the state of Georgia; and this, independently of the loss which results from the fact, that 50,000 bales less will be required by the manufacturers of the United States.—Read, referred, &c.

Memorials, &c. opposed to the removal of the deposits were presented by Mr. R. M. Johnson, from between 3 and 400 citizens of Grant county, Ky.; by Mr. Chilton, from a meeting of the citizens of the town of Brandenburg Ky.; by Mr. Mitchell, from citizens of the 13th congressional district in Ohio; by Mr. Fintou, of Ohio, from citizens of his district; by Mr. Corwin, from inhabitants of the county of Clinton, Ohio; by Mr. Vance, (29 memorials), signed by 1,241 citizens of Champaign county, Ohio; by Mr. White, of Lou., from a large meeting of the citizens of New Orleans; by Mr. Murphy, from citizens of Dallas county, Alabama; by Mr. Osgood, of Mass. the proceedings of a public meeting in his district, as also a letter of instructions, which letter, he said he should not comply with. All which were read, referred, &c.

Memorials, &c. approving of the removal of the deposits were presented, by Mr. Wayne, from 67 citizens of Savannah, Georgia; by Mr. Pope, of Ky. from a meeting in his district; by Mr. Thompson, from citizens of Salem, Ohio; by Mr. Mitchell, of Ohio, from citizens of his district; and Mr. Learill from citizens of Harrison county, Ohio; which were severally read, referred, &c. and then the house adjourned.

Tuesday, April 29. Mr. Lincoln asked leave to offer a resolution calling for information from one of the departments.

Opposition being made, he moved for the suspension of the rule, and demanded the yeas and nays.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the postmaster general be directed to lay before this house a statement of the number, and names, and dates of the appointments, respectively, of the clerks, agents and other officers and persons employed in his department, (other than postmasters and persons employed in the respective post offices), and of the distribution and assignment of the appropriate duties of each; and especially of the character of the services required by the solicitor, and clerks of the solicitor's office; and the duties and official employment of each of the persons who, in the register of the offices and agents of the government, called the "Blue Book," are denominated "clerks of appointment;" and that he do inform the house from what fund or appropriation all the officers and persons aforesaid, employed in his department, have received their compensation; and that he be further directed to state to this house, to what corporations or individuals, (if any), the post office department is indebted for money borrowed, and to what amount to each of such corporations or individuals respectively, and at what rates of interest such loans have been obtained; whether the department has overdrawn the amount of deposits to its credit in bank or banks; and if so, in what balances it is now indebted to such banks; in what instances, (if any), and to what amount, the department has anticipated its revenue by draughts on post offices in advance of the current quarter, and whether there are arrearages due to any contractors, according to the terms of their contracts, either executed or continuing for the conveyance of the mails, and to whom, and to what amount respectively; and what is the aggregate amount of the indebtedness of the department, beyond its present means and resources, to discharge all its pecuniary obligations in time, and according to its engagements and liabilities."

The yeas and nays were thereupon taken, and stood as follows: yeas 103, nays 50.

So the rule was suspended.

The speaker said the resolution must, by rule, lie one day.

Mr. Lincoln moved to dispense with the rule.

Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays.

They were taken, and stood, yeas 110, nays 65. Two thirds not consenting, the rule was not suspended; and the resolution lies on the table until to-morrow.

Mr. Gilmer moved that the letter of the secretary of war relative to the death of Hardiman Owens, be taken up; and it being taken up,

Mr. Gilmer moved that it be referred to a select committee, and Mr. Clay its reference to the judiciary committee.

A debate took place between Messrs. Gilmer and Clay, in which the former, after disavowing any intention of attacking the administration, alluded to the order given by the commander of the United States troops "to take Owens dead or alive," and to the order from the war department to defend the prosecution against those who shot him, at the expense of the general government, and by an agent sent for that purpose from Washington. Before any decision was had, the hour expired, and the house passed to the orders of the day.

The general appropriation bill was now taken up, and

Mr. Vance, of Ohio, moved to strike out an item of $3,500 for additional clerk hire in the offices of the surveyors general of Ohio, Indiana and Michigan, which motion was opposed by Messrs. McKinley, Polk, Lyon, Clay, Ashley and Lane, and finally rejected.

Mr. Vance then moved to strike out an item allowing $10,000 for supplying township plats to certain land offices: after several motions to amend Mr. V's motion by reducing the allowance in the item; and it was, after considerable debate, reduced to $5,000.

Various other amendments being offered and disposed of, Mr. Selden moved to introduce a proviso in the clause providing for the compensation of United States district attorneys, forbidding them to bring separate suits in cases where they can be consolidated. On this amendment, a debate arose which lasted till 5 o'clock, when the committee rose, and the house adjourned.

Wednesday, April 30. Mr. Adams gave notice to the house that he should, to-morrow, ask permission to introduce a bill forbidding the corporations of Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown, from issuing promissory notes below the denomination of ten dollars.

Mr. McKenna resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the resolutions of Mr. Merdis, and Mr. Galbraith, of Pa. obtained the floor for to-morrow.

The bill to regulate the value of gold and silver coins, in the United States, was taken up and passed through committee, without amendment.

The bill to extend the duration of the commission under the French treaty for two years, and the bill making an extension under the treaty with Naples for six months, were severally taken up and passed through committee of the whole.

The general appropriation bill was then again taken up, and the remainder of the day consumed in discussing its details without coming to a conclusion. At a late hour the house adjourned.

Thursday, May 1. Mr. Adams asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to prevent the corporations of Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown from issuing bills of a less denomination than ten dollars; which bill was referred, &c.

Mr. Lincoln moved that the house take up the resolution he had moved a day or two since, relative to the affairs of the post office department.

Objection being made—

Mr. L. moved a suspension of the rule, and called the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The yeas and nays being taken, stood as follows: yeas 93, nays 63. There not being two-thirds in the affirmative, the rule was not suspended.

The general appropriation bill was then taken up in committee of the whole. The question still being on the allowances to foreign ministers, the debate was renewed with additional spirit and interest, and continued till 6 o'clock. The motion to strike out the salaries of ministers to England and Russia was negatived by a vote of 191 to 69.

After which the house adjourned.

A HORRIBLE AFFAIR.

The occurrence of a fire in New Orleans, on the 10th ult. has led to a disclosure of circumstances of a horrifying character. The Courier of that day has the annexed particulars:

"A fire broke out this morning in the kitchen of madame Lalaurie, corner of Royal and Bayou streets, which was soon wrapt in flames. It was known to some of the neighbors, that the upper part of this building was used as a prison, and that it was then tenanted by several unfortunate slaves loaded with chains. Information of this fact was communicated to judge Canonge, who instantly waited on Mr. Lalaurie, and asked permission of that gentleman, in a polite manner, to have the slaves removed to a place of safety; when the latter, with much rudeness replied, that 'there were those who would be better employed if they would attend to their own affairs instead of officiously intermeddling with the concerns of other people.' The flames gaining rapidly on the building, orders were given to break open the doors, which being promptly obeyed, a most appalling sight was presented, in the shape of several wretched negroes emerging from the fire, their bodies covered with scars and loaded with chains! Amongst them was a female slave, upwards of 60 years of age, who could not move. Some young men carried her to the city guard house, where the others, six in number, were also conducted, to be protected from the cruelty of their owner. We saw one of these miserable beings. The sight was so horrible that we could scarce look upon it. The most savage heart could not have witnessed the spectacle unmoved. He had a large hole in his head, his body from head to foot was covered with scars and filled with worms!!! The sight inspired us with so much horror, that even at the moment of writing this article we shudder from its effects. Those who have seen the others represent them to be in a similar condition.

"We forbear a further description of this revolting spectacle, as it can hardly be agreeable to the feelings of our readers. We hope the grand jury will take cognizance of this unparalleled outrage, and bring the perpetrators of it to the punishment they so richly deserve."

The Bee of the 11th April, says—"The populace have repaired to the house of this woman, and have demolished and destroyed every thing upon which they could lay their hands. At the time of finding this the fury of the mob remained still unabated and threatens the demolition of the entire edifice."

The popular fury which we briefly adverted to in our paper of yesterday, as consequent upon the discovery of the barbarous and fiendish atrocities committed by the woman Lalaurie upon the person of her slaves, continued unabated the whole of the evening before last and part of yesterday morning. It was found necessary for the purpose of restoring order, for the sheriff and his officers to repair to the place of riot and to interpose the authority of the state, which we are pleased to notice proved effectual, without the occurrence of any of those acts of violence which are common upon similar occasions. We regret however, to state that previously, some indignities had been shown to judge Canonge, who ventured to expostulate with the assailants upon the propriety of ceasing their operations, and that during the same, deadly weapons were in the hands of many persons, a resort to which at one time was seriously apprehended. Nothing of the kind happily, however, transpired.

Nearly the whole of the edifice is demolished, and scarcely any thing remains but the walls which the popular vengeance have ornamented with various writings expressive of indignation and the justness of their punishment.

The loss of property sustained is estimated by some at $40,000, but others think this calculation exaggerated. It must, however, have been very great indeed, as the furniture alone was of the most costly kind, consisting of pianos, armors, &c. &c. which were removed to the street and thrown from thence into the street for the purpose of tendering them of no possible value whatever.

This is the first act of the kind that our populace have ever engaged in; and although the provocation pleads much in favor of the excesses committed, yet we dread the precedent. To say the least of it, it may be excused, but can't be justified. Summary punishments, the results of popular excitement in a government of laws, can never admit of justification, let the circumstances be ever so aggravating.

The whole of yesterday and the preceding day, the police jail was crowded by persons pressing forward to witness the unfortunate wretches who had escaped cruelties that would compare with those of a Domitian, a Nero or a Caligula! Four thousand persons at least, it is computed, have already visited these victims to convince themselves of their sufferings.

STEAMBOAT LAW.

Louisiana has been the first state to set the example of vigorous legislation for the prevention and punishment of negligence in the navigation and management of steamboats. For the synopsis of the law which she has made on that subject, we are indebted to the Baltimore American, as follows:

"The legislature of LOUISIANA, which has just adjourned, adopted a very severe, and, we trust, efficient law for the regulation of steamboats, so as to secure them from explosion. The number of fatal accidents on the Mississippi—particularly the disastrous one by which senator JOHNSTON lost his life—imperiously called for some legislative interference, to secure care and fidelity in the management of engines, and every practicable assurance of their soundness. The new law manifests great anxiety to establish minute precautions against accident, as well as misconduct; and imposes heavy penalties on the agents and owners, in every case of damage which any possible care might have prevented. To make the law more effective, it has been sent to the executives of all the states bordering on the Mississippi, and its tributaries, for similar action.

The law establishes the office of state engineer for the port of New Orleans. The duty of the engineer is to examine, once in three months, the strength of the boilers of steamboats plying within the waters of the state; to test them by hydraulic pressure to three times the weight of steam they may be supposed capable of carrying; and to furnish each boat with a certificate, specifying the weight of steam which may be safely used.

In case any accident happens on board of any boat, not possessing the proper certificates, neither captain, owner nor agent, can recover any claim for freight or insurance; the owner or agent is made responsible to the shipper, to the full amount of all damage; and the captain is further subjected to a fine, not less than $500, nor more than $2,000, and to imprisonment for not less than three months, nor more than three years. If lives are lost, the captain is to be adjudged guilty of manslaughter.

The same penalties to the several parties are provided in case of any accident in navigation, from overloading, racing, carrying higher steam than the certificate allows, or any accident "that may occur while the captain, pilot or engineer is engaged in gambling, or attending to any game of chance or hazard."

The same penalties are provided in case of any accident from gunpowder, shipped without a written notice of the fact being posted in three conspicuous parts of the boat.

Shippers are made liable to a fine of $300 for shipping gunpowder without notice to the master or clerk; and also made liable for damages that may happen by any accident therefrom; and, in case of loss of life, are adjudged guilty of manslaughter.

In passing, on the river, the descending boat is commanded to shut off steam and float down, when within a mile of an ascending boat—the latter to assume the responsibility of steering clear of the other, and being liable for all damages.

Other minute directions are given, but the above form the principal enactments of the law, which appear to be drawn up with a determination to enforce rigorous penalties against any carelessness in the management of steam engines on the Mississippi, within the limits of the state of Louisiana.

LETTER FROM JUDGE McLEAN.

Certain assertions that Mr. McLean would not be a candidate for the presidency in opposition to the decision of a national convention, gave rise to the following letter from him:

To the editor of the Hamilton (O.) Intelligencer.
Washington, 26th March, 1834.

DEAR SIR: I have just received your letter of the 17th inst. in which you inform me that at a late public meeting in Hamilton, "a number of letters were read to the meeting, stating, in effect, that I had expressed a determination not to be a candidate in opposition to Mr. Van Buren, and that their impression was great; and you request me to say whether I intend to become a candidate for the presidency regardless of the decision of a national convention."

No individual has had the shadow of authority for making the above statement.

Whether I shall become a candidate or not, will depend entirely on the voluntary action of the people. The choice of their public servants, in my opinion, belongs to the people, and not to those who, from selfish views, may assume the responsibility of acting for them.

I am opposed to a national caucus or convention now, as I was in eighteen hundred and twenty-three, when an attempt was made, through its influence, to elect a president of the U. States.

A national convention is contrary to the established usages of the democratic party. It has a direct tendency to place the whole political power of the country into the hands of a few individuals, and to deprive the people of a full and fair expression of their will. It will substitute for the official organs, under the constitution and laws, a cabal, which will control, through a corrupt influence, the whole action and policy of the government.

Under such a system the people will be kept in a state of excitement, the moral force of our institutions will be eventually destroyed, and the ruin of our government must soon follow.

To keep the election of president out of the house of representatives, I have always been in favor of so altering the constitution as to send the election a second time to the people, if there should be a failure to elect on the first attempt. Under no circumstances will I consent to be the instrument of defeating an election of president by the people.

Believing, as I do, that our government can only be sustained in its purity and vigor, by keeping the elective franchise near the people, and out of the hands of political managers, my course, in regard to the future, will in no degree be influenced by the contemplated national convention.

In accordance with the usages of the democratic party, state conventions, under certain circumstances are not only proper, but necessary. But the only legitimate objects of such a convention, is to ascertain public sentiment, and not to manufacture it. Its members should be chosen by the people, and to the convention should be borne and expressed the known wishes of the people. With respect, your obedient servant,

JOHN McLEAN.

SPEECH OF MR. LACOCK.

The following is the conclusion of a speech recently made by Mr. LACOCK, in the legislature of Pennsylvania.

"It is now, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. LACOCK, more than one-third of a century, since I was associated in political life with your sire and your grandsire. And the same may be said of your brother from Armstrong; and with your father, and yours, I was long and honorably associated. (Here Mr. Lacock designated six or eight young men, the fathers of whom had been with him in the legislature.) It was from and with them I learned my political creed, and was taught to love and honor Pennsylvania. They have gone, or most of them, from good works I trust, in this, to high rewards, in a better world. Will not you, the sons of those venerated sires, listen to the warning voice of their old political friend, who now addresses you, and who has been permitted, in mercy, to linger behind his associates, and is here standing, solitary and alone, upon this floor, conjuring and beseeching his young friends to redeem and save the country, its constitution, and its laws. This can only be done by breaking the political fetters with which you are bound, Remember we have taken a solemn oath, not to support party, but the constitution and laws of the country. These you have seen trampled under foot. You find a wide-spread ruin around you; and, where peace and plenty had lately smiled, you now find bitter strife and contention on the one hand, and penury and want upon the other; and in this state of misery and suffering, the cries of thousands from Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, by their delegates, been presented at the foot of the throne, from whence the supplicants for mercy have been driven back, loaded with outrage, insult and contempt. Let me ask you again, said Mr. Lacoek, my young friends, will you bear this? If you will, I will not. I feel a spark of holy fire from the altar of '76 kindling to a blaze in my bosom, and while a pulsation of the blood of '76 throbs in my heart, or flows in my veins, I shall raise my voice, and nerve my arm, if possible, with youthful vigor, to speak, and strike too, in defence of the liberty and freedom, the constitution and laws of my country!"

TAMMANY SOCIETY, OR COLUMBIAN ORDER.

At a meeting of the Tammany society, or Columbian order, held at the great wigwam, New York, on Monday evening, 21st April, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we recognize as the political tenets of this society, the democratic principles of Jefferson, and especially, also, that great republican feature of the constitution, that all powers not clearly delegated by instrument, "are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

Resolved, That we conceive it the duty of the senators and representatives in congress, to confine themselves rigidly to the sphere of action assigned them by the constitution, and not to depart from the legitimate objects of legislation by the passage of "resolutions" totally disconnected with them.

Resolved, That we view the "protest" of the president against the assumed and unconstitutional course of the senate, as worthy the high source whence it emanated; and as a state paper in which the duties of the executive, in reference to the treasury department, are clearly and correctly expounded, according to the spirit as well as the letter of the constitution.

Resolved, That we retain undiminished confidence in the strict integrity and singleness of purpose, of our venerable chief magistrate; and exceedingly regret that in the decline of life and in the maturity of experience, he should be grossly assailed and calumniated by interested partisans, for adopting those measures which tend alone to promote the safety, as well as the prosperity and glory of his country.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions, signed by the grand sachein and secretary, be transmitted to the president and vice president of the United States, senators Wright and Tallmadge, and honorable Messrs. Cauterleing, White and Lawrence, and be published in all the democratic papers in this city.

SHIVERS PARKER, grand sachein.

John J. Bedient, secretary.
Wigwam, Manhattan, season of blossoms, year of discovery 342, of independence 58, and of the institution the 45th.

How will they manage with the "eodidic?"

Let us hear what Mr. Ritchie says—
"Now, we admit at once that congress has the right to place the public funds, not only in whatsoever places they may please, but in whosoever hands they please. We contend, that the custody and control of the moneys of the United States, not appropriated by law, are, by the constitution, placed under the order and direction of the congress of the United States—that they may entrust its custody to 'other agency than that of the executive department;' and that they may take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of it, 'without an assumption of executive power.'"

REMARKS OF MR. CLAYTON, OF DELAWARE.

Following Mr. Leigh in debate on Friday, April 18.

[Mr. Leigh having concluded, Mr. Ering obtained the floor, and desired an adjournment before he proceeded with his remarks on the president's protest; but gave way, to enable Mr. Wilkins to move that the senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.]

Mr. Clayton said, that he could not assent to this motion. The president has menaced the very constitutional existence of the senate. He says that, whether its censures are submitted to or resisted by him, in either event the consequences resulting from its conduct, must "lead to serious alterations of the frame-work of the constitution." And he gives utterance to this sentiment in the sentence in which he speaks of the senate as a "body holding their offices for long terms, not elected by the people;" while in the communication from which this menace is extracted, the object of it is exposed by the insinuation that the senate may, in future, refuse to sanction the appropriations of public money as he desires, or to confirm his nominations. This threat, accompanied by an appeal to the people, while his executive nomination of a host of office holders is before us, demand of us, in my judgment, the exercise of whatever of energy and firmness of character we possess, to vindicate and maintain the honor, dignity and character of the American senate, and of the states it represents. I propose, sir, that we pass no bill, nor confirm any important and disputed nomination, until we have decided the question before us; after which, unawed by power, and unruined by passion, let us proceed, without the slightest regard to the president's threats, insults or denunciations, to do our duty precisely as if he had not violated his. Let us then—but not till then—forget that this electioneering document ever had an existence, and proceed to reject all his nominations which ought to be rejected, as well as to confirm all that ought to be confirmed; in short, to do all that ought to be done, without the slightest regard to any stratagem we may resort to, for the purpose of seducing or frightening us from our duty.

Sir, the true view of this subject will not escape the American people. They will see at once, that the president has been guilty of a palpable violation of the fundamental privileges of their public servants in this hall. The third section of the second article of the constitution, regulating the official intercourse of the president with the senate, gives him power to send messages to the senate—1st, containing information of the state of the union—and, 2dly, recommending some measures for their consideration and adoption. It has not been pretended that this message purports to give information of the state of the union, or that it recommends any measure whatever for the senate to adopt. On the contrary, it expressly purports to be a mere "protest" against a measure already considered and adopted. It denounces the conduct of the senate, as unjustifiable and unconstitutional, in agreeing to the resolution which denied his unlimited authority over the purse, as well as the sword of the nation; it debates his claim of royal prerogative, and reaffirms all his pretensions to unlimited power; it professes "promptly to expunge the wrongs the senate has done him;" and for this purpose, and under this pretence, demands a place on our records. It recommends no legislation, proposes nothing, not even the repeal of the obnoxious resolution; and is intended as a popular harangue, to be used by his partisans in the coming elections. He might as well ask us to insert any other matter on our journals, which is daily published by his government press, for the same purposes.

The senator from Virginia (Mr. Leigh) has shown, by referring to Mr. Jefferson's Manual, that, independently of the grant of power to the president in the constitution, to send us messages touching the state of the union, and to recommend certain measures for the action of congress, the law of parliament gives him no right to take notice of any matter depending, or of votes that have been given, or of speeches which have been held by the members of either of the branches of the legislature, until the same have been communicated to him in the usual parliamentary manner. The resolution which is the subject of the president's message, was never communicated to him. It was a mere test of the opinions of the senate preparatory to its own future legislative action, and, as such, was not even communicated to the other house. Our duty, on this occasion, is illustrated by the precedent referred to by Mr. Jefferson, and so much approved by him that he has preserved it and made it a part of his Manual. "Thus," says he, "the king's taking notice of the bill for suppressing soldiers, depending before the house, his proposing a provisional clause for a bill before it was presented to him by the two houses; his expressing displeasure against some persons for matters moved in parliament during the debate and preparation of a bill, were breaches of privilege; and, in 1783, it was declared a breach of fundamental privileges to report any opinion or pretended opinion of the king, on any bill or proceeding depending in either house of parliament, with a view to influence the votes of the members." The leading precedent among those referred to by Mr. Jefferson, to sustain his opinion, is one to which I now invite the particular attention of the senate. I refer to Clarendon's report of it, because the advocates of the royal prerogative, or of executive power, in any age, will most readily respect his authority.

In the year 1641, at the first dawn of civil liberty in that country from which we have drawn our principal institutions, a dispute arose between the commons of England and the king, pending the bill for the suppression of the rebellion in Ireland, in which the commons denied the king's prerogative in any case, but that of invasion from a foreign power, to press the freeborn subject. Remark, sir, that the dispute between the king and the house of commons was, at that day, as this between the president and senate is, a question of executive power and prerogative. We deny the president's right to the purse, while we admit his right to the sword. They denied the king's right to unlimited power over the liberty of the freeborn subject, when called upon by his prince to wield the sword. The house of lords took part in the dispute with the king, as our house of representatives, though undoubtedly swayed by the best of motives, now take part with the president. The commons of 1641, (the whigs of the day,) resisted the royal prerogative, in defiance of both king and lords. Thereupon, the king went to the house of commons and expressed his princely zeal for the relief of Ireland, in terms as honeyed as our president has employed to express his regard for the people in this message; and, (says Clarendon), "taking notice of the bill for pressing, depending with the lords, as the commons had passed it, and the dispute raised concerning that ancient and undoubted prerogative, to avoid further debate, the king offered that the bill should pass with a salvo jure both for the king and people," (the meaning of which was that neither the claim of the commons nor that of the king should be considered thereafter settled by the precedent), even as our president now asks to put his protest on the journal, "to the end that the resolution of the senate may not hereafter be drawn into precedent with the authority of silent acquiescence on the part of the executive department."

You observe, sir, that no official communication, on the subject before the commons of England, had been made, by order of that house, to the king. His majesty sent his protest, salvo jure, to that house, as our president has sent his protest to this senate, without any previous official information of the proceedings regarding the executive power and prerogative. The important difference between the two cases lies here: that in the case of the king, notice was taken of the bill pending, before it was presented to him for his approbation or dislike, in due course of parliament; in the case of the president, while notice was taken of a resolution before it was presented to him in due course of congress, and which was never intended (as he well knew) to be, nor could be, presented to him for his approbation or dislike, notice was also taken of the debates on the resolution, and of all the amendments moved to it, and the president's displeasure was also distinctly and strongly expressed against at least four of the senators who voted for it—I mean, sir, the senators from New Jersey, Maine and Ohio.

Now, let us inquire what was done by the parliament of England, in 1641, after the king had sent in his protest. Why, the lords, who before had differed in opinion with the commons on the subject of the prerogative—yes, sir, those peers who had before considered the doctrine which denied the authority to press the freeborn subject as "new, and contrary to the usage and custom of all times," as many now declare our denial of the president's right to remove even a marshal who shall not refuse, at his bidding, to execute a decision of one of our courts, if the president choose to consider it unconstitutional, as new and contrary to all former usage—those very Tory peers, I say, voted, with the commons, that the king's protest was a MANIFEST BREACH OF THE PRIVILEGES OF PARLIAMENT. Clarendon informs us, that, as soon as the king's proposition was received, the divided lords and commons immediately united themselves in a petition to the king, declaring "that, amongst the privileges of parliament, it was their ancient and undoubted right, that his majesty ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate, in either house of parliament, but by their information and agreement; and that his majesty ought not to propound any condition, provision or limitation, to any bill or act, in debate or preparation, in either house of parliament; OR TO DECLARE HIS CONSENT OR DISSENT, HIS APPROBATION OR DISLIKE OF THE SAME, BEFORE IT BE PRESENTED TO HIM IN DUE COURSE OF PARLIAMENT. They declared that all those privileges had been lately broken, to their great sorrow and grief, in that speech which his majesty had made to them, wherein he took notice of a bill for pressing of soldiers, and offered a salvo jure and provisional clause to be added to it, before it was presented to him; and therefore they besought him, by his royal power, to protect them in those and the other privileges of his high court of parliament; and that he would not, for the time to come, break or interrupt them; and that, for the reparation of them in that their grievance and complaint, he would declare and make known the name of such person, by whose mis-information and evil counsel, his majesty was induced to the same, that he might receive condign punishment."

"And having delivered this petition," says the royal historian, "they no more considered Ireland, till this manifest breach should be repaired—which they resolved nothing should do but the passing of the bill"—and so, in the end, after a long controversy between the whigs and Tories of that day, between the people or parliament on the one side, and the king on the other, the king, he adds, "was compelled to pass the bill for pressing, which the commons had prepared." Yes, sir, the whigs of 1641 refused to transact any other business, under these circumstances, until the breach of their privileges was repaired. The object of the "salvo jure," or protest of the monarch, was to gain all the supplies for his army without a surrender of his prerogative—the object of the president now is, to obtain our consent to all his appointments, and to gain all the appropriations for the salaries of all his officers, as he terms them, not only without a surrender of his asserted prerogative of unlimited power over them all, but in defiance of the senate, and while he compels us to admit his claim on our own records. Sir, I desire to imitate at least a part of the example set me in the illustrious precedent of 1641. I will not fall below the standard of opposition to kingly prerogative and executive encroachment, established by that parliament, which brought a British monarch to terms, and to which we are indebted for the first light of civil liberty. This act of Charles, in 1641, was one of that series of aggressions which eventually brought the English tyrant to the block. It remains for the American senate to say, whether it will proceed to consider the other business of the session, before its own character and its own just claims and privileges have been vindicated and reasserted, by the proper disposition of this protest. But, for myself, I repeat that, viewing this act as a flagrant breach of privilege, and an attempt to lecture and intimidate the senate, because it has dared to discuss and declare the limits of the prerogative and power of one who has extended his claims far beyond those of any British monarch since the English revolution, I shall vote against the motion of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, and every other motion to proceed to any other important business, before this paper has been disposed of.

Mr. Calhoun followed on the same side, expressing his hearty concurrence in the views taken by the senator from Delaware, and his earnest hope that the senate would refuse to proceed to any other business.

Mr. Wilkins replied that he only wished the senate to consider a treaty.

Mr. Sprague said the treaty was unimportant at this time, and concurred fully in the views of Mr. Clayton.

On motion of Mr. Ewing, the senate then adjourned.

PRESENTMENT OF A GRAND JURY.

From the New York Courier & Enquirer.

The grand jury of Davidson county, N. C. have presented Andrew Jackson, president of the United States, as having disappointed the reasonable expectations of the people of that country, who had supported him "under the conviction that he would correct the abuses which had crept into the government and bring it back to its original purity and simplicity;" but so far from this, he is doing more says the grand jury, "by a hundred fold to subvert the constitution and change the form of government than any or all of his predecessors put together." "The grand jury goes on to specify his acts. The following are but a part of them; we have not room for the whole.

1st. For his arbitrary, despotic and unconstitutional conduct, in seizing the public money, removing it from the place where it had been deposited by law, and distributing it among various favorite local banks, scattered all over the country, many of which are of very doubtful and suspicious character—thereby endangering the safety of the public funds, and setting the constitution and the laws at naught. This act of arbitrary power has deranged the whole trade and business of the country, and has brought ruin and bankruptcy on thousands of our fellow citizens, while every industrious and hard working man throughout the land has, more or less, been injured by it.

2d. We present him for his reckless obstinacy in this measure, after he sees its ruinous consequences, and after he must see that it incurs the general disapprobation of the American people.

3d. We present him for his haughty and kingly deportment towards various fellow citizens, who, from time to time, have called on him as deputations sent by large assemblages of people, to lay their sufferings and distress before him, and to ask relief. We think it a bad omen for liberty, when the deputies of the people are denied admittance to the president, who is only the people's servant, or, when admitted, to be spurned from his presence with words of anger and scorn, and told to go and seek relief elsewhere.

4th. We present him as having violated all his solemn promises and pledges made to the country before his election, and while he was a candidate. Among other things, he promised to reform the abuses of the government, and to correct the extravagances and corruptions which had crept into its practice; but, so far from having done this, these extravagances and corruptions have increased with every year of his administration. We see that during the last year the expenditures of the government have run up to the enormous sum of 22,000,000 of dollars, nearly or altogether double what they ought to be, and treble what they were during the economical administration of Thos. Jefferson. Unless a speedy stop be put to this profligacy, it is certain that, in a very short time, the people may look out for additional taxes and burthens.

5th. We present him for his ruthless course of proscription towards those who have held appointments under the federal government, and who were not his political partisans. Contrary to the example of all his predecessors, he has driven hundreds of honest men out of office, not on account of crimes, or malpractices, but merely for opinions sake—that is, because they differed with him, or some of his favorites, in their political opinions. And, in filling offices, in most cases, he puts in those who will not only flatter his vanity by fulsome adulation unbefitting our republican manners and institutions, but who constantly busy themselves in electioneering to impose on the country, as the next president, his avowed favorite.

6th. We present him for prostituting the patronage and the money of the government to aid his favorite in his struggle to attain the next presidential chair; thus taking on himself to dictate to the people who they shall elect, and like the Caesars of Rome, declare his successor.

THE ALTERATIONS OF THE PROTEST.

It was not until after the last REGISTER was in the press, that we saw the following explanatory article, else it would have been inserted:

Washington, April 22, 1834.

To the editor of the Globe:

Sir: Understanding that certain verbal alterations in the message transmitted by the president to the senate, on the 17th inst. which I suggested to the secretary of the senate, were the subject of comment yesterday by members of that honorable body, I feel that I am called upon to state the circumstances under which I thought myself warranted in making this suggestion, and with this view, request the insertion of the following explanation.

About 3 o'clock of the day on which the paper in question was presented to the senate, I received from the publisher of the Globe the proof impressions of the same paper, which had been set up from the duplicate intended for the president's file, and which had been previously sent to the compositors. In the examination of the proof, among the corrections that were made, were the following words, which I supposed to be clerical mistakes:

1st. In page 9 in the sentence "Indirectly also, his conduct may come under review in either branch of the legislature, or in the senate when acting in its executive capacity, and so far as the executive or legislative proceedings of these bodies may require it, it may be exercised by them." The word "exercised" was stricken out, and the word "examined" which was obviously the word required by the sense and structure of the sentence, inserted.

2d. In page 48, in the sentence, "This change having been made for the express purpose of declaring the sense of congress, that the president derived the power of removal from the constitution, the act, as it passed, has always been considered as a full admission of the sense of the legislature on this important part of the American constitution," the word "expression" was substituted for "admission," as being more appropriate to the idea intended to be conveyed. This was also the word used in the corresponding remark of chief justice Marshall, in his account of the passage of this bill, which had been consulted, and was substantially followed, in the notes from which this part of the president's message was drawn.

3d. In page 53, in the sentence, "The legislative power may undoubtedly bind him and the president by any laws they may think proper to enact; they may prescribe in what place particular portions of the public property shall be kept, and for what reason it shall be removed, as they may direct that supplies for the army or navy shall be kept in particular stores; and it will be the duty of the president to see that the law is faithfully executed—yet will the custody remain in the executive department of the government," the word "money" was substituted for "property," as being called for by the context, and being obviously more suitable to the idea of the president.

4th. In the first sentence of the paragraph, page 57, beginning with "The dangerous tendency of the doctrine which denies to the president the power of supervising, directing and controlling the secretary of the treasury, in like manner with the other executive officers, would soon be manifest in practice, were the doctrine to be established." The word "removing" was substituted for "controlling," because it was considered as more fully meeting the idea of the president. As the sentence stood, the word "controlling" expressed no other idea than the words "supervising and directing," whereas, the power of "removing" was also claimed on the one hand and denied on the other.

The suggestion of the alteration in page 60 of the expression "the secretaries" for "his secretaries," was dictated simply by a wish to make the paper transmitted to the senate correspond with the duplicate retained by the president, and with the publication from the latter, which appeared in the Globe.

duplicate retained by the president, the words stood originally "the secretaries," and not "his secretaries?" in this paragraph—a disagreement, which may well have escaped the most careful comparison of the two papers; especially as it was not perceived that there was any difference between the two terms. In the duplicate as well as in the publication in the Globe, the expression "his secretaries," occurs in the succeeding paragraph; in which last paragraph, I did not suggest any variation of the words "his secretaries," but they yet remain there.

When I went to the senate on Friday, the day after the delivery of the message, I carried with me a memorandum of the errors thus designated, fully expecting to find that they would not exist in the paper which had been transmitted to the senate; but yet, if they should, considering them as merely verbal and unimportant, I was not sensible of any impropriety in suggesting their correction to the secretary of the senate. The suggestion was made in the presence, I think, of several members of the senate, and the fact, that the errors were ascertained, was stated and explained to at least one member of the senate, in the senate chamber, in the course of the day, and before the senate proceeded to the discussion of the subject on Friday. The suggested corrections were entered in pencil by the secretary, leaving the original words untouched, and the propriety of adopting them was left entirely to his direction, should the senate decide to enter the paper on their journal.

I trust that there will be seen in the motives for this explanation, a sufficient apology for laying it before the public, as not only due to the senate but to myself. I am, very respectfully your ob't serv't
A. J. DONELSON.

ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Head quarters of the army, adjutant general's office,
Washington, April 19, 1834.

[ORDER NO. 31.]

I. The field officers of artillery are assigned as follows:

*1st reg't	colonel,	Fort Washington.
of artillery,	lieutenant colonel,	Fort Severn.
	major,	Fort Moultrie.
†2d reg't	colonel,	Augusta arsenal, Georgia.
of artillery,	lieutenant colonel,	Fort Marion.
	major, (acting)	Fort Monroe.
‡3d reg't	colonel,	Fort Monroe.
of artillery,	lieutenant colonel,	Fort Wolcott.
	major,	Fort Independence.
§4th reg't	colonel,	Fort McHenry.
	lieutenant colonel,	Fort Columbus.
	major,	Fort Monroe.

II. Company B, 1st artillery, now stationed at Fort McHenry, will relieve company I, of the 4th artillery, at Fort Severn, and on being so relieved, brevet major Erving, with his company, will repair to Fort McHenry. Capt. F. Whiting's company, (I), 1st artillery, will repair to Fort Washington, and relieve company F, when brevet major Mason, with his company, will proceed to join the garrison at Fort Monroe.

III. Fort Niagara will be evacuated, and the garrison, consisting of companies D and H, of the 2d infantry, will proceed to Fort Gratiot, and there relieve companies E and I, of the 4th artillery, when brevet major Payne, with his command, will proceed to New York, and thence, with his company, take post at Fort Trumbull. Company H will join the garrison of Fort Hamilton.

IV. The head quarters of the 2d and 4th regiments of infantry are transferred, the former from Fort Niagara to Madison barracks, the latter from Mobile to Baton Rouge.

V. The field officers of artillery and infantry, will proceed to their respective stations, as above designated, on the 31st of May, or as soon as circumstances will permit; and the movement of troops, under the direction of the respective commanding officers, will take place without unnecessary delay.

VI. Assistant surgeon Minis is assigned to duty at Castla Pinckney, to which post he will repair without delay. Assistant surgeon Stinacche will continue on duty at Fort Gratiot.

VII. The garrison of Fort Monroe will no longer be regarded as the exclusive school of practice; as, at all military posts, the commanding officer will be responsible for the discipline and proper instruction of the troops, in all their duties. The usual reports and returns from the post, will be made direct to the general of department, who will exercise the same authority at Fort Monroe as at other military posts within his command: accordingly, the monthly, and other returns and reports, heretofore received from Fort Monroe, as of "the military school of practice," will be discontinued. By order of major general
R. JONES, adjutant general.

PHILADELPHIA COUNCILS.

The city of Philadelphia is a large holder of real property and stocks by the legacy of Stephen Girard, &c. They memorialized congress, and sent a committee to Washington with it. That committee has recently reported—and the following parts of their report we think ought to be preserved:

Shortly after their arrival in Washington, the committee addressed a note to the president of the United States, couched in the most respectful terms, requesting that he would have the goodness to appoint a time when it would be agreeable to him to receive them for the purpose of expressing to him the views of councils, in relation to the official object of their visit to Washington.

On the same evening they received from him, with feelings which they will not describe, the following very unequivocal denial, viz:

"Washington, April 7th, 1834.

"GENTLEMEN: In reply to your note of this evening expressing a wish to present to me the views of the select and common councils of Philadelphia, in relation to the propriety of rechartering the bank of the United States, and restoring to it the deposits of public money, I have to observe that it will give me pleasure to see you as individuals, but not for the purpose of discussing those subjects, at any time to-morrow between 10 and 12 o'clock.

Whatever you may please to communicate, as a committee, if made in writing, will be cheerfully received and considered. For reasons which have been made public, I hold no communication with committees on such subjects that are not made in writing. I am very respectfully, your obt<sup>d</sup> serv<sup>t</sup>

ANDREW JACKSON.

Messrs. R. M. Houston, George S. Schott and others, committee on behalf of the select and common councils of Philadelphia.

On the same evening the committee returned the following reply.

"To the president of the United States:

SIR: We respectfully acknowledge the receipt of your note, in reply to our communication of this evening, and duly appreciate your invitation to see us "as individuals."

Under any other circumstances, we should have given respectful attention to this invitation. But not having come to this city "as individuals," but "as a committee from the select and common councils of the city of Philadelphia," if we are not permitted to appear in that character and "to discuss" those matters of deep interest to our constituents which caused us to be sent here, we feel constrained, by a sense of what is due to them, not to appear in any other.

R. M. HOUSTIN,
GEO. S. SCHOTT,
JOS. B. SMITH,
JOSHUA LIPPINCOTT,
JOHN P. WETHERILL.

Washington, April 7th, 1834.

The committee acknowledge having received very kind attention from many members of congress from different parts of the union, and of adverse politics; and they particularly return thanks on that account to Messrs. Clay, McKean and Southard of the senate, and Messrs. Binney, Harper and Watmough, of the house of representatives.

STATE BANKS.

Report of the committee of ways and means, on the employment of state banks as depositories of public money.

[Read in the house of representatives, April 29.]

Mr. Folk, from the committee of ways and means, made the following report:

The committee of ways and means, in pursuance of the third resolution of their former report upon the subject of the bank of the United States and the public deposits, which was adopted by the house, submit the following

REPORT:

The house, by its vote, having decided "that the state banks ought to be continued as the places of deposit of the public money, and that it is expedient for congress to make further provision, by law, prescribing the mode of selection, the securities to be taken, and the manner and terms on which they are to be employed," the committee deemed it proper, in a measure of so much importance, to ascertain from the secretary of the treasury his opinion and views, in regard to the regulations proper to be adopted in the employment of the state banks as the depositories of the public money, and the fiscal agents of the government; and also for his views in regard to the probable effects which would be produced upon the currency by such regulations. They accordingly addressed a letter to the secretary, requesting to be furnished with the information desired, and herewith report the answer which has been received.

In determining upon the mode in which the deposit banks shall be selected, the committee are of opinion that a due regard to the public interests will make it proper to leave the selection, in the first instance, to the head of the treasury department, or to some other person designated by laws; but, when once selected, to put it out of the power of the executive to discontinue such depository without the sanction or approbation of congress. Should it, however, be deemed expedient for congress themselves to designate, by law, the banks which shall hereafter be employed as depositories instead of delegating the power of selection, in the first instance, to an executive officer, there could be no objection to that mode, provided it be deemed practicable to make the selection, in such manner as to protect and preserve the public funds to be deposited therein.

The bill which they report prescribes—first the mode in which, and by whom, the state banks hereafter to be employed as the public depositories, shall be selected. Secondly, the terms and conditions upon which they shall be employed, the duties and services they shall perform, and the securities which they may be required to give, in order effectually to protect the government against possible danger of loss; and thirdly, it provides that, when once selected, they shall be placed beyond the power and control of the executive department, except as far as the safe and prudent management of the public revenue may render such control indispensable.

The bill restricts the discretion of the executive and places it out of the power of that department to discontinue the selected banks as places of public deposit, to cases of failure on the part of said banks to comply with the terms and conditions on which they may be employed, or to cases in which any of the banks may become unsafe depositories of the public money, and reserves to congress the ultimate control over the whole subject.

By its provisions the secretary of the treasury cannot during the session of congress, dismiss from the service of the treasury any bank of deposit, without having first obtained the sanction and approbation of congress; and if during the recess of congress, any bank shall fail or refuse to comply with the terms and conditions upon which it has been employed; or if from the periodical returns of its condition and business, or otherwise, the secretary of the treasury shall deem it necessary, in order to protect and preserve public interest, to discontinue any of said banks as public depositories, he is authorized to issue such order, temporarily, but is required at the commencement of the next session, to report to congress the reasons and the evidence upon which he has ordered such discontinuance, reserving to congress the right to approve or reverse such order. Thus all apprehension that the power of the executive over the selected banks may be used as a governmental patronage, or for corrupt purposes, is effectually removed. So long as the selected banks shall continue to perform the duties required of them by the provisions of the bill, (should it become a law), and so long as they shall continue so to conduct their business as to keep the public funds deposited therein secure, they cannot be discontinued at the will of the executive, but will be entitled to their custody as a matter of right, unless it shall be the pleasure of congress to withdraw them, or change the place of deposit.

The committee concur with the secretary of the treasury in the views he has presented in his letter in regard to the importance of banishing from circulation bank notes of the small denominations, and of substituting gold and silver coin in their place. This may, doubtless, to some extent be encouraged and effected through the collection and management of the revenue. Congress possesses no power to restrict the state institutions from issuing small notes; but they have the power to impose as a condition upon which any bank shall be employed as a depository, that it shall first stipulate not to issue or use, after a given future day, notes of the smaller denominations, in the course of its business; and they have a right to refuse to receive in payment to the United States, the notes of any bank which shall not cease, after a given future day, to issue small notes. The bill, accordingly contains a provision to this effect, designed to induce the state banks to co-operate in banishing from circulation all notes of a less denomination than five dollars, after a given future day. In several states such a prohibition already exists, and in those states a metallic circulation has been found to take the place of the small notes which have been withdrawn. It may be necessary, hereafter, for congress to extend the prohibition to the issue of notes below the denomination of ten or twenty dollars. But the committee do not deem it expedient, at this time to recommend that the prohibition should be extended to notes above the denomination of five dollars. Should it hereafter be deemed proper, congress can adopt further legislative provisions on the subject.

It will be perceived from the letter of the secretary of the treasury herewith reported, that further legislation in relation to the coins constitutes an important part of his scheme of the currency. The committee concur in opinion that it is important that further legal provisions should be made regulating the value of foreign coins, and making the foreign gold and silver coins a tender in payment of debts, and also regulating the standard value of our own coins.

They have, however, reported no bill on the subject of the coins, because bills upon that subject, have already been brought before the house by a select committee to whom this particular branch of the subject had been referred by the house. They concur in opinion that it is important they should be acted on at the present session of congress.

Treasury department, April 15, 1834.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, of the 7th inst. and proceed to reply to the inquiries made by the committee of ways and means.

In my report to congress at the commencement of the present session, assigning my reasons for removing the deposits from the bank of the United States, I expressed the opinion that a corporation of that description, was not necessary, either for the fiscal operations of the government, or the general convenience of the people.

One of the arguments most frequently urged in favor of the expediency of a bank of the United States, is the salutary influence which it is supposed to exert in securing to the country a sound currency. It is said the state banks have a constant tendency to over issue, and that a superior power is necessary, to keep them in check, and to control them in this particular—and the argument is constantly and earnestly pressed, that a bank of the United States is the fit and appropriate means to accomplish this object. If there be any force in this argument, the paper currency furnished by the state banks, as well as that issued by the bank of the U. States, ought now to be in a sound state. The bank of the United States has been in existence seventeen years, and must have already exerted all the influence in relation to the currency, which can ever be expected from such an institution. And if it exercises a wholesome and salutary control over the conduct of the state banks, and restrains them within proper bounds, it has had full time and opportunity to exert that power, and the notes of the state banks, as well as those of the bank of the United States, ought now to be found in a safe condition. For it must be admitted, that we have gained but little by chartering the bank of the United States, if only the comparatively small portion of the paper currency furnished by itself, is sound, while the great mass of the circulating medium is inherently vicious, and liable to be disordered at any moment. It is believed that more than three-fourths of the paper currency, is furnished by the state banks, and if so large a portion of our circulating medium is unsafe and unworthy of credit, then the bank of the United States is either incapable of exercising the salutary control claimed for it, or it has failed to perform its duty to the public. In either event it is time to look for some other remedy.

Judging from the best information which the department has been able to obtain, the paper of the various banks, (including the bank of the United States), in actual circulation in ordinary times, amounts to at least eighty millions of dollars. Of this sum, the bank of the United States furnishes less than twenty millions, and the various state banks more than sixty millions; the specie in the vaults of the same banks, to support this extensive credit, does not probably exceed twenty-five millions.

In estimating the amount of specie, I confine myself to the coin supposed to be in possession of the banks. In some of the states, the circulation of bank notes below five dollars is prohibited by law, and in these states there is a considerable amount of specie passing from hand to hand, and forming a part of the ordinary circulating medium. It does not, however, probably, exceed four millions of dollars. This metallic circulation lessens by so much the amount of paper, and to that extent it diminishes the evil occasioned by the great disproportion between the paper superstructure and its metallic basis. But the coin which is thus circulating, cannot be brought in aid of the paper currency, when a panic, or any other cause, suddenly throws it back upon the bank for redemption. It cannot, therefore, be estimated as a part of the means to secure the payment of the actual paper circulation. It takes the place of so much paper in the mass of the circulating medium, and thereby lessens the amount to be redeemed. But it will never find its way into the banks when their notes are rapidly returning upon them. They must rely upon the amount actually in their vaults—and it is with this amount that we must compare the paper circulation, in order to decide whether it is in a safe condition. It is evident that the chief part of the paper currency of the United States must always be furnished by the state banks. No bank of the United States could provide a sufficient amount for the whole nation, without giving to it a capital of such enormous and startling magnitude, that no one, it is presumed, would seriously propose it.

And if congress are to legislate, with the view of securing to the people of the United States a sound paper currency, the condition of the notes of the state banks is of much more importance to the community, than that of any bank of the United States. The notes of the different local banks form the ordinary circulating medium for the great body of our citizens; and it would be unjust to them, to disregard its condition. The whole currency of the country should be placed in a sound and healthy state, as far as the legitimate authority of the United States will enable them to accomplish that object.

Under the authority delegated to congress by the constitution of the United States, they have no power to establish by law a paper currency; and the influence which they may lawfully exercise in securing its soundness, is altogether incidental. In legislating within the admitted scope of their authority, they may, without assuming powers not granted, look to the effect which their laws will produce upon an interest of so much importance as that of the paper circulation now floating through the country.

Taking this view of the subject, the first inquiry is, what is the present condition of the ordinary circulating medium of the United States? Is the great mass of the paper currency in a sound and healthy condition? If it is, we must endeavor to find means to preserve it in its present state, when the bank of the United States shall cease to exist. But if it is not, then it is obvious that the creation of a bank of the United States will not accomplish this desirable object, and that, even on the score of expediency, without reference to constitutional objections, some other plan should be devised.

If the estimate I have made of the proportion between the paper circulation and the specie in possession of the banks be correct, or nearly so, the condition of the currency is obviously such, that the nation should not be content with it, nor desire to continue it in its present state. It is an immense superstructure of paper, resting on a metallic foundation too narrow to support it. It has never been sustained by its own inherent strength, but by public confidence. When every one firmly believes that the notes of the banks will, on demand, be paid in coin, they readily circulate and answer all the purposes of money. But the moment that confidence is impaired, they lose their value as a part of the circulating medium, and are returned upon the banks for redemption in specie, and the disproportion between the paper circulation and the coin prepared to redeem it, is so great, that it is constantly liable to have its chief support, public confidence, withdrawn from it.

In speaking of the dangers to which the currency is exposed, I do not mean to intimate that the state banks are unable to pay the amount of notes they have issued. On the contrary, I am persuaded that, with very few exceptions, they are as safe as the bank of the United States. For that bank has never been in a condition to redeem its notes in specie, if they were all suddenly thrown back upon it. My object in inviting the attention of the committee to this subject, is not only to show the real condition of the currency, but to mark the utter inconsistency of the argument, which urges the recharter of the bank of the United States, on the ground that it has furnished a sound currency to the nation, and at the same time, attempts to discredit the notes of the state banks. Both parts of the argument cannot be true. The bank of the United States has not furnished the nation with a sound paper currency, and has produced no salutary effect on the great mass of it, unless the issues of the state banks are now in a safe and healthy condition.

The difficulty under which the state banks are laboring at this time, does not prove that they are unsound, and that they have been worse managed than the bank of the United States; when reports injurious to the credit of the state banks are industriously and widely circulated, some degree of embarrassment is unavoidable; especially when it is generally supposed to be in the power of the bank of the United States to stop them at its pleasure. The evil is however in its nature temporary, and will soon pass away. And the intelligence of the citizens will readily discover that the present difficulty is the offspring of useless alarm, and of a deliberate design to destroy the credit of the state banks. And when the real object of the excitement, and unfounded rumors which are daily circulated, shall be understood by the people, confidence will soon be restored, and business resume its usual channel. The stoppage of a bank from any cause, naturally produces a run on the banks in its neighborhood, and if pains are taken to increase this excitement and alarm, the evil will be more extensively felt than it would be in ordinary times.

The dangerous expansion of the paper circulation, compared with its specie basis, shows that there is something essentially vicious in the whole system; and the mischief, so far from being corrected or lessened by a bank of the United States, is more probably aggravated by such an institution. The great amount of paper afloat proves that the quantity depends more on the discretion and judgment of those who make the paper, than on their ability to redeem it whenever it is called for. The dominion which a bank of the United States must always exercise over the smaller corporations of the states, vests in it the entire discretion of expansion or contraction. If it discount and issue its paper freely, the state banks are induced by the hopes of profit, to follow its example. If it suddenly curtails; they must curtail also, or become the victims of their own imprudence. And if, by any means, the conduct of that bank disturbs the public confidence in the safety of the state banks, their notes will be returned upon them with such rapidity as to endanger even the best managed institutions—and while such a power remains in the hands of a single corporation, the country will be constantly liable to sudden agitations and excitements from the alternate expansion and contraction of the currency; and those engaged in commerce will, in the years of abundance, be led into an extension of their business, which must in the succeeding years of scarcity, inevitably result in bankruptcy and ruin. In a time of pressure, confidence is easily shaken; and whenever it becomes the interest of the bank of the United States to excite alarm in the country, its great money power will most commonly enable it to effect the object, and by destroying confidence and credit, in a few months throw the whole business of the nation into confusion.

A system of currency thus liable to constant fluctuations, and always in danger of being entirely overturned, is certainly one of the worst that can be devised. Every species of property is unstable and insecure, unless the currency which is to be exchanged for it shall be steady in its value, and not liable to be seriously disturbed by accident or design. And the danger and evil is abundantly manifested by the history of the U. States, since the establishment of the present bank. Years of hollow prosperity have been succeeded by years of pressure and suffering; and the present condition of things demonstrates how readily a concerted effort to excite a panic and destroy confidence, may endanger the great mass of the circulating medium; and injure most extensively the property and industry of the country. The great evil of our present currency is the disproportion between the paper in circulation and the coin prepared to redeem it. The remedy is, to diminish this proportion, and to give to the paper currency a broader and firmer metallic foundation. Can this object be best accomplished with or without a bank of the United States?

I do not perceive that a bank of the United States, upon any plan, is likely to diminish the evil.

It may perhaps be supposed that a restriction on the bank, which would prevent it from issuing notes below twenty dollars, would tend to accomplish the object. But the only effect of such a restriction would be, to substitute the notes of state banks of the lower denominations, in the place of the notes of the bank of the United States.

Gold and silver will never circulate, where banks issue notes which come in competition with them. For it will invariably happen that when the circulating medium is composed of different kinds of money, and one of them is less valuable than the other, but not sufficiently depreciated to be discredited, the inferior will, after a time, become the general currency, and the more valuable will entirely disappear. This is obvious in the states where the banks issue notes as low as one dollar. For silver dollars are never found in circulation where paper ones are freely issued by the banks. In order, therefore, to bring the precious metals into use, the rivalry of paper must be effectually taken away. We must not only remove the notes of the bank of the United States, but also the notes of the state banks.

And to create a bank of the United States, and restrict its issues, as above suggested, would be to invite the state banks to issue largely that description of paper which will not be interrupted by the competition of the bank of the U. States. The paper circulation would not be diminished, nor would the proportions of the metals be increased. Paper dollars would still be manufactured in the same abundance; they would still come in competition with gold and silver, and drive them from circulation.

The restriction therefore on the issue of the smaller notes, cannot be effectual, unless the several states shall be willing to co-operate with the legislation of congress. They could hardly be expected to prohibit the issue of notes under twenty dollars by their banks, while a bank of the United States was in existence with all the advantage it would possess over the state institutions. And if they could be induced to unite in such a plan, the inevitable result would be to put an end to the state banks. For their circulation of larger notes would be so much restrained by the competition and superior advantages of the notes of the bank of the United States, that the small state corporations would probably soon find their charters of no value, and be compelled to wind up their concerns. The field for paper currency would then be left entirely to the bank of the United States. Their notes being receivable every where in payment of debts due to the government, would give them a credit beyond their real value. The temptation under such circumstances to over issues of paper would be almost irresistible. And after closing, by this course of legislation, the doors of the state banks we should soon find ourselves with a paper currency equally liable to depreciation with the present one, from the great disproportion the paper would bear to the specie provided to redeem it. In a plan which would lead to such results, we could hardly expect the states to come in aid of the legislation of congress, but we might count on their cordial co operation in efforts to place the whole circulating medium of the country on a safe and durable foundation, when it can be done without injustice to their own citizens who are interested in the state institutions.

The first step towards a sound condition of the currency, is to reform the coinage of gold. The present gold coin is worth more in silver than its nominal value. It is therefore never seen in the ordinary exchanges of the country, and it is worse than useless to continue the expense of coining it at the mint, unless it is intended for circulation. It will never make its way into general circulation until the relative value of silver and gold is observed, as near as may be, in the pieces coined of the respective metals. It has been truly said that gold is the antagonist of paper. Silver is too heavy to be transported from place to place, in large sums without inconvenience. Some other circulating medium of general currency is therefore necessary, even for the expenses of a journey from one state to another. There must be either a paper currency of general credit, or gold must be introduced. And it is essential that in its standard value as coin, it should be placed on its proper footing in relation to silver, before a paper currency of general credit can be conveniently dispensed with. The charter to the bank of the United States, by making its paper receivable every where for debts due to the government, furnishes a paper currency not equal to gold and silver, but yet of sufficient credit for common use, and for the purposes of travelling from place to place. This will continue until the 3d of March, 1835. It is desirable, therefore, that provision should be made at the present session of congress for the reform of the gold coins. The coinage will require time, and as this general paper currency is gradually retiring from circulation, the gold should be prepared to take its place. We produce gold to a large amount in the U. States, and the product is increasing every year. The greater part of it is now exported as bullion, and this will continue to be the case until the value of the gold coin is changed; even if the change should be made at the present session, there would not perhaps be a sufficient supply of our own gold coins to meet the demand for a circulating medium of general credit, at the expiration of the charter of the bank. But if foreign gold coins should be made a legal tender at their real value, there would doubtless be enough of that metal, at the time above mentioned, to meet the wants of the public. And there can be no sufficient reason for throwing out of circulation the foreign coins of gold or silver, which are current in other parts of the commercial world. Indeed as a measure of immediate relief in the present state of things, it is necessary that the foreign coins, both of gold and silver, should be made a legal tender, in payment of debts, according to their intrinsic value. Very large importations of the foreign coins are continually arriving in the United States, and if they can be used by the state banks to discharge their engagements, they will, probably, remain here, and become a part of our circulating medium.

And if they were made a legal tender in payment of debts, it would enable the state banks to extend their issues, and to redeem their notes with greater facility. I respectfully invite the early attention of congress to this subject, and regard the proposed alteration in our laws as peculiarly necessary in the present exigency, and calculated to produce immediate and extensive benefit. As the bank of the United States withdraws its circulation, it is of the first importance that the state banks should be enabled to extend their issues and to supply immediately by their notes, the place which was filled by the bank of the United States.

With the reform of the gold currency, it is proper to associate measures to prevent the issue of small notes. The only step which congress could with propriety take, in relation to the notes of the state banks, would be to provide that no bank should be a depository of the public money, nor should the notes of any bank be receivable in payments of debts to the United States, which issued notes below a certain denomination. We may safely rely on the co operation of the several states to impose upon their banks the restrictions necessary to aid in this desirable change in the state of the currency. The alteration proposed, should, however, be gradual. A day might be fixed after which the restriction above mentioned should go into operation, as relates to notes below five dollars. A further restriction, so as to affect notes under ten dollars, would hereafter be advisable, and ought to be regarded as a part of the plan now proposed to be adopted. But it is not desirable, at this time, to name a definite day for that purpose. A great proportion of the issues of the state banks consists of five dollar notes.

Any measure calculated to impair the currency of notes of this description, about the time the bank of the United States is going out of existence, would be injurious to the public. When the bank of the United States is withdrawing its notes from circulation, the void must be filled up by gold and silver, or by the notes of the state banks, or the currency will be injuriously contracted. And if notes of five dollars were then put out of circulation, the diminution of the currency would perhaps be severely felt. And no measure should be adopted, calculated to impede their circulation, until it shall be manifest that the country is relieved from any inconvenience arising from the withdrawal of the notes of the bank of the United States. But as soon as that period arrives, and it is apparent that gold and silver can be provided for the ordinary circulation below ten dollars, it would be advisable to extend the restriction to notes of that denomination. For we can never be safe from the fluctuations of the currency until all notes below ten dollars are banished from circulation. And it will be still more secure when the restriction is carried up to notes of twenty dollars; so as to substitute the gold eagles in the place of ten dollar bank notes.

It will be seen from this statement, that it is no part of the proposed plan to dispense with the state banks. It obviously is not in the power of congress (if it desired to do so) to take any measures for that purpose, without an amendment to the constitution; and the states would not, and ought not to surrender the power of chartering banking companies. The state banks are now so numerous, and are so intimately connected with our habits and pursuits, that it is impossible to suppose that the system can ever be entirely abandoned. Nor is it desirable that it should be. They are often abused, like all other human institutions; yet their advantages are many, and under proper regulations, and with the metallic basis now proposed for their paper issues, they will be found of much public advantage.

If there were no state banks, the profitable business of banking and exchange would be monopolized by the great capitalists. Operations of this sort require capital and credit to a large extent, and a private individual in moderate circumstances would be unable to conduct them with any advantage. Yet there is perhaps no business which yields a profit so certain and liberal as the business of banking and exchange, and it is proper that it should be open, as far as practicable, to the most free competition, and its advantages shared by all classes of society. Individuals of moderate means cannot participate in them unless they combine together, and by the union of many small sums create a large capital and establish an extensive credit. It is impossible to accomplish this object without the aid of acts of incorporation so as to give the company security of unity of action and save it from the disadvantage of frequent changes in the partnership; by the death or retirement of some one of the numerous partners. The incorporated banks moreover, under proper regulations, will offer a safe and convenient investment of small sums to persons whose situations and pursuits disable them from employing their money profitably in any other mode. It is no more liable to be lost when vested in the stock of a bank than when it is loaned to individuals. The interest on it is paid with more punctuality and it can be sold and converted into cash whenever the owner desires to employ it in some other way, and if a larger portion of the metals are infused into the circulation, the business of banking will become more sound and wholesome, and less liable to the disasters from which it has suffered under our extravagant and ill-organized system of paper issues. It will render investments in banking companies entirely safe and secure to the holders, and afford them the almost absolute certainty of a reasonable profit, without endangering the capital invested in it. For this reason, it is neither practicable nor desirable to discountenance the continuance of the state banks.

They are convenient and useful also for the purposes of commerce. No commercial or manufacturing community could conduct its business to any advantage without a liberal system of credit, and a facility of obtaining money on loan when the exigencies of their business may require it. This cannot be obtained without the aid of a paper circulation founded on credit. It is therefore not the interest of this country to put down the paper currency altogether.

The great object should be to give to it a foundation on which it will safely stand. A circulating medium composed of paper and gold and silver in just proportion, would not be liable to be constantly disordered by the accidental embarrassments or imprudences of trade nor by a combination of the moneyed interest for political purposes. The value of the metals in circulation would remain the same, whether there was a panic or not, and the proportion of paper being less, the credit of the banks could not be so readily impaired or endangered.

The state of the currency then, which is proposed in the foregoing observations, would provide silver and gold for ordinary domestic purposes, and the smaller payments—and the banks of the different states would easily be able to furnish exchanges between distant places according to the wants of commerce. There cannot, therefore be any necessity for a paper circulation of general credit throughout the country. Funds are more conveniently and safely transferred from place to place by draughts and bills of exchange than by bank notes. The immense operations between different parts of the U. States, are now chiefly carried on by this means, and it is only in particular places and for comparatively small amounts, that notes are used; and the local institutions would, without doubt, in a very short time make arrangements among themselves to furnish the exchanges which commerce requires, and the competition among many would reduce the rate of exchange to its proper level. Besides, they would find it their interest to make agreements among themselves to honor each other's notes to a certain extent, and thus furnish as far as might be necessary, a paper currency of general circulation, in such places as would be likely, from their intercourse with each other, to require such a convenience. But the establishment of such a paper currency ought not to have any aid, direct or incidental, by legislative provisions. While it rests upon mutual arrangements among the banks themselves, they will keep the issues of each other within proper bounds. But when they are able to extend their credit by any legal provisions, in favor of their notes, the temptation is constantly presented to avail themselves of this advantage; and over issues and over trading are the necessary consequences.

If, however a different policy should be deemed advisable, the advantages now given by law to the bank of the United States might easily be extended to the notes of the depository banks, and if their notes were made receivable in payment of all debts to the government, their currency and general credit would be quite equal to that now enjoyed by the bank of the United States. Believing however, that such a provision would be calculated to increase the issues of paper, I cannot recommend it. The chief object of the plan I propose is to increase the proportion of the metallic currency without diminishing inconveniently the general mass of the circulating medium, and any provision tending to enlarge the proportion of paper beyond what the public convenience requires, should be studiously avoided.

The advantage of the proposed plan over the present currency, will not be confined to the superior stability, of the paper circulation.

The laboring classes of the community are now paid their daily, or weekly wages, in bank notes of the smaller denominations, and if there are any in circulation of doubtful value and depreciated in public estimation, they are too often used in payments to the poorer and more helpless classes of society. They are not always judges of the value or genuineness of the notes offered to them; and consequently, are often imposed upon, and their small earnings still more diminished, by the depreciated character or entire worthlessness of paper in which they are paid. If the alteration suggested should be adopted, the smaller notes would soon be banished from circulation every where, and the laborers would, therefore, be paid in gold and silver, and that portion of society which is most apt to suffer from worthless or depreciated paper, and who are least able to bear the loss, would be guarded from imposition and injustice. It is time that the just claims of this portion of society should be regarded in our legislation in relation to the currency. So far we have been providing facilities for those employed in extensive commerce, and have left the mechanic and the laborer to all the hazards of an insecure and unstable circulating medium.

It may be objected to this plan, that in giving to the executive department, the power of selecting these fiscal agents from among the state banks, an undue influence may be exercised over them, and the power be used for improper and corrupt purposes. The answer to it appears to be a plain one. The states in which these institutions are situated, can at all times control them, and would effectually interpose to prevent such abuses of power. Besides, with the diminished revenue which will hereafter be collected, on the reduced tariff of duties, it is impossible to imagine that the gains to be derived from the public deposits, when distributed, as they must be, among so many banks, and among so many stockholders in each bank, can ever be sufficiently important to tempt them to swerve from their duty, or to influence, in any respect, their conduct or opinions.

But it is proper, no doubt, in all cases, to restrict political power within certain and defined limits, and it will be advisable, therefore, to regulate the selection in such a manner, as to remove all apprehensions of its abuse. The following are respectfully suggested for consideration:

If the danger of abuse is considered by congress as one of any magnitude, and as likely to produce improper influence, it may be effectually removed by making it the duty of the secretary of the treasury to divide the deposits among all the incorporated specie-paying banks of the place where the revenue is collected, in proportion to their respective capitals actually paid in, provided they are all willing to receive them upon the terms prescribed by law; and if they are not all willing, then among so many as would agree to take them.

Every danger of abuse in the selection will, by this mode, be taken away; and the safety of the money could be secured, by authorizing the secretary of the treasury to demand security from any of these banks, when, in his judgment, the public interest required it; and there might also be a prohibition against removing the money to any place, except where it was immediately necessary for the purpose of disbursement.

This mode would somewhat complicate the operations of the department. Yet I do not perceive that it would produce any serious inconvenience to the public service. It might, and probably would make it necessary to employ one or two more clerks in the department. But that would be but a small consideration, if it be deemed advisable to take from the executive all discretion over the subject.

If, however, congress should agree with me in supposing that the danger apprehended from this discretion is more imaginary than real, I would then respectfully propose the following regulations:

1. That the secretary of the treasury should annually, at the beginning of each session, report to congress the bank which had been used by him during the year, as the depositories of the public money.

2. That the banks once selected as the depositories of the public money, should be continued as such; unless in the judgment of the secretary of the treasury, the public interest required the depository to be changed; in which case he should report to congress, at its next session, the reason of the change.

3. That, in all cases where there were two or more banks at the same place where the revenue is to be deposited, at least two should be employed as the depositories of the money of the United States, if they are willing to receive it, and give the security that may be required.

4. Where there shall be no banks at the places where the revenue is received, the money shall be deposited in such places as the secretary shall direct, subject to the same obligation to report to congress.

5. No bank to be selected as a depository of the public money, or continued as such, which shall deal in any stocks, except those of the state in which it is situated, or of the United States.

6. After the third of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, no bank to be used as the depository of the public money, which shall issue or pay out notes below five dollars, and the notes of no bank to be received in payment of debts due to the United States, which shall issue or pay out notes of a less denomination than that above mentioned, after the time aforesaid, nor shall any bank be a depository of public money which does not pay specie on demand for its notes.

7. Each bank selected for the deposit of the public money shall return a statement of its affairs to the secretary of the treasury, once a month, or oftener, if required. Such statement shall show the aggregate amount loaned to its own officers and directors and also the amount loaned on its own stock.

With these limitations it is believed that the public money will be safe—and that even the possibility of abuse will be taken away.

In submitting this view of the currency and the plan of improving it, I have endeavored to provide against the danger of a too sudden contraction of the present circulating medium. I am not prepared to say that the amount in circulation is at this moment greater, or even so great, as the convenience of the country requires. I think it is not. For it has been rapidly and injuriously diminished—and it is to be regretted that the pains taken to destroy confidence in the great mass of the circulating medium, has so far succeeded as to bring upon the community, the inconvenience and suffering which a rapid reduction of the circulating medium unavoidably occasions. The great object now in view is to terminate forever the evil of the present system, and to place the currency on a foundation so stable that it cannot again be shaken.

If a broad and sure foundation of gold and silver is provided for our system of paper credits, we need not hereafter apprehend those alternate seasons of abundance and scarcity of money suddenly succeeding each other, which has so far marked our history, and irreparably injured so many of our citizens.

These remarks are respectfully submitted for the consideration of the committee.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

R. B. TANEY, secretary of the treasury.
Hon. James K. Polk, chairman of the committee of ways and means, house of representatives.

SUPPLEMENTAL TO REGISTER, MAY 3.

DEBATE IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

Monday, April 21, 1834.

The explanatory message of the president of the United States having been read, and a motion having been made by Mr. Poindester, in accordance with his motion in reference to the original message, that it be not received—

Mr. Preston took occasion to say that he was delighted at the message which the president of the United States had done the senate the honor to send in to-day. He was extremely gratified also at the message which had now been submitted, not only because it put a gloss on the principles contained in the first paper, and thus betrays the apprehension of the president, that, in their original and naked form the whole country, every man in the country, would revolt against them. And he was also delighted, because it proved that the ear of the president has not been entirely closed against the debate in senate, and that these debates had been successful in compelling him to change the expression of his views. He believed that, before the termination of the session, there would be many such explanations; that every day would be productive of them; until finally, the text would be absolutely overwhelmed by the commentaries.

Mr. Forsyth did not understand very well what progress was to be made in this business. The honorable senator from Mississippi proposed that his condemnatory resolutions should be placed upon the journals of the senate, and that the message should not. He (Mr. Forsyth) should imagine it must be decided, in the first instance, whether the document would be received. He submitted to the gentleman whether it was not due to the character of the senate and that of the chief magistrate, that the paper, as well as the resolutions condemning it, should be placed on the records. With respect to the explanatory message to which reference had been made, he was somewhat glad that it had been sent to them this morning, not because it altered, in the slightest degree, in his opinion, the correctness of the opinions contained in the message of the president, but because it prevented a construction being given to his language different from that which he intended. He (Mr. F.) understood the original message to assert only a very simple proposition—that it was not possible for the legislature of the United States to create another executive power. The gentleman from South Carolina was mistaken in regard to the object of the supplementary message; it was not sent to correct an error, but for the purpose of giving a more full explanation of a previously expressed opinion, to prevent an erroneous impression from being entertained. He (Mr. F.) hoped the honorable senator from Mississippi, with his usual candor, would withdraw his motion to print the resolutions, and let the senate decide first whether it would not receive the message. It would be manifestly unjust to refuse to put the paper on the records while the resolutions were placed there. It would be wrong to make any such distinction. What would posterity think of the act? recording a strong condemnation of a chief magistrate without doing him the justice to preserve his defence. Would they think it just or unjust? Surely, surely, senators would not act so unfairly. Independent of all other considerations, such as the high position he occupied in the confidence of the people, it would be most unjust to him as a simple individual.

Mr. Ewing said, the gentleman from Georgia was mistaken, if he supposed the resolutions of the senator from Mississippi were moved at all. They were merely laid on the table, to be taken up hereafter, when gentlemen would have an opportunity of presenting their views on the subject to which they related. He would make an observation or two, with respect to what fell from the honorable senator from Georgia. That gentleman had said, that it would be extremely unjust in the senate to put upon its journals the resolutions condemnatory of the protest, without that paper. Now, the honorable senator could not have attended to the protest, or he would have discovered that the president says he has entered it on the executive journal, as condemnatory of the resolution of the senate. The senate had not requested him to do it, and took it for granted it was not done. He had, no doubt, consulted his own convenience by placing it there, as it would serve as a reference. But, as for putting his protest on the journals of the senate, he (Mr. E.) could not consent, because it strongly reflected on their own resolution.

Mr. Poindester said, he took the same view of the subject as the honorable senator from Ohio; that, although the protest should not be recorded on their journals, it was entered on the executive journal. It was a part of the archives of the state department, and the resolutions he had offered to the senate, would be nothing more than an explanation to posterity, showing the grounds upon which it refused to receive the paper. This was all. It was an extra-official document, and such a one as could not be made to either house of congress, and therefore ought not to be received. He had shaped his resolutions so as to speak in general terms of the paper, in order that hereafter it might be adverted to without difficulty. He would not, at present, go into any discussion on the subject, but would merely move that the last message be laid on the table.

Mr. P. then offered his resolutions, and moved that they be printed.

Mr. King wished to know whether the resolutions presented by the senator from Mississippi were offered for consideration, or merely informally? If they are laid on the table, they must be before the senate.

Mr. Calhoun said, the motion to print a paper, proposed to be offered for adoption, was one of those motions which were frequently made in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. Forsyth said, he might be mistaken, but it had occurred to him that the motion of the honorable senator from Mississippi, to print the resolutions, which were hereafter to be presented to the senate, must go on the journals. He (Mr. F.) took it for granted that the message, as well as the resolutions, would be put upon the journals of the senate. With respect to what had been said by the gentleman from Ohio, he was entirely mistaken. The president had done justice to the senate, whose resolutions were spread in broad characters on the protest. So that posterity would be able to see all the transaction.

Mr. Clayton said that was the first time he had ever heard of the executive journals of the president, in which he might enter and record his manifestoes, or the resolutions either in this or the other house of congress. But with this, he (Mr. C.) had, at present, nothing to do. He rose for the purpose merely of expressing his surprise at the sentiment advanced by the gentleman from Georgia, that the paper sent to the senate this morning retracted nothing of what was stated in the original protest. The principle argument of the first protest stood on this ground—that the executive was entitled, by the constitution, to the care of the public money, in defiance of any act of Congress. The honorable senator from Virginia, and other gentlemen who spoke on Thursday and Friday last, contended that, if that was constitutional law, the necessary inference to be drawn from it was, that should both houses of congress order a restoration of the deposits by a constitutional majority of two-thirds, still, the president having the custody of the money, had the power to retain it. He (Mr. C.) understood what was the object of sending to the senate this supplementary message. The president, having found out that such sentiments as are contained in his first communication, relative to this topic, would not be very palatable to the people, had attempted to explain away, at least, a part of his assumption, which was to his (Mr. C.'s) mind, the most exceptional feature in the document, and one which, if acquiesced in by the American people, would at once reduce this government to a despotism. It was a doctrine, the principles of which, if admitted now, would give the uncontrollable right to the present president, as well as all future presidents, over the public purse, in addition to the sword of the nation. It would tax even the ingenuity of the honorable gentleman from Georgia himself, were he to take the sentences contained in the first protest, and read them in parallel columns with sentences in the message which had been sent to the senate that morning, to take a plausible explanation of the one, consistently with the doctrines contained in the other. The honorable senator from Georgia had designated it a mere "explanation," and he (Mr. C.) should not quarrel with any one about the term. He considered this paper as retracting; withdrawing much of what had been boldly claimed in the other; and he heartily concurred with the gentleman from South Carolina, that it was to the stand taken in that senate they were indebted for a restoration of even so much of the constitution and laws.

Yes, sir, this paper was received in such a spirit as had satisfied the executive that the doctrines which it contained would not be sustained by the free people of this country. What course the senate would take with regard to the protest, in which there was still left so many objectionable features, he knew not. The president still denied the constitutional right of the senate to consider his prerogative, or executive power, and to debate upon it, much more to express an opinion by a vote with respect to its extent. That was a principle which the president must fully and clearly retract, before he (Mr. C.) should become satisfied with the document. His next message must contain an acknowledgment of the right of the senate to express its opinion, by resolutions or otherwise, as to it may seem best, defining the limits of his power for its own government, before such a document would become palatable to him, (Mr. C.), and meet with his concurrence for its reception; and as a doubt, in the opinion of many, is still left as to his entire meaning in this supplemental message, his next must, without any equivocation, distinctly renounce all claim to the uncontrolled power over the public purse, before it can be adapted to the taste of the freemen of this country.

Mr. Webster rose. He said he had arrived in the city and resumed his seat since the debate began, and he rose to say that he thought the transmission of this protest to be one of the most important and ominous occurrences of these extraordinary times. It is, said Mr. W. a communication of so anomalous a character, in the first place, that it perplexed the discrimination of the senate to know what preliminary disposition to make of it. Some are for receiving it, others are against receiving it, although it has been read, and its contents commented on. It seems to hang, at present, in a pendulous condition, between reception and rejection. It has no resting place. It is like the coffin of Mahomet, suspended between heaven and earth, as unfit to go higher, and finding no proper abiding place below. But I am unwilling that the discussion of this great and grave topic should be embarrassed by questions of form. I am obliged to the member from Mississippi for the strong grasp which he laid on the principles of this paper, at its first appearance, but as to the form of proceeding with it, I confess I should have preferred to have passed over the question of reception, and gone at once into the substantial character of the protest itself. It is too interesting, and will prove so—too exciting, and will prove so, to go from the senate, till it shall have received such discussion and such reply as it is entitled to.

It is said that the paper is indecorous, and justly offensive to the self-respect of the senate; but there is much more in it than indecorum, or want of respect to the senate; and I think we shall best consult the character of this body, and better fulfil the expectation of the country, by going at once to the dangerous assertions of power which the paper sets up, and fully exposing those claims of power to the people.

The president denies that this house, or indeed either house of congress has any right to express any opinion upon his conduct, except by way of impeachment. This is, indeed, new and startling. That in a popular representative government, the representatives of the people may not express their opinions upon measures of the executive power, is a doctrine, I believe, now, for the very first time put forth. Who has ever heard of it before? Though this right is denied to either house, the president's reasons are urged mainly against the right of the senate, and the chief reason is, that the senate are judges in case of impeachment, and that, therefore, until impeachment come, it should be silent. But this objection, it is obvious, would stop the mouth of the senate, with respect to every other officer of the government, as well as the president, because all officers are equally impeachable, and the senate must try all impeachments.

I know not, sir, who drew this protest; but whoever he was, instead of looking for sound constitutional principles in the history of free governments, in the practice of legislatures in the United States, or elsewhere, he has contented himself with an ancient truism from the black letter law books, that the house of lords cannot institute an impeachment, or frame articles, and then try it themselves. But do not the lords, as well as the commons, express their opinions, by votes and resolutions; of the conduct of ministers of the crown? Yet they have the power, and the sole power of trying impeachments. The senate has an undoubted right, in my opinion, to express its opinions on the public conduct of executive officers. The contingency, that it may be called on to try an impeachment, is no bar to the exercise of this right. Doubtless there may be cases in which the propriety of its exercise might be much influenced by the consideration that the senate held the power of judging on impeachment. But this is matter of discretion. In every case, the senate must proceed upon its own sense of propriety and justice. There may be, sometimes, good reason to refrain from expressing opinions, and sometimes there may be the highest propriety in expressing such opinions in the strongest manner. The right of doing so is clear, and is not to be disputed. The possession of judicial power does not abridge the legislative power of the senate. It does not take away any of its rights as a representative body.

Sir, the president of the United States has been misled. He is uninformed, or misinformed, as to the real state of opinion in the country. I fear there are those who share his confidence, and who present to his view only one side of things. The state of the country is alarming. Members of the senate, who have not been out of this city for five months, are not aware of the depth and strength of the public feeling. I should like to know what advisers have recommended to the president to send us this protest. Its circulation through the country will add fuel to feelings already sufficiently kindled. The president has around him the heads of departments. Can any body tell us whether any of those heads, and if any, which of them, advised to send this paper to the senate? Or which of them, if any, sat by, neither assenting or dissenting, afraid to speak their minds, or unwilling to hazard their places?

Sir, it is not without some color of reason, that the president, in this paper, speaks of the heads of departments as his secretaries. One half of them have never been confirmed by the senate. Three of them, usually called members of the cabinet, being one half of the whole, were appointed last year, in the recess of congress, and now, when we are near the end of the fifth month of the session, their appointments have not been sent to the senate for confirmation. This is a thing before altogether unheard of. I hesitate not to say that this course is derogatory to the rights of the senate, and inconsistent with the intent and spirit of the constitution. It is altogether without precedent. Other presidents have felt it their duty, when they have made appointments in the recess, to send them to the senate immediately upon its assembling. Usually such nominations come to us the first ten or twelve days of the session. It has rarely happened that they have been delayed as long as a month. But near five months have now elapsed, and yet these nominations are not sent to us. When they do come, I hope we shall know who has approved the sending of this protest. I hope we shall learn who has made himself partaker in it by positive sanction, or silent acquiescence.

Sir, I will not now discuss the assertions, the pretensions, the dangers, of this protest. Others are in possession of the debate. I do not see that the case is altered by this codicil. The whole measure is of an alarming character. It attempts one great stride towards the accumulation of all power in executive hands; a stride which I doubt not the senate will resist with firmness and constancy; and in that resistance they will be supported by the country.

Mr. Forsyth said, it was very unimportant to him whether the last message was considered an explanation or a retraction. If the honorable gentleman from Delaware entertained such impressions as he had just stated, it was very easy to be accounted for. He had probably read the message with a desire to see that the president had committed an error, and, in consequence, might have formed an unfavorable judgment of it. Now, with regard to what had been said by the honorable senator from Massachusetts, he begged leave to say a word or two. That senator had reiterated a complaint, which he had heretofore made, in regard to the withholding by the president of certain nominations of high officers of the government. He was mistaken in point of fact. There was not one-half of the cabinet whose nominations had not been sent to the senate.

[Mr. Webster said there were three—the secretary of state, the attorney general, and the secretary of the treasury.]

Mr. F. resumed. The principle was the same, whether it was a portion only or the whole of the cabinet. The honorable senator had told the senate that those officers were in the discharge of important duties, in violation of the principles of the constitution, and in derogation of the rights of the senate. He would ask the honorable gentleman if he had recently read the constitution?

[Mr. Webster. Yes, sir.]

Mr. F. continued. Then he would beg to call his attention to a particular part of it, which declared that persons commissioned by the president should hold to the termination of the next session of congress. And this was an answer to the charge of a violation of the constitution having been committed. They were the officers of the United States, as much as if they had been confirmed by the senate, and would remain so to the termination of the session. It was true there would have been some difference in their position, at this time, if their nominations had been presented to the senate and they had been condemned by it. And upon this was based the complaint. Honorable senators desired that the nominations might be made, in order that they might sit in judgment on them. He had reason to believe that that was the fact, from the suggestion which had been made by the honorable senator to-day, that some plausible reason was always sought for, so that the presentation of the nominations might be postponed. The gentleman had expressed a wish to know which of the persons who would have to come under the adjudication of the senate had acquiesced in the message. Perhaps (said Mr. F.) there might be an occasion, before the end of the session, to enlighten his judgment, and then he would know exactly how he should decide on another matter. He (Mr. F.) would contend that they were officers, acting according to the constitution, and that the president had not derogated from his duty, and he dare not do otherwise, to present the nominations in question before the adjournment of congress.

With respect to this anomalous proceeding, it was unprecedented—the first instance in the history of the government, in which the executive had been arraigned before the people by the extra-judicial conduct of the senate. Did the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts think it a trifling matter that the president should have been charged with violating his duty and forgetting the solemn obligations of his oath? And to whom was the president to address himself but to those from whom the charge had emanated? The senate had arraigned him; and the honorable senator particularly and others, had said that the remedy for all this lay with the people. He (Mr. F.) would admit that it was for them to decide whether or not he was correct; and, if he was found guilty to punish him for violating the constitution and the laws.

But, he would ask, if it was not the right of a party, after being condemned without a hearing, to be heard thereafter? The question now before the people was placed there by the senate. The president then had, at least a right to be heard by the people—no one would pretend to deny it—and they would decide on his conduct, and either sustain or condemn him. How could the executive defend himself, without presenting to the senate a statement of his case? If he had thought of committing a fraud, he might have interwoven that message with a legislative proposition, which the senate would have been compelled to have received, and could not have resisted; but he had done no such thing. He had presented a fair statement of his case, and asked only that it might be preserved, in order that his views might be seen by posterity and the world. And he had come to the senate, not as a chief magistrate demanding that his views might be preserved on the record of the country; but with a request that they might be preserved on the journal of the senate with the resolutions condemning him—that no inference contrary to the executive power hereafter might be drawn, and for the purpose of having justice done to his opinions as an officer and a man.

He (Mr. F.) entirely concurred with the honorable senator from Massachusetts—that the country expected and would demand, at the hands of the senate, that this matter should be solemnly considered and decided; that the question which it had raised should be treated as it deserved, neither forgetting what was due to the dignity of this body, nor to the high station and dignity of our chief magistrate. There were most important and grave considerations connected with this matter. Be they true or false, they must be treated with that respect, moderation and forbearance, which became the dignity of the senate, or that body would be lost in the opinion of the American people. Let the conduct of the president be fairly examined, and no incorrect inferences be drawn. Yes, that was the way, and the only way in which he ought to be treated. His (Mr. F.'s) opinions on the whole matter were perfectly well understood. He considered the charge which had been made against the president as uncalled for, unnecessary, and improper; but he trusted that the senate, in its future conduct, would not forget what was due to itself, and to the dignity of our chief magistrate, so that justice might be done him. He (Mr. F.) was of opinion that the senate had travelled beyond the bounds of propriety, and deserved—what he believed would, in due time, be meted to them—a sentence of condemnation by the people.

Mr. Webster replied. The gentleman from Georgia, said he, has referred to the decision of that high tribunal, by whose decision all public men, and all public bodies, must ultimately stand or fall. I cheerfully join in the appeal, and have no fear of the result. It can never be, that the people of the United States will, for no earthly reason, submit to severe suffering and to encroachments on constitutional liberty; and, I doubt not, the same people will stand by the senate in all its just and constitutional efforts to sustain its own rights and the rights of congress. I believe the senate stands strong in the confidence of a majority of the nation, and that nothing would more produce dismay and despair than that this body should be found to flinch or falter in a moderate, but firm and decided, opposition to the present course of public measures.

The gentleman supposes I am mistaken as to the number of members of the cabinet not yet nominated to the senate. But there is no mistake. The secretary of state, the secretary of the treasury, and the attorney general, have been in office six or seven months, and have neither of them been yet sent to the senate for confirmation. What reason is to be given for this departure from all former practice of the government? How is it to be justified? We may conjecture a reason, indeed, but it is such a reason as ought not to exist. I know well that these officers hold commissions which run to the end of the session. Such is the constitutional provision. But I know, too, that although that be so, all other presidents have laid such appointments before the senate early after the commencement of the session. This has been the uniform course; and to hold so many of the heads of departments, for so many months from the beginning of the session, is a thing altogether without precedent.

As to the protest, sir, it appears to me, that the honorable member from Georgia has conceded it away. He admits that there may arise emergencies in which the senate has a right to express its opinion upon executive proceedings; to make a case, as he expresses it, for the consideration of the people. If this be so, then the senate itself is to be the only judge, when that emergency has arisen. The gentleman's admission acknowledges the right. The exercise of the right then, on any given occasion, is matter of discretion; and this is precisely the ground on which I placed the question when last speaking. Indeed, it cannot be otherwise. Suppose the president should commission persons to office, whom the senate has rejected; might we not resolve, that such a proceeding was unconstitutional? Suppose he should threaten to turn us out of our seats, by force; might we not enter on our journal a resolution against such menace? No one, surely can doubt this. The senate, then possesses the right; on a recent occasion it saw fit to exercise that right, in its discretion, and under its own sense of duty; and it is a right which its members are bound to maintain, in behalf of themselves, and for their successors in all time to come. I say nothing, at present, upon the claims of executive power put forth in the protest. All I mean now, is, to assert the right of the senate to express its opinion upon the conduct of the executive, in critical emergencies, and on momentous occasions, notwithstanding no impeachment be pending before it.

Mr. Clayton said, the senator from Georgia had observed, that perhaps he (Mr. C.) had been influenced by a desire to find the president in error when perusing his protest. Those who shall read the remarks of the member from Georgia himself, in reference to the same paper, and who are not acquainted with his independent and unyielding course of opposition to all executive encroachments, will rise from that reading with a deep conviction that the honorable member, before he knew the contents of the protest, was predetermined to support it, with every thing contained in it, right or wrong; and they will probably not consider the honorable member a proper judge of the motives with which other persons have perused the same document.

Sir, this protest, which meets the cordial approbation of the senator from Georgia, strikes at the constitutional rights, and even at the very existence, of the body of which he is a member. While the president complains of the length of the senatorial term of service, he distinctly declares, that the conduct of the senate, in daring to censure his acts, if persevered in, must inevitably lead to changes in the constitution itself. He singles out individual senators as the objects and victims of his displeasure; almost denies to them the privilege of suffrage here, in relation to his conduct; and denounces the senate for daring to debate and decide upon his princely pretensions to prerogative—his unlimited and illimitable claims to executive power. Because we have, with a view to regulate our own legislative and executive action, ventured to lay down a principle, by a resolution, defining and circumscribing the limits of his power, we are not only menaced by him, but even lectured by a member of the body itself. To what period of history shall we look for a parallel to these things, which are daily passing before our eyes?

Sir, it was in the year 1591, (was it not?) that the judges solemnly decreed that England was an absolute empire, of which the king was the head. In that age, the royal claims of prerogative gave birth to a debate in parliament, in which Mr. Spicer, (a member of the kitchen cabinet of the time, I suppose), said, the crown "could not be tied by any law, because it might loose itself at pleasure." And Mr. Secretary Cecil told the other members—"If you stand upon law, and dispute of the prerogative, hark ye what Bracton says—prærogativam nostram nemo AUDEAT disputare." Mr. Francis Bacon, a whole hog man, sir, said—"As to the prerogatives royal, he never questioned them, and he hoped they would never be discussed." When the question of subsidy was before them, Mr. Sergeant Heyle said—"Mr. Speaker, I marvel much that the house should stand upon granting of a subsidy, or the time of payment, when all we have is the crown's, and may be lawfully taken at its pleasure from us. Yea, it hath as much right to all our lands and goods, as to any revenue of the crown." At which says the historian, all the house hemmed, and laughed, and talked. "Well, quoth sergeant Heyle, all your hemming shall not put me out of countenance." [We have some in this day, said Mr. C. who are as hard to be put out of countenance.] "So the sergeant proceeded, and when he had spoken a little while, the house hemmed again, and so he sat down. In his latter speech, he said he could prove his former position by precedents, in the time of Henry III, king John, king Stephen, &c. which was the occasion of their hemming." Had sergeant Heyle lived in our day, there is no telling to what a pitch of greatness he might not have attained. It can hardly be too much to say that he might have been a secretary of the treasury, or at least a postmaster general, with a promise of the Russian mission in reversion.

Observe, sir, that, in the debate to which I have referred you, the advocates of power did, as they do still, seek to support it chiefly by precedent and usage. The president builds his pretended prerogative to absolute control over the secretary of the treasury, in the matter of managing the public revenue and keeping the public deposits, on "the usages and precedents of the government." The precedent on which he and his advocates here rely, was established, not so far back as that of sergeant Heyle—not in the days of king John or king Stephen—but in the day when the elder Adams gave his casting vote in the senate in favor of the removing power, and laid the foundation for the present claim in the most latitudinarian of all constitutional construction that was ever attempted. The power of removal was based exclusively on the pretence that it was necessary for the president to have it, as an incident to his duty to "see that the laws are faithfully executed." But until this day, it was never dreamed, by the most visionary of the high tory school, that the power to remove embraced the power to control the officer in every act he was to perform. This president is entitled to the fame of discovering, that, as his oath of office binds him to see the laws faithfully executed, he is to exercise the power of controlling the secretary of the treasury, and every other officer, in the discharge of duties. The monstrous character of this pretension has been thus illustrated: The president thinks that a decree of a district court, or a circuit court, or the supreme court of the United States, is unconstitutional. He fulminates a bull against the court, and demands of it to enter his protest on its records "to the end that it may never be drawn into precedent again," as in the case of our resolution. He then orders the marshal not to execute the writ issued by virtue of the decree. The marshal persists in the discharge of his duty, and says he is sworn to execute the writ. The president replies, you are an executive officer, and as I must "see that the laws are faithfully executed," and as the constitution, which has been violated by the court, is the supreme law, I command you not to execute the writ. The marshal still persists, and the president removes him—appoints another, and removes him, and pursues the same process until he finds a tool to obey his will, and thus abrogates the decree of the court. He is to exercise the same power over every other executive officer appointed by him alone, or by the president and senate. This is the claim he sets up in this protest—this is the exact character of that ultra despotic rescript which he thinks this senate is bound to register at his sovereign, will and pleasure. In every state constitution, the same provision, on which the president erects his pretensions to those powers, will be found. They all provide that "the governor shall see that the laws be faithfully executed." If, in one of the states, the governor should order the public money to be removed by the state treasurer, it would be acknowledged usurpation. Should he actually remove him from office for it, he would hardly escape impeachment himself. Yet, under color of this single clause in the constitution of the United States, that, "the president shall see that the laws are faithfully executed," the chief magistrate has claimed the power not only to remove every agent whom congress has placed in custody of the money of the nation, but also to remove the money itself, when and where he pleases.

Sir, such a paper as this, claiming absolute power, and denying to the representatives of the people of England, or either house of parliament, the right to discuss and decide upon the extent of kingly power for the government of their legislative action, would bring the head of a British monarch to the block. It remains to be seen whether the milder temperament of the people of our free country will stamp it with the authoritative sanction of their verdict against this senate at the polls. For one, I will stand or fall on this issue before the people of that state, to which—and not to Andrew Jackson—I owe allegiance. By their judgment, unawed as they have ever been, and ever will be, by official patronage and executive power, will I be tried, and by no other. They shall say for me whether this paper, couched in the language of a Roman dictator to the senate, proposing only to "expose" it and degrade it, by compelling it to enter on its own records such claims of absolute power as it contains, is, or is not, a breach of the privileges of that body on whose preservation their rights, and those of all other small states of this union, eminently depend. If this house were now to send to the representatives a bulletin such as this, lecturing them for the passage of their resolutions approbatory of the act of the executive in continuing the pet state banks as banks of deposit, they would instantly vote such an interference a breach of their privileges. Seeing this, the people to whom alone I defer on this subject, shall try for me, in the last resort, the co-ordinate powers and privileges of the two branches of congress. But until their verdict be given on this issue, no judgment will be entered or recorded against the senate by the votes of their representatives.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business.

BALTIMORE MEETING.

Held 23d April, 1834.

Having briefly noticed this great meeting of the people, we did not expect to recur to it again—but seeing that meetings for similar purposes are about to be held at other places and may become general, and that the matter of the protest of the president will probably become a leading subject of public discussion, we have thought it “due to the record,” that an account of the first meeting held to protest against the protest should be registered for future reference and use.

From the Baltimore Chronicle of April 24.

ORATORICAL MEETING OF THE PEOPLE.

At an early hour yesterday afternoon, in pursuance of the previous call, the citizens thronged Monument Square, the contiguous streets, and the area in the east front of the court house. The meeting was organized by the appointment of General WILLIAM McDONALD, president.

Vice presidents.

Luke Tiernan,	Solomon Etting,
Charles F. Mayer,	J. K. Stapleton,
John B. Morris,	Nathaniel F. Williams,
Jacob Rogers,	B. I. Cohen,
Samuel Mass,	Wm. Hulbard,
Wm. Lorman,	John McKim, jr.
Robert Purviance,	George Waters,
Wm. Crawford, jr.	John Fallon.
Darius Stansbury,

Secretaries,

David Stewart,	Peter Leary,
S. D. Walker,	E. Larrabee,
W. H. Gatchell,	Z. H. Coohc.
A. Kirkland,

After which the meeting was addressed in a most impressive and eloquent manner by John P. Kennedy, esq. who concluded by proposing the following resolutions, which were seconded by Charles Carroll Harper, esq. in a speech which elicited the most cheering applause from the immense multitude.

Resolved, That this meeting consider the protest transmitted to the senate by the president on the 17th inst. and published on the 18th in the official paper at Washington, as an appeal by the chief magistrate to the people against the proceedings of the senate in reference to the resolution passed by that body on the 28th of March last; and as the said protest professes to set forth the views entertained by the president as to his powers under the constitution, this meeting deem it their right and duty to express freely their opinion on the subject matter of the appeal.

That they do, therefore, upon mature reflection, uninfluenced by sentiments of political hostility to the president, but deeply impressed with a sense of the value of their free institutions, and jealously alive to every form of encroachment upon the true principles of the constitution, whether the same proceed from mistaken views of power, or from ambitious motives, most earnestly and heartily dissent from the doctrines promulgated in the said protest.

1. That they do utterly repudiate the doctrine that the resolution complained of by the president “is wholly unauthorised by the constitution and in derogation of its entire spirit.” But, on the contrary, they hold that it is of the very essence of our free government, that either branch of the national legislature shall carefully note and clearly announce in the form of joint or separate resolution, any act, by any public functionary which, in their opinion, may be an invasion of the constitution; and that “the official acts of the executive may be taken up, considered and decided upon, by either branch of the legislative department, for the purpose of public censure, without any view to legislation or impeachment!”

2. That they do entirely reject the doctrine promulgated in the protest that because, in a possible contingency of rare occurrence, the senate may be resolved into a judicial body to try impeachments, it is thereby debarred the right of announcing to the people an act of malversation, constitutional encroachment, usurpation or corrupt design, coming within its knowledge, of any officer of the government, although it may have, at the same time, every reason to believe that a majority of the house of representatives will not prefer an impeachment. It being the opinion of this meeting that, precisely in such a case, does it become the most solemn duty of the senate as guardians of the constitution to proclaim their opinion upon such official misconduct.

3. That this meeting heartily deprecate, as an unauthorised assumption, the doctrine that “the whole executive power is vested in the president”—that “he is responsible for its exercise”—and that “it is a necessary consequence that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties, and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts.” For although this meeting do not deny that he has the power of free selection in his appointments to office, and, by settled usage under the constitution, the power of removal, yet they do most strenuously reject the notion that the public officers are his agents, subject to his control or supervision, or, in any manner, responsible to him for the faithful performance of their duties: This meeting hold that, like himself, these are the officers of the law, responsible to the law, and subject to no man’s dictation in the conscientious performance of the duties assigned to them by the law: That neither the power of appointment nor of removal infers the right of control, asserted by the president, over the conduct of the officer while faithfully performing the duty required of him by the law. And although the members of the cabinet, being in matters of policy, the privy councillors or confidential advisers of the president, may, in such character, be properly subject to frequent removal from office—yet, in all matters where special duties are assigned to them by law, they are as independent of the president as any other functionaries of the government; and it is a plain infraction of the spirit of the constitution, for the president to use his power of removal in order to subvert them to his will, in a matter confided by law to their independent official judgment and discretion.

4. That this meeting unhesitatingly repel the inference which the president draws from his constitutional obligation, “to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.” They hold, that this obligation does not make him “responsible for the entire action of the executive department”—nor does it give him the power of overseeing and controlling those who execute the laws: The extent of his obligation being, in the judgment of this meeting, to see that every officer faithfully performs the duty required of him by law, according to the dictates of his own conscience and honest judgment; and every officer so performing his duty, is entirely independent of the president, or any other authority in this land. He is then amenable to the law, and the law alone.

5. That this meeting utterly reject, as dangerous dogmas, the president’s assertion that “whenever or howsoever the public money be obtained, its custody always has been, and always must be, unless the constitution be changed, intrusted to the executive department;” that “no officer can be created by congress for the purpose of taking charge of it, whose appointment would not, by the constitution, at once devolve on the president, and who would not be responsible to him for the faithful performance of his duties.” And, that “congress cannot, therefore, take out of the hands of the executive department the custody of the public property or money, without an assumption of executive power, and a subversion of the first principles of the constitution.”

In opposition to these pretensions, this meeting affirm, as their opinion, that it is entirely competent for congress to place the public treasure in such depositories, and in the custody of such functionaries, as they may choose to create, whether they consist of a bank—or of commissioners named and appointed by an act of congress—or of an individual empowered by law to keep the public funds—in such manner, and on such terms as they shall prescribe; and that the public treasure shall be so kept, free from all possible control, supervision or direction of the president. They hold, further, that congress may, in like manner, confide the keeping of the public treasure to any already existing officer of the government, prescribing the terms and manner of his custody, in such wise as shall leave him entirely free of any control or dictation of the president, in the discharge of the duty assigned to him.

6. That this meeting distinctly reprobate the reference of the president to the votes of individual senators who, he more than insinuates, were bound to have voted against the resolution of the senate, because, as he affirms, they had received instructions from the legislatures of their states. Such an insinuation implies an unwarrantable interference between the senators and their constituents, and virtually asserts the principle, that whatever encroachments they had witnessed by the executive upon the constitution, they were bound to be silent, or to approve them, and were not at liberty even to take the responsibility of representing what they believed to be the sentiments and opinions of the mass of the people in their own states, in opposition to the sentiments and opinions of their legislatures.

For all these reasons this meeting solemnly, heartily and most pointedly disapprove and reject the pretensions to power and prerogative set up and claimed by the protest of the president.

Resolved, further, as the opinion of this meeting, “that the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both.”

Further resolved, That this meeting look with inexpressible distrust and jealousy upon the protest of the president, as an attempt to avail himself of his hitherto wide and unexampled personal popularity to denounce and bring into public odium the senate of the U. States, because that body has had the firmness and the patriotism to stand between him and the accomplishment of his will, and at the risk of popular rebuke, unjustly threatened against them by the president, to take a firm and decided position in defence of the constitution.

Resolved, That this meeting most cordially and gratefully sustain and applaud the senate for their gallant, patriotic and efficient resistance of the first assaults upon the free spirit of our institutions—and that we exhort them to persevere in the noble career before them, assuring them that they have the heart, the judgment and the moral force of the nation to vindicate and support them: that the great and glorious whig principles that worked out the revolution and gave political liberty and independence to this land, are again awake and will move forward with a steady and irresistible energy, until the constitution and its defenders are placed high above the reach of attack.

John F. L. McMahon, esq. then rose and supported the resolutions in a speech which the distinguished reputation he has so long enjoyed for the eloquence appropriate to the primary assertions of a free and intelligent people.

The resolutions were then put, and as announced by the venerable chairman, were carried by an overwhelming majority.

Joshua Jones, esq. (one of the late delegates to the general assembly), then expressed his sentiments in connection with the present important crisis, in a manner worthy of his constituents, and most honorable to himself.

He concluded by offering the following resolutions, which were seconded by Mr. McMahon, and adopted:

Resolved, That this meeting is of opinion that all of the citizens of Baltimore, and such of the citizens of Maryland, as can conveniently attend, who are opposed to the doctrines promulgated by the president of the United States, in his protest to the senate and appeal to the people, should assemble at an early day in this city, for the purpose of most maturely considering, and solemnly adopting such an answer or address, and resolutions as will make known to him and the world, their sentiments and unalterable determination, to redress by every lawful and necessary means, the usurpation and exercise of powers not delegated by the constitution and laws of our country—and the further purpose of forming a state whig society, in support of said constitution and laws—and to this end,

Be it further resolved, That a committee of sixty with power to increase their numbers, be appointed by the chair, with instructions and authority to prepare an answer to said protest, or appeal, and such resolutions as they may deem appropriate to be submitted to that meeting—to fix and give notice of the day and place for holding the same—to invite the attendance of distinguished whigs from all parts of the country, and especially of Maryland—to invite persons to deliver addresses on that occasion—to prepare fundamental rules for the government of a state whig society—and generally to make such arrangements for the accommodation and comfort of said meeting as they shall deem necessary or expedient.

[Here follow the names of the committee of sixty which it does not appear necessary for us to insert—and this committee being appointed, the meeting adjourned.]

LETTER FROM MR. CLAY.

Mr. Clay being invited to partake of a public dinner, at Norfolk, at such time as might best suit his convenience, declined the invitation in the following letter:

Washington, 28th March, 1834.

GENTLEMEN—I received the letter which, on the 5th inst. as a committee in behalf of the citizens of the borough of Norfolk you did me the honor to address to me, inviting me to a public dinner to be served up at such time as may be convenient to me. You have been pleased to accompany the invitation with many flattering and friendly sentiments towards me personally. I am, gentlemen, greatly obliged and deeply penetrated with gratitude, for the demonstrations of regard and attachment. Whilst I have never been indifferent to the opinion of my public conduct which any portion of our countrymen might form, I have been always particularly desirous so to acquit myself as to deserve the esteem of my native state, and that of the adopted residence. The assurances, therefore, contained in your letter, that an interest has always been felt in my public character by the people of Virginia, and particularly by that portion of them residing in Norfolk and its vicinity, afford me high satisfaction. On the two occasions to which you are pleased to refer, with approbation of the part I bore in them, the union itself was supposed to be exposed to danger; but I solemnly believe that neither civil liberty nor the union can long endure if the late usurpation of the executive of the United States over the public treasury, and the doctrines by which it is sustained, are sanctioned by the people.

The act of congress of 1789, establishing the treasury department, was framed upon the principle of providing four distinct, independent and responsible checks, (the secretary, comptroller, register and treasurer), whose concurrence was necessary before a single dollar could be drawn from the treasury. These officers were placed under the authority of the law, and in the discharge of their official duties were to be controlled by that authority only. It is now contended, in effect, that they are all bound to obey, not the law, according to their sense of its obligation, but the will of the president; and consequently he may command them, at his pleasure, whenever he thinks proper, to issue the last dollar from the public treasury. If this be true, it is clear that congress might as well at once have placed the treasury in the sole custody of the president with liberty to use it as he pleases. The supposed security of four independent officers is totally destroyed; and their responsibility by impeachment is virtually abolished. For they cannot be amenable to the law and subject to the will of the president both, if there be any incompatibility between his will and the law. It is further contended, that the treasury department is a branch of the executive government, under the charge and direction of the president. Heretofore, the whole money power of the government has been supposed to be under the immediate and exclusive charge of congress. By the constitution, congress is expressly invested with powers to lay and collect taxes and to appropriate by law the public revenue; and it is also expressly invested with authority to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect those powers. It was in virtue of these provisions of the constitution, that the treasury department was constructed, and that the secretary was brought into direct official intercourse with congress.

But the principle that the money power of government is in the hands of the legislature, is not confined to the federal government. Every state in the union proceeds upon the same principle. In nineteen states, the treasurer is appointed by the legislature, in four by elections of the people, and in the remaining state by the governor and council, themselves being chosen by their legislature. In all, the treasurer accounts directly to the legislature. In no one, is he under the control of the governor. These are the doctrines of America and of every really free country. For the first time, in the history of our government, they are now controverted, and others are advanced which tend to establish that union between the purse and the sword, with which the continuance of civil liberty is absolutely incompatible.

It remains to be seen whether they will be approved by the people. I am happy to find, gentlemen, that they obtain no support from you, and it would afford me very great pleasure to meet you on the festive occasion to which I am invited, and by a free interchange of sentiments with you, on public affairs, to acquire from you fresh strength and encouragement in the endeavor which is now making to sustain the constitution, the laws and the free institutions of our country. It is true, as suggested by you, that the restraints which existed some time ago, as to my accepting the compliment of a public dinner, no longer operate. And I feel too, that after a session of near four months duration, a relaxation of a few days could be beneficial to me. No where could I enjoy the pleasure of it, more than in your borough. But to the considerations arising out of my public duty in the senate, I have to add, that the delicate state of Mrs. Clay's health is such as to make me unwilling to leave her, for even a few days.

I regret, therefore, that I feel constrained to decline the honor which you have tendered to me. But I request you, and those for whom you act, to be assured that I shall ever cherish a grateful recollection of it. I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your friend and fellow citizen.

POLISH EXILES—AT NEW YORK.

From the New York American.

The Polish exiles, who have come hither in the Austrian frigates, not only without their own consent, as it is understood, but protesting solemnly against being forcibly torn from Europe and thrown destitute upon a land of whose language they are ignorant, and where they will be without any means of existence, are entitled to the sympathy of this community.

These unfortunate men—as we learn from the writer of the annexed letter, one of their countrymen—were gathered together from different parts of Austria—passed from brigade to brigade, down to Trieste, and there, being each furnished with a great coat, a pair of trousers, and one or two other necessities, sent on board the frigates—and thus were brought away forcibly from Europe. They are each to receive here a sum of about $22, there is one female, seven or eight officers, and the rest soldiers.

The first steps should be to provide these people with some clothing, and an asylum, so that they may not be obliged to prow about the streets, or be stripped of their little money by persons taking advantage of their ignorance of our language, &c. Then time might be taken for making ulterior arrangements.

Among these people are some who have been farmers; they may find employment, we presume, with our blacksmiths. The great mass, however, have only their stout arms to rely upon. Their ease, we are sure, will excite the sympathy of our citizens, to whom we commend the annexed appeal of Mr. Gerard.

To the editor of the New York American.

Sir—It is in the name of 240 Polish exiles, that I ask through your journal, the opportunity of making an appeal to your fellow citizens. Emboldened by the recollection of many kindnesses which Americans have lavished upon me, during the eighteen months that I have dwelt among them, I address myself to their hearts, in the full conviction that they will not be insensible to that compassion, which constitutes now the whole dependence of my ill fated countrymen. May they in their turn experience the blessed fruits of that benevolence which has so much contributed to ameliorate my condition. Especially, may they be permitted to draw from that source, which the charities of the ladies of New York so abundantly supplies. Soon, then, would the wretched state of destitution in which they now are, be changed for one less discouraging—and on our part, we Poles, will know how to acknowledge the aid that shall be extended to our misfortunes.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest consideration, your devoted servant, GERARD, ancient polish officer.
New York, 31st March, 1834.

On which the Austrian consul issued the following card:

As it appears from several articles published in the daily papers that the true nature of the transaction of the Polish passengers, in the frigates of his majesty the emperor of Austria, is not understood, the undersigned thinks that the following statements of facts will give every explanation on the subject. In the years of 1830 and 1831, during the last revolution in Poland, a number of those who had taken an active part in that revolution, took refuge on, or were driven into the Austrian territory, where the government not only received and granted them an asylum, but even generously maintained them. By far the greatest number of them expressing a wish to go to France, and others to avail themselves of the amnesty offered by his majesty the emperor of Russia, every facility was afforded them to execute these their purposes.

There remained, however, a number, who could not or would not return to their country, and could neither obtain passports for other countries of Europe, all of which were shut to them in consequence of sundry events well known. Under these circumstances his majesty the emperor of Austria offered them a free passage in national vessels to this country, which they accepted, and signed for that purpose their determination. On their landing here, after having paid the usual charges for passengers, the undersigned, by command of his imperial majesty paid each of them forty dollars, and all of them, on parting from the ships, manifested feelings of gratitude for the generous conduct of his majesty, and the good treatment on board of the two frigates.

It affords me great pleasure to hear testimony to their general good conduct, and having contributed all that I have been authorized to do by my government, it will afford me additional satisfaction to offer them all the advice in my power, and it is particularly gratifying to witness the generous feeling manifested by the inhabitants of this city, towards them, as I feel satisfied they are deserving of every friendly aid and assistance.

L. BARON LEDERER, consul general.

Austrian consulates, April 4, 1834.

The following reply has been made on behalf of the Polish exiles to the preceding statement.

It is but too well known in all Europe what reliance is to be placed upon the amnesties of monarchs in regard to the combatants for liberty; and particularly upon that of the Russian cabinet. In spite of repeated oaths, the regulators of the fate of nations, only do what their interest suggests. The amnesties of Modena, of Spain, of Naples, are but the first fruits which flow from the cornucopias of the paternal benevolence of the kings; and the petty rulers of the other hemisphere. The Polish patriots who have the weakness to trust to the emperor of Russia's forgetfulness of the past, are expiating their credulity in Siberia, in prisons, or in the regiments of the Muscovites.

We have in vain protested against our deportation, as contrary to the rights of nations; there remained to us no alternative but to return under the reign of the know, or to proceed to America. There were yet but two chances remaining: either to go the United States or to be conveyed to South America. After having endured a course of treatment a Li Meternich in the garrison of Bruan and Trieste, destitute of the means and of permission to proceed to France and England, we were constrained to make a virtue of necessity, and to become burdensome to the inhabitants of this free country. What could be more natural than what the Austrian consul has recently declared? He has resided so many years in this country as to forget the blessing of monarchical paternity; he is not acquainted with the frightful details of the last catastrophes in Europe; and he only does his duty in representing things according to the well calculated instructions of his court. Could he, with his hands on his heart, putting himself in our place, conscientiously say that he would have us follow any other course than that which has rendered us free from all persecution in this hospitable land, under the protection of that constitution which has been the guide of the Poles for half a century.

With respect to our treatment on board of the Austrian frigates, it was not of a nature to make a parade of it in the port of New York. We abstain both from praising and from blaming certain officers, for fear that the praise may turn to the injury of those who are worthy of it, and the blame to the profit of the inhuman. We are too deeply sensible of the solemnity of the holy alliance to be able to believe a single moment that the entire expenses of our deportation are not furnished at third hands from the proceeds of the confiscated estates of the most zealous patriots of our unhappy country. In behalf of the Poles. ADALBERT KONARZEWSKI.

Reed street, No. 34.

The Poles in Switzerland. The French papers contain some further particulars of the fate of the unfortunate Poles in Switzerland, which show their position to be truly deplorable. It appears that they are carted from one canton to the other without receiving admission or shelter in any. The canton of Vaud sent them to that of Berne, where they were not received. Friburg refused to let them pass through its territories, and throughout the federation the troops have been posted at the frontiers to repel these hapless and pestilent intruders. It appears that, in trying to remove them from the castle of Rolle, it had been found necessary to give orders to a body of gens d'armes to charge the 115 refugees in the mass with bayonet, but some humane persons interposed and saved them from this wholesale butchery. It is not known what is to become of them.

CAPE DE VERD ISLANDS.

A number of residents of the island of St. Jago, in their own name and in the name of all the inhabitants of the Cape de Verd Islands, have published a card of thanks to the generous citizens of the United States who contributed to their relief in the calamitous famine of 1832. We make a few extracts from it. The style is almost as flowery as that of a Chinese proclamation:

If benevolence, that purest emanation from the bosom of the Divinity, first of virtues, corner stone of universal morals, and bond of love which, encircling all beings, unites in brotherly affection the whole human family—if benevolence on the other side of the Atlantic, in the happy states of prosperous America, has recently displayed itself by an act worthy of the admiration of ages and the blessings of posterity to the latest day—let gratitude arise from among the barren rocks of burning Africa, wing its flight over the immensity of the ocean, and present itself before you, generous Americans.

Let not the expression of our gratitude be deemed too long delayed; it was suppressed by the heavy yoke which weighed upon us. A government which founded its authority of despotism, would not even permit us to address to you our grateful acknowledgments, and it, through an absurd policy or shameful neglect, it omitted to perform an act of such manifest obligation, it would have considered improper and unlawful any movement which did not proceed from its own omnipotent authority. Now the scene is changed; the legitimate government of her most faithful majesty the queen of Portugal and the constitution have been proclaimed in this archipelago. We are citizens, we enjoy freedom of expression, and as we can say of your immortal Franklin, "Eripuit cœle fulmen, sceptraque tyrannus," may we also say of you, you snatched a numerous people from the jaws of famine and death.

The promptness and greatness of your benefits are equalled only by the horrible extent of the evils they relieved. When your vessel arrived in this archipelago, laden with provisions, thousands of these unhappy islanders were shuddering in the grasp of death. Total destruction was the frightful destiny impending over them. It seemed as if the exterminating angel, closing the fountains of the heavens, had sent forth a burning blast and swept from the fields all traces of vegetation. To die was a vain recourse, for the universality of the evil had dried up the sources of public charity. The unhappy farmer fainting with hunger, roused by the clamorous cries of his starving children, goes to the fields to tear from the earth something to relieve them, but all his efforts are fruitless, he falls lifeless on the ungrateful soil, which he had moistened in vain with tears—the tender mother, turning away her dying eyes that she may not witness the expiring agonies of her infant babe, suppresses her last breath and yields up her spirit.

In this scene of horror, the frightful angel of death, exulting in his work, stalked over a vast cemetery heaped with dead bodies; while the guardian cherub of these islands, expanding his snowy wings, soared away to yonder regions to inspire in your breasts that pure benevolence with which you have so generously succoured this portion of the human family.

Yes, generous citizens, the gratitude we feel shall endure so long as there is memory in man—sooner shall the voracity of time destroy marbles and bronze, and the plough of the farmer trace its furrows in the soil on which all these monuments of human vanity now rest, than the remembrance of your benefits be effaced from the hearts of these islanders; and never more shall the knee be bent before the bright throne of the Almighty, in prayer for deliverance from such a scourge, without at the same time offering up ardent supplications for the happiness and prosperity of the country of Washington.

Island of St. Jago, Cape Verd, 24th Sept. 1833.

THE SOUTH EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

From the Mercantile Advertiser and Advocate.

Extract from the report of Dr. James Eight, naturalist to the late American exploring expedition of brigs Scrapp and Annawan.

After giving a description of a new crustacean animal found on the shores of the South Shetland islands, this talented naturalist remarks: "These islands are formed by an extensive cluster of rocks rising abruptly from the ocean to a considerable height above its surface. Their true elevation cannot easily be determined, in consequence of the heavy masses of snow which lie over them, concealing them almost entirely from the sight. Some of them, however, rear their glistening summits to an altitude of about three thousand feet, and when the heavens are free from clouds, imprint a sharp and well defined outline upon the intense blueness of the sky; they are divided every where by straits and indented by deep bays or coves, many of which afford to vessels a comfortable shelter from the rude gales to which these high latitudes are subject. When the winds have ceased to blow and the ocean is at rest, nothing can exceed the beautiful clearness of the atmosphere in these elevated regions. The numerous furrows and ravines which every where impress the snowy acclivity of the hills, are distinctly visible for fifty or sixty miles; and the various sea fowl, resting upon the slight eminences and brought in straggling relief against the sky, oftentimes deceive the inexperienced eye of the mariner by having their puny dimensions magnified in size to those of the human form.

The ocean in the vicinity, as far as the eye has vision, is here and there studded with icebergs, varying in magnitude from a few feet to more than a mile in extent, and not unfrequently rising two hundred feet in the air, presenting every variety of form, from the snug white-washed cottage of the peasant, to the enormous architectural pile, containing either broadly expanded Grecian domes, or having the many lofty and finely attenuated spires of some gothic structure. The sun, even at midsummer, attains but a moderate altitude in these dreary regions, and when its horizontal beams illumine these masses of ice, their numerous angles and indentations catching the light as they move along, exhibit all the beautiful gradations of color from an emerald green to that of the finest blue. Some of them whose sloping sides will admit of their ascent, are tenanted by large assemblages of penguins, whose clattering noise may be heard on a still day at an incredible distance over the clear smooth surface of the sea. When the storms rage and the ocean rolls its mountain wave against their slippery sides, the scene is truly sublime. Tall columns of spray shooting up far above their tops, soon become dissipated in clouds of misty white; gradually descending, they envelope the whole mass for a short space of time, giving to it much the appearance of being covered with a veil of silvery gauze. When thus agitated they not unfrequently explode with a noise of thunder, scattering their fragments far and wide over the surrounding surface of the deep. These hills of ice are borne onwards at a considerable rate, by the power of the winds and waves—when so, they sweep along with a majesty that nothing else can equal. The sun, as it rises or sets slowly and obliquely in the northern horizon, sends its rays through the many openings between, tinging them here and there with every variety of hue and color; from whence they are thrown, in mild and beautiful reflections, upon the extensive fields of snow which lie piled on the surrounding hills, giving to the whole scene, for a greater part of the long summer day, the ever varying effect of a most gorgeous sunset.

Entire skeletons of the whale, fifty or sixty feet in length, are not unfrequently found in elevated situations, along the shores of the South Shetland isles, many feet above the high water line. Whales are very common in their vicinity, and in calm weather great numbers of them may be seen breaking the surface of the ocean in the many intervals which occur between their numerous icebergs, sometimes sending forth volumes of spray; at others, elevating their huge flukes in the air, to descend, head first, as it were, to fathom the ocean's depth. When they perish, either from accident or some more natural cause, their carcasses, in drifting towards the shore, are overtaken by the billows and thrown thus far upon the land; here they are left by the retiring wave, and in a few hours their bones become perfectly denuded by the numberless sea birds that feed upon the flesh.

Our stay at these islands occupied a period of four weeks, during which time we observed but one ebb and flow of the tide in twenty-four hours. I know not if this be universal, but have been informed by mariners familiar in these seas, that they have generally found it so.

Not a day occurred that snow did not fall, or ice make on our decks; and during the time we spent in exploring, between the latitudes of 60 and 70 degrees south, and 54 and 110 degrees west longitude, which was more than two months, we found the current often setting with considerable velocity from the south west to the north east. The prevailing winds were also most commonly from the south west and north west. There were evidences of a number of active volcanoes in the vicinity of the South Shetland isles; indications were daily seen in the pieces of pumice found strewn along the beach, which, no doubt, comes from Palmer's Land, situated to the south; Deception island, also one of this group, has boiling springs, and a whitish substance like melted felspar, exudes from some of its fissures.

After enumerating the amphibious animals, this able naturalist observes—"There is also a fourth species, which I have no recollection of ever having seen the slightest notice of. It is probably not common, as I saw but one; it was standing on the extremities of its fore feet (dippers) the head and chest perfectly erect, abdomen curved, and resting on the ground; the tail was also in an upright position; the animal in this attitude bore a striking resemblance to the representations we frequently meet with of the 'mermaid,' and I think it was undoubtedly one of the animals of this genus that first gave origin to the fable of the maid of the sea. I regret that I could not obtain a nearer view of this interesting animal. When I approached within one hundred feet, it threw itself flat and made rapidly for the sea; it appeared about twelve or fifteen feet in length, and distinctly more slender in proportion than any of the other species; so much so, that the motion of the body when moving, seemed perfectly undulating. Some of the seamen had seen them frequently on a former voyage, but they were too much on their guard and alert to be taken." When speaking of the fishes inhabiting this ocean, he says—"Grampus and dolphins are quite common, and a species of porpoise which I had not before seen, occurs in great numbers. From their appearance in the water, their color seemed dark, with a broad and somewhat wavy white line extending from the posterior and inferior part of the head, backward and upward to the dorsal fin; a second and similar one commences on the abdomen immediately below the termination of the first, and ends at the origin of the tail above; these marks are distinctly visible as they glide through the sea. They are by the sailors called sea skunks, and I am told they are confined to high southern latitudes.

The birds which frequent these islands are much more numerous than any of the other classes of animals. Of penguins there are five species. The aptenodytes patagonica, (king penguin), is the largest and by far the most beautiful of the species, and may be seen in great numbers covering the shores for some considerable extent. They are remarkably clean in their appearance; not a speck of any kind is suffered for a moment to sully the pure whiteness or the principal part of their plumage; their upright position, uniform cleanliness, and beautiful golden yellow cravat, contrasts finely with the dark background by which they are relieved, so that the similitude is no unapt one, which compares them to a regiment of soldiers immediately after parade. The females lay but one egg, on the bare ground, which is rather larger than that of a goose, and of about equal value as an article of food. The egg lies between the feet, the tail being sufficiently long to conceal it effectually from the sight. When approached, they move from you with a waddling gait, rolling it along on the surface of the ground, so that a person not acquainted with the fact might pass through hundreds of them without discovering it.

The chinois forsteri, (sheath bill.) This is the white pigeon so often mentioned by mariners as inhabiting the islands of the southern ocean; it is easily caught by the hand, and soon becomes domesticated. We kept a number of them several days after leaving the islands; they ran about the decks apparently without any disposition to leave them, feeding from the hand of any individual that offered them food.

The existence of a southern continent within the Antarctic circle is, I conceive, a matter of doubt and uncertainty; but that there are extensive groups or chains of islands yet unknown, I think we have many indications to prove, and were I to express an opinion, I would say, that our course from the south Shetlands to the south west, until we reached the 101st degree of west longitude, was at no great distance along the northern shores of one of these chains.

The heavy clouds of mist which encircled us so often, could arise from no other cause than that of the influence of large quantities of snow or ice on the temperature of the atmosphere; the hills of floating ice we encountered, could not form elsewhere than at the land. The drifting fuci we daily saw, grow only in the vicinity of rocky shores, and the penguins and terns that were almost at all times about us, from my observation of their habits, I am satisfied, never leave the land at any great distance—the current and prevailing winds continually bearing the plants and ice along in its course towards the north east, some of the latter embracing fragments of a rock of a kind, the existence of which we could discover no where on the islands we visited.

When Palmer's land becomes properly explored, together with the known islands, I think they will prove to be an extensive chain, stretching out to near where captain Cook's progress was arrested by the firm fields of ice, in lat. 71 deg. 10 min. south and west longitude about 105 degrees. Had that skillful navigator succeeded in penetrating this mass of ice, he would unquestionably in a short time have made the land to which it was formed. Captain Weddel, after passing the icy barrier to the east of the south Shetlands and Palmer's land, succeeded in reaching the 74 deg. 15 min. south, (the highest latitude ever attained by man), and found in crossing this chain and progressing towards the south, that the sea became more free of ice, and the weather almost as mild as summer, evidently proving I think that the south pole can be nearly approached, without incurring any great degree of hazard in the attempt. But for further information on the practicability of reaching the south pole, I must refer to the judicious remarks in Faunnie's voyages, page 472, with which I perfectly coincide. To conclude, in a powerful and advancing nation like the United States, with a population whose daring enterprise has already carried our flag into the remotest corners of the globe, will not the just liberality of congress, authorise a discovery and exploring expedition to these parts of our globe. They might thus settle this interesting question, and also determine with certainty the situation, magnitude and extent of these lands, and by that means open a new source of revenue, and riches to our country in the oil, fur, animals, &c. which must necessarily exist in these southern regions.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 11—VOL. X.] BALTIMORE, MAY 10, 1834. [VOL. XLVI. WHOLE No. 1,181.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

An extra half sheet, or eight pages, as supplementary to the last number of the REGISTER, accompanies the present—to dispose of some interesting articles which had accumulated in type. We would gladly repeat this operation frequently—(though without a hope of keeping pace with the new productions of matter), for these are times that will be earnestly referred to, a little while hence. Without a misuse of the worn-out catch-word of the "Richmond Enquirer," we are on the borders of an important "crisis."

It will be seen that the senate has refused to register the president's protest, 27 to 16. It is again reported that there will be an appeal to the people, as has several times before been mentioned.

We present the message of the president renominating Messrs. Wager and others, as directors of the bank of the United States, with the report of the senate's committee of finance thereon, and some extracts from the "executive journal" concerning these nominations, with the yeas and nays, &c.

It will not fail to strike the attention of the reader, that the message commences with disclaiming all pretension, or right, to call in question the reasons of the senate for rejecting nominations—while the chief part of it is made up of suggestions of reasons which may have influenced the senate, and of arguments upon those suggested reasons as though they were established facts. Such is our reading of this paper.

The report, or reply, of the committee of finance, written in a dignified mildness of language, is exceedingly severe in its remarks on the suggestions or "presumptions" of the president, and in its refusal to make up an argument with him.

It will be observed, that, having suggested certain reasons which may have influenced the senate in rejecting the nominations, and presuming upon them, the president plainly intimates that he will not nominate any other directors. The senate absolutely refused, as they ought, to plead to the suggested reasons, and the "Globe" of Saturday last says—

"The report of the committee of the senate does not place the rejection on the conduct of the directors in making their communications to the president; on the contrary, it leaves it to be inferred that they may have been rejected on other grounds; and under such circumstances, we presume other directors will be nominated, as soon as a proper selection can be made. It is much to be feared, however, that there will be difficulty in obtaining the services of any citizen, while it is left in doubt whether the senate will not reject them, if they initiate the conduct of the late directors, in reporting, from time to time, such abuses as may come to their knowledge."

[The preceding is a very ingenious paragraph!]

The subject, in general, invites many remarks—but we shall not make them. The president has no more to do with the reasons of the senate for rejecting nominations, than the senate has to do with the reasons of the president for making them; either party is altogether independent of the other, in this respect—and, we hope, will always remain so.*

*The following rather queer remarks on this subject, appear in the "Richmond Enquirer" of the 6th inst. We have italicized certain of its parts—which "looks rebellion."

We give up a large portion of our paper to the message of the president, and the report of the committee upon the renomination of the public directors, to the senate of the U. S. The first bears date on the 11th March—and the second is made only on the 2d May. It is strange that the senate should have left this matter sleep nearly two months.

We hold the perfect right of the senate to reject, at their pleasure, any nomination which may be made by the president, without assigning reasons for their conduct. We also admit the right of the president to renominate the same individuals, upon assigning new reasons; but without criticising the course of the senate. In this respect, the senate owes no responsibility to any quarter, but in their own consciences and to their constituents.

In a subsequent page there is a brief sketch of a debate in the French chamber of deputies, on the appropriation to carry into effect the treaty of indemnification with the United States, which has been refused by a majority of eight. This is bad news.

Our means are so small compared with the requisitions made upon them, that we hardly know what to promise, or hold out the expectation of performing—as to the insertion of articles: but there are several speeches on the late protest of the president against the proceedings of the senate, however, that we have a strong desire to make room for—pro and con.

We publish, in a subsequent page, a recent and comparative statement of the affairs of the bank of the United States. The solvency of this institution was "questioned" not long ago, by profligate or ignorant persons! Look at the mighty means of the bank! The coin which it holds, and the debts that are due to it by the state banks and in Europe, are about the same in amount as its whole circulation; and if all the state banks, (the deposit banks not excepted), are not at the mercy of the U. S. bank, it has power to forbid the making of new discounts by them—for, if the directors pleased, they might, by liberal issues of their own notes, at any point desired, (if not already possessed of ample means), gather in a sufficient quantity of the notes of the state banks to cast them down, as rows of bricks are prostrated by idle boys in play—each thumping against its "next door neighbor" until the whole tier is laid flat!

A part of the increased specie has been drawn from abroad—but another considerable part has been derived from the confidence of the people in the solvency of this bank, and the intelligence with which its concerns are managed. The labor of its tellers is greatly increased by receipts of specie in exchange for its notes, or in accommodating individuals with such notes in exchange for those of local banks. We know of several cases in which agents and factors are particularly instructed to bring home or transmit the proceeds of articles committed to their charge, either in specie or bills of the bank of the United States; and a worthy and well informed gentleman has just observed, that, on the eastern shore of Maryland, for an example, the proportion of U. S. bills in circulation seems ten times larger than ever it was heretofore. Such proceedings are exceedingly detrimental to the state banks, for they severely embarrass and restrict the ordinary operations of some of the soundest and best managed of them—but the bank of the U. S. has no other instrumentality in bringing them about than naturally flows from an undoubted confidence in its ability to meet its engagements, in any emergency—though the hostility of "the government" be superadded to the "pressure" of the times!

At the beginning of the war "at the knife's point and the knife to the hilt" (as a certain distinguished legislator has beautifully described the manner in which he would fight), the bank was spoken of as a "reptile to be crushed at will, under the feet of the secretary of the treasury,"—and so fools believed, and silly ones rejoiced at it, for they knew no better, being entirely ignorant of the real state of the bank, as well as of the nature of currency—and inflated, also, like frogs croaking on the borders of a muddy pool, with delicious ideas of their own importance, and the power of their own "sweet voices" to perform a requiem over the bank. But their croakings only made common-sense people laugh—if not compelled to grieve at the evils which ignorance and vanity had inflicted—for the "reptile" would not be crushed! What was next to be done? The whole flock then "jumped over the fence," and, instead of "glorifying" over the weakness of the bank, they abused it for its strength, and simultaneously shouted "monster," "monster," "monster!" And they had the effrontery—though they said, years before, that the bank ought to commence a retirement of its business—to criminate the institution for withholding new discounts! Precious consistency—"glorious" demonstration of the love of truth! But that story, as we said not long ago, was soon kicked out of every decent company, by the simple shewing of the bank that it had not reduced the line of its discounts to the extent to which the line of its deposits had been reduced—though, if the bank must die at the expiration of its charter, impudence itself should not have blamed it for restraining its discounts. It is a common saying, and too often seems a true one, that "corporations have no souls;" but, in this instance, the bank of the United States has shewn us that it has one, or that a sense of its own interest, to prevent a general bankruptcy of dealing men, has acted in the place of a "soul;" and it is well, indeed, that the bank is not "THE MONSTER" which it has been so loudly and angrily proclaimed; that certain considerations which enter not into the minds of its enemies, which have no home in their bosoms, induce it to restrain its power to do that harm to others which others designed to render against itself, and would still exert, if they could! We do not envy these men the secret thoughts of their own hearts—the compunctious visitations of their own consciences!—for we presume that even —, must "know himself" sufficiently well to feel that he is a contemptible night-produced "toad stool," and a miserable and filthy and pestiferous thing.

The senate may have erred, and it is highly probable that they have erred, in the motives which have actuated them to reject the government directors. But the president has committed an error in discussing the motives which might have actuated them—and upon putting on an hypothesis, his own duty of nominating to the senate, officers whose appointment is called for by the laws of the land. We are pleased to learn from the Globe, that the president is about to nominate other directors to the senate. The president puts it upon the ground, that the senate have not avowed their rejection of the former directors, because they had communicated the transactions of the bank to him—therefore, as they have not maintained this principle, he will nominate others. We have not had time to look at the proceedings of the congress which framed the bank charter, for the purpose of seeing whether this function of reporting to the executive by the government directors was contemplated at the time.

In the present state of affairs, we could not advise the directors of the bank (if our humble opinion were asked), to extend their circulation—yet we regret to observe that it is rapidly diminishing. Every hundred dollars of its notes withdrawn, probably contracts the general circulation at least 400 dollars (for its notes are better than specie), and the value of money is too rapidly appreciated, and so it must go on. But what can the bank do? Can it be asked, at this season of peril, to extend its business? Certainly not. It stands, and must stand, "like a strong man armed," between a sound currency and a circulation of rag-money—and if the latter prevails, as many well-judging persons fear that it must, the interests of the bank itself will be exceedingly injured. Here are the horns of the dilemma!—If the bank increases its circulation, it endangers itself, and will be also grossly abused for doing so, because of the near approach of the expiration of its charter—if it retires its circulation, (which the people prefer to coin), it drains the coin out of the state banks, and, to four times the amount of such drains, reduces their discounts or accommodations to the public! Hence the paralysis in business of all sorts, which, in our opinion, has only just commenced. There are peculiar circumstances which must urge it onward. A part of the public debt, (of insignificant amount, in past times, but now a weighty concern), is to be paid—and certain arrangements entered into at New York, and, perhaps, other places, to relieve the pressure on business-men, have passed the period for which they were entered into. We hope that they may be renewed. The necessity of relief is every day more and more apparent. Distress gathers force as it proceeds. And the deposit banks cannot long render the relief that was expected of them, through the use of the public deposits—for, if the ordinary amount of moneys be appropriated, "the government" will not have a "surplus," at the end of a few months.

The patriotic idea of breaking or "crushing" the bank of the United States, has been abandoned! It may die a natural death, but all the power of "the government" cannot kill it before its time! And, though the bank cannot be killed, it may prostrate its tens of thousands of the people, and must, in self defence, unless the hostile proceedings against it are suspended, if not retraced—whether the charter shall be renewed in a modified form, or the idea of continuing a national bank be altogether thrown aside.

In the present state of the business and currency of the United States, the notion of a sudden reversion to a metallic medium, is worthy only the mind of a straight-waistcoated maniac. It is impossible, unless in the almost universal ruin of all who do not hold public offices, and feed at the public crib. These might fatten on the agonies of honest men, if paid in coin, or its equivalent, as they are now. It is the part of every honest man to wish the preservation of a sound currency; and we fearlessly assert that we have the best currency in the world, in the bills of the bank of the United States, being undeniably better than hard dollars, because of the reduced risk in keeping, or cost of transporting moneys from place to place.*

The bank has a mighty power. It has the strength of a giant—but does not exert it. The state banks stand in the relation of rivals to it, being engaged in the same business; but where is the state bank that asks the abolition of a bank of the United States? What possible better evidence of the good conduct of the bank can be offered, than in the imposing fact suggested—the almost universal testimony of intelligent men, who know and feel that the bank of the United States, instead of being a "monster," with the will to cripple and destroy the state institutions, is always ready, and never has refused, to sustain such of them as had just claims to a liberal support. If it be said that such is the interest of the bank, (as we believe that it is), so much the better! The strongest guard against the doing of wrong, is to make it a person's interest to do right.

The power of the bank has been as well derived from the intelligent and prudent administration of its concerns, as from the ignorance and vanity of those who would have "crushed" it. It was as though a parcel of children, putting to sea on a float of loose boards, and armed with elder-bush pop-guns, charged with chewed paper, had made an attack upon, and demanded the surrender of, the CONSTITUTION frigate—when commanded by a Hull, Bainbridge or Stewart, and manned by 500 Americans whose "home is on the deep!" And then, though the precaution of even closing the ports of the frigate should not be made—though not a single swivel, charged with grains of sand only, should be fired by her—who would not laugh when they heard her called a "monster," for the simple reason that she would not haul down the stripes and stars at the bidding of such an enemy? But this is not all—the ripples of the water against her "iron sides" shakes into pieces the floats of boards, and her boats are hoisted out to save the young ones who would have sunk her—if they could!†

In the preceding part of this article, it is mentioned that large amounts of specie were deposited in the bank of the United States, to obtain its notes. We learn, however, that, in many cases, such exchange is refused by the bank—and for these reasons, that the bank generally prefers its own notes to specie—having an ample sufficiency of the latter, and not knowing to what foul purposes the former may be appropriated by malignant persons; and it often happens that from one to two per cent. in coin, is offered as a premium for notes of this bank, and refused. This is the natural result of the war that prevails against the institution—a war of “the government” against seven millions of the people’s own money vested in the capital of the bank! And besides, it is rather the interest of the bank to import specie at the present rates of exchange, than to gather it from the vaults of the local banks, unless in necessary settlement of balances due.

*We have some truly laughable accounts of the cozenings of some of the "petish credit" members of congress, to obtain bills of the bank of the United States in exchange for those which are paid them in Washington. Are these men honest? How modest is it in them, to recommend to others that which they will not take themselves! They talk about a "metallic currency," and yet beg for accommodations from the office of the bank of the United States. Let them send or carry home, the bills of the bank of the Metropolis!

†The bank has comparatively increased the amount of its accommodations—and, with all the disposition that prevails to misrepresent and distort the proceedings of its directors, has a single instance of oppression been preferred and sustained against them? The demands on other banks have been moderately urged, and in many instances postponed; and in cases of emergency the coin and credit of this bank have been freely tendered to state banks.

The imbecility of those who made war upon the bank had two leading causes—first, the veto of the president on the bill for rechartering the bank, was a war against both houses of congress—and the removal of the deposites as well a war against the common sense of mankind, as against the house of representatives, which had, at the last session, by a vote of 109 to 46, declared the public money safe in this institution; and now, perhaps, there is hardly one man in a hundred who can “read, rite and sipher to the rule of three,” being engaged in any sort of business, that, in the secret of his own heart, regards the removal of the deposites as a wise or proper proceeding on the part of the president. It is almost universally reprobated by the thinking men, though party will not permit some to confess it, openly. The people then, who had power over this subject, were not on the side of “the government,” and the imbecility of the latter is shewn in the manner stated above. The moral force of the country is in opposition to the will of the president, to say nothing of the sacrifices of property and of comfort which his measures have already caused.

We shall make another remark, and conclude, intending to refer to the fact more fully at a future day. The bank is complained of as a “monopoly,” &c. But what was the origin of this bank? Was it the contrivance of capitalists, or a project of the government, to redeem the republic of a disordered currency and re-establish public and private credit? It was the latter! And if the present bank shall be destroyed, the same causes will produce the same effects, and we shall have another bank! But why not profit by past experience? Must we be repeatedly “brayed in a mortar” to maintain vivid recollections of pains endured?

The reports that difficulties have occurred between the committee of the house of representatives, (sent to Philadelphia, to investigate the affairs of the bank of the United States), and the president and directors of that institution, have been continued—and, indeed, the return of the committee seems to have been daily expected; but things have not yet proceeded to that extremity.

We gather from these reports, [how far they are true we pretend not to form an opinion], that the committee had claimed not only the private possession of the books of the bank, as stated in our last, but copies of all letters “on any subject in any way connected with the bank, or the public deposites, or private affairs, which the officers of the bank may have received from members of congress, within the last two years”—of course, this demand was refused: for, as the “National Intelligencer” well observes, “So jealous were the people of this country, in reference to this matter, that a provision was introduced into the constitution of the United States, expressly securing the right of the people to be secure in their papers, effects, &c. against unreasonable searches and seizures.” What can be more unreasonable than the general seizure of the correspondence of the members of congress, without warrant, by the assumed authority of a committee of congress? And besides, the whole power of congress is contained in the following clause of the charter of the bank—“That it shall, at all times, be lawful for a committee of either house of congress, appointed for that purpose, to inspect the books, and to examine into the proceedings of the corporation hereby created, and to report whether the provisions of this charter have been, by the same, violated or not.” This is the whole power.

There is no possible right in the committee to make either of the demands stated, and there would be a gross impropriety in listening to either of them. They are claims that could not be made on the part of a portion even of the directors of any bank, unless under a special order of the board, in some particular emergency. We must needs think that the committee well knew that such claims would not, and could not, be honored—and that the effect of a refusal of them was calculated. We understand that a long correspondence has taken place on these subjects. There is a plain and acknowledged and legal remedy in “the government,” provided by the charter, to ascertain whether the charter has been violated or not—by a writ of scire facias. This is indeed the only remedy provided—if resorted to, the bank will promptly plead to it; but dares not encourage such an espionage as is now for the first time attempted in the United States.

We have yet another “explosion”—as follows:

MARYLAND SAVINGS INSTITUTION,

May 6th, 1834.

The board of directors deem it advisable, under existing circumstances, to suspend the operations of this institution, as relates to the receipt and payment of deposites for the present—and until further notice.

The stockholders are invited to attend a meeting at Scott’s long room, in South street, on Thursday next, at four o’clock in the afternoon, to consider and decide on the course to be pursued in settling the affairs of the institution.* The holders of certificates of special deposites are informed, that they will be received in payment of debts due the institution—and all moneys deposited or left in charge of the institution this day, will be returned to those entitled. All notes deposited for collection, by persons not indebted to the institution, will be delivered to the depositors.

It is believed by the board of directors, that in deciding on the present suspension, they have adopted a measure which will tend to secure full payment of all the deposites in the institution. By order of the board,

J. HUTCHINS, treasurer.

This institution was a large depository of the moneys, or savings, of the productive classes, and its operations were extensive. If we except the bank of Maryland, (which failed sometime ago), there neither was, nor is, in this city, any corporate body which could have [directly] borne so heavily on the industrious and hard-working and economical citizens of Baltimore. A doubt has, for several weeks, existed as to its ability to meet its engagements; and a great sum has been drawn from it, in consequence of that doubt: but a greater sum remains that could not be promptly drawn, notice of the intention to withdraw being required, and we see the result as above stated. It is believed that the institution may pay all its debts in a reasonable time, if able to make reasonable collections of those which are due to it, and leave something for the stockholders; for, at the last settlement of its affairs, there was a large apparent sum in surplus profits. We have not, however, any particular knowledge of the condition of this establishment.

A great crowd collected about the building on Wednesday morning, and a deep feeling of distress was manifested, especially on the part of several females; but the people conducted themselves in an orderly manner, and if any had a disposition to create a riot, it was restrained for the want of co-operating spirits.

In a community so pressed down as that of this city, every event of this sort adds a ten-fold pressure to the real amount of the difficulty itself by diminishing public confidence—for thousands of false reports are put afloat, though there are enough of bad ones in circulation that are true—and the end of these things is not near at hand! No man can calculate the ending of them. There is not a single ray of light to guide us through the gloom that encompasses us. We have only to fear the what next?

Several gentlemen have requested us to publish and preserve lists of the presidents and directors of the several corporations that have failed in this city, that they may be easily referred to; and also suggested, that certain close investigations should be commenced by us, as in times past, when at war with the "rag-barons," &c. The object of the former as we understand it, is in the way of reproof, that some worthy men should have permitted the use of their names to sanction proceedings that have turned out so calamitous. It is a great misfortune, that such persons have so acted—for so it is, in many cases, that they were as ignorant of the real state of the institutions to which they were attached, as of things happening in Kamschiatska—seldom meeting, and then as if only to make up a board! But they ought to be held responsible to the public, in one way or another.

*The meeting was held, and a general statement of the affairs of the institution has been published. In the use of gross sums, it shews a balanced account—the responsibilities and apparent means being each $695,082 80—but nothing is stated by which the validity of the means may be tested, nor is any opinion expressed of the solvency of the establishment. The subject has been referred to an excellent committee of five persons, who are expected to make a report on or before the 19th inst.

The general subject, however, is one that, on account of its locality, we are indisposed to meddle with—for our local circulation is very limited; and, as we never have, we do not choose now, to lumber our pages with local affairs.* And withal, injustice might be rendered to some individuals: for monetary negotiations which appeared highly prudent and proper before "the fell experiment" began, and when cash counted credit—would now seem to have been the result of insane calculations of means. The people are not always willing to make rightful allowances for altered circumstances—and yet it is these which determine some of the most important events of our lives. Principles do not change; but the practice on principles is at all times subject to various mutations. Who that made an engagement in September last to pay money in May, present, and thought himself acting wisely—does not regret the proceeding, if of a nature that it might have been avoided at the time! One thousand dollars in ready money now, seems worth more than 1,500 dollars were worth then—and is certainly harder to get the possession of. Still we believe that there has been much excessively imprudent conduct, (if not fraudulent intention), in some of the persons connected with these bankrupted institutions.

The glory of "the experiment" is more and more manifest every day. In our last paper we published an account of the cotton spindles which had been stopped in the neighborhood of Providence, R. I. being 70,400—we have now to add the following, from the "Providence Journal."

One of the letter writers from Washington states a curious circumstance which happened in the house of representatives on the 2d inst. as follows: Mr. Chilton—having the floor on the resolution of Mr. Jarvis for inquiring into the condition of the District banks—made good his statement, that he had an important fact to communicate respecting the pet there, the bank of the Metropolis, and said that the bank had violated its charter, by the issue of one dollar bills, "with the connivance and sanction of the government."

"This is no statement, (says the account), unsustained by proof, for Mr. C. exhibited the proof, read the note in his place in the house, and on its face it purported to have the usual vignette—bank of the Metropolis, selected depository of the government—and was endorsed Washington, 6th November, 1833, pay one dollar to S. Potter, agent of the treasury department, and afterwards payable to F. P. Blair, editor of the Globe, the official paper; through whose hands it came with others, and was so endorsed, &c. &c.!!! Mr. C. then placed in juxta position, the clause by which the charter of the bank was declared to be violated, if it should issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars. The bane and antidote were both before them."

*This work owes but little to Baltimore for its support. For one dollar received of its citizens, the editor has brought from distant places thirty or forty dollars to be expended among them. It is therefore manifest that he cannot go into a special examination of things that are local in their nature, and would involve, perhaps, an occupancy of the chief part of his pages, which more belong to the people of several of the states, than to those of Maryland, including the city of Baltimore.

There are several other matters preferred against this bank—and it seems probable that the fact shewn by Mr. Chilton will lead to an investigation of its affairs, which it seemed resolved should not be made: it being denied in the house that congress had power to examine even into the solvency of the bank of the Metropolis, though a place of deposit of the public money!

The following from a late London paper, will not fail to claim the serious attention of thinking persons. It is true to the letter, except that the party which has power to relieve the misery of the people, is engaged in an "experiment," and will not.

The unparalleled embarrassments amongst the commercial classes of the United States, have produced a great stagnation in the trade between this country and that recently flourishing republic. The numerous failures which have occurred in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and the other cities of the union, have been felt both directly and indirectly in England. Directly in their effect on individual firms, and indirectly in their effect on the general state of credit. There is, of course, a great indispotion on this side of the Atlantic to risk goods, or to enter into commercial transactions at present, in a country in which undoubted solvency and unblemished integrity are no securities against embarrassment and ruin, and the commercial classes on the other side find too much difficulty in meeting their engagements in the present disordered state of trade and suspension of credit, to have either disposition or ability to extend their concerns.

Thus the prospects of a vast and profitable trade with the United States, which only a few months since seemed so bright, have been clouded, and it is impossible to tell when the cloud shall pass away. A rancorous spirit of party seems to have destroyed every thing like reasonableness in the government. Under these circumstances, the close and intimate connection between the American republic and the British empire, compels us to endure a considerable share of the inconvenience resulting from the embarrassments of our trans-atlantic friends and customers. The exports of iron, woolen goods, cutlery, hosiery, and we have no doubt of all other articles, have received a severe check, from which they will not recover until the Americans and their government recover their senses. When that will be it is impossible to guess, for up to the latest accounts, the exasperation of all parties seem only to be increased by the increasing misery of every class of the people. Each party lays the blame on the other, and none does any thing to restore public or private confidence.

Mr. Schott, president of the Girard bank, at Philadelphia, has officially notified the stockholders that the contract with the United States, for the receipt of the public deposits, will "cease and determine" on the 1st July next.

It is mentioned that Mr. Rush has resigned his clerkship to the committee examining the affairs of the bank, with a view to his nomination as a "government director" of that institution.

Two manufacturers of buttons, in Easthampton, Mass. have recently discharged more than fifteen hundred working people—because of the want of demand for their products, in the want of money or credit to purchase them. The discharged are chiefly females.

United States bank stock at New York, May 3—107½.

The packet ship Ontario has arrived at New York from London, with 350,000 dollars in specie.

The business at the gold mines of Georgia is said to be very profitable just now, and that it will yield an interest of 15 or 20 per cent. profit on the labor and capital employed last year. An Irishman named Thomas C. Bowen had withheld a deposit of 14,955 dwts. of gold for the bank of Darien, and eloped with the property. A teller in the Mechanics and Traders' bank of New Orleans, has also removed several thousand dollars of the deposits, without assigning any "reasons" for so doing.

The Jackson party has succeeded in the election of constables in the district of Southwark, (Philadelphia), by a larger majority than usual; and also in the election of mayor, &c. in the new city of Brooklyn, (opposite New York), by a smaller majority than usual; but has been defeated in every ward of the city of Albany, and by an aggregate majority of 475 votes. So also at Catskill, which, in 1821, gave a large Jackson majority.

The borough of Reading, Pennsylvania, hitherto one of the strongest holds of the administration, has elected anti-Jackson officers. Such a result does not appear to have been expected by one party, and was unhopd for by the other.

The committee of the five first wards of the city of Baltimore, charged with a certain "instruction" to Mr. McKim, have made a very able and elaborate report on the subject—which shall be noticed when like returns from Anne Arundel county are received.

A large "Jackson Republican" meeting was held in Monument Square, Baltimore, on Wednesday evening last. As we have published the resolutions passed at the other meeting, we shall give those passed at this.

A memorial was lately offered in the senate, by Mr. McKean, from certain "democratic-republican-Jackson-Wolf-citizens" of Pennsylvania.

The "New York Courier" says that of 85 persons appointed to make arrangements for the reception of the newly elected mayor, more than forty are office-holders.

A lively report has prevailed that gov. Tazewell, of Virginia, will speedily convene the new legislature, because of the present state of public affairs. Such a proceeding might have a powerful effect in these perilous times; but the season is exceedingly inconvenient to the members, and the expense not to be disregarded, unless the necessity shall become manifest.

There is a majority in every county of Mr. Stevenson's district, in Virginia, against his political course, and the entire vote not less than two to one against the administration. Mr. Loyall's district shews more than two to one against his votes in the house of representatives of the United States.

We may insert some amusing paragraphs, in the way of prophecies concerning the late elections in Virginia, or as attempts to soften down the result—which, it is distinctly stated, shews a majority of at least twenty-five against the administration. It is supposed that this number will be much increased, when the legislature meets, in consequence of the "protest."

Several of the newspapers are wickedly republishing Mr. Benton's famous speech of May 4, 1826, on executive powers, patronage, privileges, &c. It is really an amusing article—an "entire" reform one; and we invite our numerous friends who preserve files of the REGISTER, to refer to vol. 36 page 292, that they may have a hearty and long laugh; and, in times like these, every man who causes a laugh should be regarded a "public benefactor!"

The New York Standard thinks it a small matter that 114,918 names are signed to petitions praying for a restoration of the deposits, and only 8,751 against the restoration. What is 115,000 to the 13,000,000 inhabitants of the United States? But are not these thirteen millions subject to some small considerations? In the first place, about three millions on account of persons of color—then a few millions for women and children—then other millions for persons who have had no opportunity to sign a memorial, and then a large number for aliens and paupers, and others, who have no right to sign.

The publication of the New York Standard has ceased. It was one of the most earnest supporters of the administration in the United States. The "New York Evening Post" now stands alone in that city, and is much disposed to run down Mr. Swartwout, the collector of the port, and certain others of the custom house-officers—saying that there are offences of a "political nature that should have been enquired into."

Mr. Foot has left his seat in congress to enter upon the duties of governor of Connecticut, and so also has Mr. Lawrence to take his place as mayor of New York.

Col. Crockett is yet on his "tower" to the north, and has much amused the people by his originalities, and the broad good humor that plays on his "honest face."

The cholera is bad among the boats on the western waters—several of them, (ascending), have lost from 5 to 20 passengers—one lost 8 cabin passengers. Several U. S. soldiers had died on board the steamboat Philadelphia.

The governor of Rhode Island has issued a warrant convening the old house of representatives, stating that doubts are entertained whether a quorum of senators has been chosen by the people, and that it will be necessary for the house to take steps suited to the emergency.

The condition of things in this state seems awkward enough. In 1832, says a Providence paper, the Jackson legislature passed a law providing for the continuance of the governor and senate in office in case of a non-election by the people. They endeavored to set aside the election of Mr. Robbins, as United States senator, and to substitute Elisha R. Potter for a vacancy which had not happened. Mr. Potter having been rejected, they repealed this same law, and now on the very last day of their political existence, this old house of representatives has been summoned to re-enact this same law, without which the state would be without any government at all."

In the first week of the late opening of the New York canals, the gross receipts on the whole of them, amounted to the large sum of $44,642 42.

The Pennsylvania canals have been doing a good business for some time. Their opening considerably preceded that of the New York canals, and a spirited competition prevails to obtain the trade of the "great west."

Belgium does not appear to have gained much by the revolution and separation from Holland. Nearly all the merchants have departed for and located themselves in the latter—and from the following it appears that the manufacturers are also moving away—

A letter from Antwerp, in a Ghent journal says—"The house of William Wood, Leaven & Son, of this city has sold to the clergy the extensive buildings in which they carry on their manufactures of muslin. It is intended to convert this building into a convent for nuns. Before the revolution, Mr. Wood gave employment to about 1,500 persons in Antwerp, and 5,000 in the whole kingdom. He is now going to settle at Amsterdam, where he already has a house under his own name. Blessed effects of our revolution!"

There is yet a great deal of uneasiness in South Carolina on account of the test oath required of militia officers. Under all the circumstances of the case we must think—if even believing that a right exists to impose such an obligation, it is expedient, at least, to defer an exertion of it.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

In the night of the 29th ult. the range of houses, called the Phenix buildings, at the corner of Wall and Water streets, N. York, were, with the chief part of their contents, consumed by fire. It broke out in the fifth story. There were many tenants in these buildings. The printing establishment of the Mercantile Advertiser and New York Advocate was in the 4th story, and all the presses, types, &c. were lost—but happily insured. The publication of this valuable paper was resumed on the 5th inst. and its appearance is much improved. The total loss of property by this fire is not stated, but it must have been a large one. The loftiness of the building rendered it impossible to check the progress of the flames until they had acquired a power that was irresistible unless after the mass of combustible matter was nearly exhausted.

The New York Commercial Advertiser says—"We are happy to learn that the money amounting to three thousand dollars, belonging to the Morris and Delaware canal company, which was lost a few days ago, has, every dollar of it, been restored. The recovery, we understand, was effected at the confessional—and it deserves to be known that unweaned and most laudable pains have been taken by the very reverend Dr. Power, and the other Catholic clergymen in our city, for some time past, to accomplish the restoration. The company is indebted for it to the immediate instrumentality of the former gentleman.

There is a new town called "Grand Gulf" on the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Big Black river, about 50 miles above Natchez. It has only four years' growth, but contains 600 or 700 inhabitants, and many good houses and extensive mercantile establishments. Upwards of 33,000 bales of cotton were shipped from it last year. The Big Black river extends between 3 and 400 miles to the interior, and for a long distance is navigable by steamboats.

The cholera made its appearance at the plantation of Mr. B. Smith, one mile from Port Gibson, Mississippi, about the 1st of April, and, up to the 10th, there had been forty-two cases and six deaths. The paper of the 11th states that no additional case had occurred. There had been one or two cases in the town, but no deaths.

A stout, athletic man by the name of Samuel Book, of Lawrenceburg, Indiana, died at Natchez, two or three weeks since, of cholera. He was on his way home from New Orleans. The Natchez Standard says, "His case was purely one of accident, and now-a-days quite common to persons under particular circumstances—exposure to the weather, and carelessness in the choice of food and general mode of living."

The debt due by the city of Boston, on the 1st of the present month, was $1,078,088 28. The amount of bonds and notes held by the city was $157,125 94—leaving a nett balance against it of $920,962 34. This city owns much valuable property.

The steamboat United States, capt. Van de Water, touched at the mouth of the Genesee river, Lake Ontario, a few days ago, with 1,000 passengers!

The ship Tuscan, which made so successful a trip to Calcutta, with a cargo of ice, is again fitting out for the same voyage, from Boston, with a cargo of the like description. Another vessel will be despatched for Bombay, and the day is not far removed when we may behold ice as one of the staple exports of the north.

At a public sale of the balance of the property of Mr. Boutigny, in New Orleans, on the 11th ultimo, we observe it stated that 48 slaves were sold for the sum of forty two thousand four hundred and ten dollars.

The Maryland state colonization society have succeeded in purchasing and commencing the settlement of a tract of land at cape Palmas, in Africa, to which they have given the name of Maryland. It contains about 400 square miles. The land is said to be of excellent quality and well timbered, and, in point of salubrity, one of the most desirable spots on the western coast of Africa. The country around is not infested with swamps and mangroves as elsewhere. The harbor of the territory is represented as decidedly the best from Sierra Leone to Fernando Po, affording a perfectly safe anchorage for the largest vessels, within pistol shot of the shore.

To the credit of the society, and their agent in the purchase, James Hall, esq. it should be remarked that the bargain with the natives was concluded upon the most reasonable terms, and in a shorter time, probably, than any treaty of the kind was ever before effected, without the intervention of spirituous liquors. The Arkansas Gazette says—"About 540 emigrating Cherokees, from the old nation, east of the Mississippi, passed up the Arkansas a few days ago, in charge of lieutenant Harris, U.S.A., on board the steamboat Thomas Yeatman, on their way to join their brethren west of this territory."

Two gentlemen joint keepers of a "coffee house," were loosed yesterday. The senior partner to the amount of $2,000, and costs, and the junior, $800 and costs—for permitting gambling to be carried on in their premises. They were too polite to contend with his honor the commonwealth. [Boston Post.]

The New Orleans Advertiser of the 27th March, said—"There are now loading at the sugar refinery of Messrs. Forestall & Co. four vessels for the Mediterranean. The refinery is situated about two miles below the city. One hundred and thirty men are employed in it, and the quantity of sugar refined amounts annually to about 12,000,000 of pounds. The whole process is done by steam, and it is said to be without exception, the most extensive and complete establishment of the kind in the whole world."

In answer to an inquiry by Mr. Williams, of N. C. in the house of representatives, Mr. Polk stated that there were 39,000 applications for pensions now before the pension office, and not yet decided upon.

The budget of expenditure of the Dutch government for the present (1834) is 53,822,828 florins, which answers to £4,491,068 sterling; and the population of Holland being 3,500,000, this gives £1 16s. a-head for the taxation in money; and the price of wheat being 30s. 8d. the quarter, this gives 9.39 bushels a-head for the taxation in wheat.

The population of Great Britain, in 1833, was estimated at 16,557,398, viz: Agricultural occupiers, 1,500,000; laborers, 4,800,000; mining 600,000; manufacturers 2,400,000; proprietors and annuitants 1,116,398; seamen and soldiers 831,000; shopkeepers 2,100,000; all other classes 3,190,000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From Liverpool papers to the 8th, and London to the 7th April, inclusive.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The rumors of an interference in favor of Donna Maria by the troops of Spain, had produced a decided improvement in favor of Portuguese securities.

A very serious riot took place the beginning of April, at Portadown, Ireland, in which there were much destruction of property and breaking of heads.

There has been some improvement in the British revenues.

FRANCE.

The chief subject of interest is the reorganization of the ministry, which, at this moment, is of deep concern to our country, as the resignation of the duke de Broglie and general Sebastiani was occasioned by the refusal of the chambers to make the necessary appropriation, to carry the treaty with this country into effect. We, therefore, give the following abstract, published in the Moniteur, which also promulgates royal ordinances, by which M. Persil, deputy procureur general of the royal court, is appointed keeper of the seals and minister of justice and of worship, in the room of M. Barthe, who is created a peer of France, and made first president of the court of accounts, in the room of M. Barbe Marbois, who resigns, but who is invested with the dignity of honorary first president of the court of accounts.

M. Thiers, deputy, minister of commerce and public works, is appointed minister of the interior, in the room of count d'Arrou, who is made governor of the bank of France, in the place of the duke de Gaete.

M. Duchatel, deputy, is nominated minister of commerce in the room of M. Thiers.

The separation of the attributions of the minister of the interior and of commerce, will be hereafter determined by a special ordinance.

Vice admiral count de Rigny, deputy and minister of the marine and colonies, is appointed minister of foreign affairs in the room of the duke de Broglie.

Vice admiral baron Roussin, ambassador at Constantinople, is named minister of the marine in the room of admiral de Rigny, who, however, will continue to exercise the functions of his late office till the arrival of admiral Roussin.

M. Martin du Nord, deputy and advocate general of the court of Cassation, is appointed procureur general of the royal court in the room of M. Persil.

It will be seen, therefore, that the ministers who retain their previous offices are Marshal Soult, president of the council and minister of war; M. Humann, minister of finance; and M. Guizot, minister of public instruction.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The government had decided to interfere in the affairs of Portugal. Ten thousand Spanish troops were to enter that country, on the 1st of April, in two divisions, under the command of generals Morillo and Rodil. They are to proceed to Santarem and join the army of Don Pedro. General Rodil will be commander-in-chief of the combined armies.

Admiral Napier took Camina, by surprise, on the 24th March; he landed with 500 troops which he brought from Lisbon.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

There were rumors that the Turkish army was recruiting with extraordinary activity in Moldavia and Wallachia; that Nicholas had sent to Achmet Paacha 1,000,000 ducats, proceeding from the debt of Turkey to Russia, that he had granted the sultan eight years to pay off his debt; that a serious revolt had broken out in Bagdad and Kurdistan; that Constantinople was in a most deplorable condition, and nothing but a miracle could save the Ottoman empire.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

May 2. Mr. Clay, from the committee of public lands, to which had been referred the bill appropriating, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, reported the same with amendments. He also made a detailed report, purporting to be an answer to the veto message of the president of the United States, on returning the land bill of the last session of congress, with his objections.

Mr. Clay moved that 5,000 additional copies of the report be printed, and that it be made the order of the day for next Monday week.

Mr. Forsyth wished to hear the report read. He could not consent to the printing so large an edition of a document, with the contents of which he was unacquainted.

The report was then read in part, and its further reading dispensed with.

Mr. Moore moved to lay it on the table, and this motion being lost, the question recurred on the printing of the report.

A debate then ensued, in which Messrs. Forsyth, Clay, Moore, Poindexter, Black, King and Shepley, took part, after which the question on printing was taken, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Shepley, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggoner, Webster—32.
NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, White, Wright—9.

Mr. Southard submitted the following resolutions, which lie one day on the table:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate the weekly and monthly reports and statements of the bank of the United States, and also those of the banks which have been selected as places of deposit for the public moneys which have been received at the treasury department since the first day of February last; and that he be further directed to communicate to the senate such reports and statements of said banks which he shall hereafter receive, as soon as conveniently may be, after the same shall have been received.

Resolved, That the committee of finance be directed to inquire whether any, and which, of the banks selected by the secretary of the treasury, for the deposit of the public moneys, have stopped payment; the amount of public money deposited in them at the time of their suspension, if any—that they inquire, also, into the circumstances attending their selection, and the security taken by the secretary; and whether the public moneys are safe in the places where they are now deposited; and that they have leave to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Webster presented the memorial of a large number of respectable merchants praying that the legal value of gold may be made to correspond with its real value, and that the coins of other countries, at proper rates, may be made a legal tender.

Mr. Ewing presented a memorial signed by 1,750 inhabitants of Ross county, Ohio, praying the restoration of the deposits and the recharter of the bank, which was read, referred, &c.

Mr. Tipton reported the bill to authorise the people of the territories of Michigan and Arkansas, to form constitutions and state governments, with amendments; which were read.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after remaining some time in secret session, the doors were opened, when the senate adjourned.

May 3. Mr. Silsbee presented a memorial from the district of New Bedford, Massachusetts, comprising the town of New Bedford and other places, signed by upwards of 1,900 persons. This memorial expresses, in strong terms, the disapprobation of the signers to the removal of the deposits, and ascribes their present suffering condition to that act.

Mr. Forsyth made a comparison of the price of oil and some other articles, and said the cry of distress, which had reached congress, had been gotten up for mere party purposes.

Mr. Webster replied at length to Mr. Forsyth, and an animated debate ensued, in which Messrs. Chambers, Knight, Porter, Silsbee, Sprague, Ewing and Poindexter participated; and the memorial was finally read, referred, &c.

Mr. Poindexter moved to postpone the special order until Monday, which was agreed to.

Mr. Hendricks moved a resolution, which was agreed to, inquiring into the expediency of making an appropriation to pay for blankets furnished the militia of Michigan in the late war against Black Hawk.

Mr. Sprague offered the following resolution, which lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate, a statement of the amount of fees accruing in each collection district in the United States, in each year, since January 1, 1823, the amount of fees paid at the treasury in each year, by those collectors whose fees have amounted to more than the maximum allowed them by law—the names and number of clerks and deputies employed by each collector, who has received such excess of fees—the time when they were employed and the amount paid each in each year. Also, a statement of the contingent expenses of each office where such excess of fees has been received; whether any allowances have been made to officers of the customs for travelling expenses, and, if so, the names of such officers and the times when such expenses were incurred. And, also, a statement of the names of persons who hold, or have held, several offices in the customs at the same time, since January 1, 1823, with the date and time of continuance of their appointment, and the amount of pay which they have received from each office which they have so held, during the period aforesaid.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth, the senate then adjourned.
May 5. A message was received from the president of the U. States, answering the call for information relative to the sales of public lands; and

On motion of Mr. Clay it was ordered to be printed.
The chair announced a communication from the war department, showing the expenditures of that department, together with the unexpended balances of appropriations.

The resolutions moved by Mr. Southard, on Friday, relative to the deposit banks, were taken up, amended, and agreed to.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. Poindexter, on the president's protest as modified by Mr. Clay.

The question being on Mr. Bibb's amendment—
Mr. Wright addressed the senate in defence of the protest, and in opposition to the amendment, until near 3 o'clock, when Mr. Calhoun rose and moved that the senate adjourn—but gave way to allow Mr. Clay to make a few remarks in reply to Mr. Wright.

On motion of Mr. Poindexter the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after being a short time engaged therein adjourned.

May 6. Several resolutions relative to private claims being successively submitted, and petitions presented and disposed of.

The senate on motion of Mr. Poindexter, proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolutions on the subject of the president's protest, as modified by Mr. Clay.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Bibb—
Mr. Calhoun rose, and addressed the senate for about an hour, in opposition to the power assumed by the president; and to the amendment.

Mr. Bibb then withdrew his amendment; and
Mr. Forsyth then moved to amend the resolutions, by striking out all after the word "resolved," in the first resolution, and inserting:

"That the message of the president, protesting against the resolution of the senate of the 25th of March, be entered on the journal, according to his request.

"Resolved, That, leaving to the states to whom the senate is alone responsible, to judge whether the resolution complained of is, or is not, within the constitutional competency of this body, and called for by the present condition of public affairs, an authenticated copy of the original resolution, with a list of the yeas and nays, of the president's message, and of these resolutions, be prepared by the secretary, and transmitted by the vice president to the governor of each state of the union, to be by him laid before the legislature at their next session, as the only authority authorized to judge upon the opinions and conduct of the senators respectively."

Mr. Poindexter called for the yeas and nays and they were ordered.

Mr. Calhoun then moved to amend the original resolutions by adding the two following resolutions:

Resolved, That the president of the United States has no right to send a protest to the senate against any of its proceedings.

Resolved, That the senate do not receive the protest of the president.

Mr. Forsyth finally withdrew his amendment for the present, to allow the question to be taken on Mr. Calhoun's resolutions.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, when—
Mr. Forsyth addressed the senate in opposition thereto, in defence of the president and in reply to Mr. Calhoun. He was followed by Messrs. Poindexter, Preston and Webster.

Mr. Webster requested a division of the two resolutions, and the question being taken on the first resolution, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggoner, Webster—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Shepley Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—17.

Mr. Clayton having requested it, Mr. Calhoun consented to withdraw his second resolution; but the chair decided, as the yeas and nays had been ordered, it could not be withdrawn, without the unanimous consent of the senate, and Mr. Forsyth objected.

Mr. Clay then moved to lay it on the table, which motion the chair also decided to be out of order, whereupon an appeal was had from the decision of the chair and the senate sustained the decision.

The question was then taken on Mr. Calhoun's second resolution and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clayton, Ewing, Leigh, Naudain, Poindexter, Robbins—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Black, Brown, Brown, Clay, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Shepley, Silsbee, Smith, Swift, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Webster, White, Wilkins, Wright—34.

After some conversation between Messrs. Forsyth, Calhoun and Poindexter,

Mr. Forsyth moved his amendment, as a substitute for the original resolutions, and the question being taken thereon, appeared as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Webster—24.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate then adjourned.

May 7. The chair announced a communication from the treasury department, in relation to the fees and emoluments of officers of the customs.

Mr. Clay submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report, as soon as practicable, to the senate, the amount of duties received and accrued on foreign imports during the first quarter of the year 1834, with a table showing the comparative amount of the year 1833, and distinguishing between the amounts accrued or received at each port.

Resolved, That he communicate to the senate, whether any thing has happened since his annual report was made, at the commencement of the present session of congress, to vary, in his opinion, the estimate contained in the said report, of the proceeds of the duties on foreign imports, for the year 1834.

The bill making an appropriation for the completion of the road from the point opposite to Memphis to Little Rock, in the territory of Arkansas, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Frelinghuysen, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions of Mr. Poindexter, as modified by Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun; when

Mr. Webster addressed the senate for about two hours and three quarters.

Mr. Benton spoke in reply to the arguments which had been brought forward against the protest.

Mr. Poindexter said he had wished to deliver his sentiments; but that his desire to proceed to the legislative business was such that he would forbear. He was willing to rest his vote on the arguments which had already been offered, and in none with more confidence than in the arguments the senate had to-day heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts, for which he accorded to that gentleman his sincere thanks.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the resolutions.

Mr. Forsyth asked for a division of the question, and expressed a desire to make some remarks.

Mr. Brown moved that the senate adjourn.

Mr. Clay asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The motion to adjourn was negatived, yeas 12 nays 27.

Mr. Forsyth then spoke at length in reply to Mr. Webster.

Mr. Webster briefly rejoined.

The question was then taken on the resolutions separately, when they were decided in the affirmative, as follows, the vote being the same on each of the four resolutions:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright—16*

So the resolutions were agreed to, in the following form:

Resolved, That the protest communicated to the senate on the 17th instant, by the president of the United States, asserts powers as belonging to the president, which are inconsistent with the just authority of the two houses of congress, and inconsistent with the constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That while the senate is, and ever will be, ready to receive from the president all such messages and communications as the constitution and laws and the usual course of business authorise him to transmit to it, yet it cannot recognise any right in him to make a formal protest against votes and proceedings of the senate declaring such votes and proceedings to be illegal and unconstitutional, and requesting the senate to enter such protest on its journals.

Resolved, That the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of the senate, and that it be not entered on the Journal.

Resolved, That the president of the U. States has no right to send a protest to the senate against any of its proceedings.

Mr. Poindexter gave notice that he should on Friday call up the report of the committee on the Rhode Island election. The senate then adjourned.

May 8. Mr. Kane said he was unexpectedly absent when the vote was taken yesterday on the resolutions on the subject of the president's protest; and asked permission to record his vote on these resolutions.

Messrs. Clayton and Moore objected to the indulgence on the ground that it would be violative of a rule of the house, and reminded the gentleman, that during the last session, gentlemen who were absent on the passage of the force bill, were denied the privilege of recording their votes.

* Absent on these votes—Messrs. Chambers, of Md. Mangum, of N. C. Morris, of O. and Robinson and Kane, of Illinois.

The motion was rejected without a division.

Mr. Benton presented a memorial from Boston, signed by upwards of 2,000 persons, opposed to the bank of the United States and to the restoration of the deposits. Read, referred, &c.

The senate then took up the Cumberland road bill, which was read, amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Kane, Kent, Linn, McKean, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Forsyth, Hill, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Preston, Shepley, Tyler, White—13.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after being some time engaged therein, the doors were opened, and then the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, May 1. While Mr. Foot's motion was pending in committee of the whole, to reduce the item of the general appropriation bill which makes an appropriation of $36,000 for the salaries of ministers to Great Britain, France, Spain and Russia to $18,000 with a view to exclude the appropriations for Great Britain and Russia.

Mr. Adams, of Mass. replied at large to the remarks of Messrs. Wayne and Polk, and insisted on the necessity of some pledge that the nominations for the two courts referred to last, would be made during the session.

Mr. Archer gave the reply of the secretary of state to an inquiry on that subject; on which Mr. Adams commented with much humor and severity.

Mr. Coulter was willing to vote for the appropriation of a mission to Russia, but was opposed to the item for England, because a similar appropriation had twice been made already, and the executive had not responded to the overture of the legislature.

Mr. H. Everett put a question to Mr. Archer, the object of which was to elicit a disclaimer on the part of the executive, of any purpose of appointing a minister to England after congress should have adjourned.

Mr. Archer disavowed any power to answer on the part of the president, but presumed no such appointment would be made, as he could not deem it constitutional.

Mr. Binney considered the response from the department of state as tantamount to a declaration that no nomination would be made to the senate; and he was, therefore, for striking out the item.

Mr. Beardsley, of New York, insisted that the president had the whole appointing power; though under certain circumstances he must have the advice of the senate. An appointment made in recess was as valid as during the session; and a person so appointed would hold his office to the close of the succeeding session though the senate should reject him. He opposed the amendment.

Mr. Reed, of Mass. replied with severity on the pretensions set up by Mr. Beardsley, for the president.

The motion to strike out Great Britain was rejected as stated in the last Register, page 152.

The reading of the bill then proceeded until that clause was reached which provides for charge des affaires to Portugal, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Turkey, Belgium, Brazil, Buenos Ayres, Chili, Peru, Mexico, Central America and New Granada, $58,000.

Mr. Adams inquired of Mr. Archer, as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, why these items had been inserted for Belgium and Buenos Ayres, and the other South American states. He wanted information on the state of our relations with those countries.

Mr. Wilde adverted to the lateness of the hour, and moved that the house now adjourn, and the house accordingly adjourned.

Friday, May 2. After several bills of a private or local character had been disposed of,

The house again proceeded to the consideration of the general appropriation bill, as in committee of the whole; when

Mr. Adams went into a full explanation of the grounds on which he had requested from the chairman of the committee on foreign relations, an exposition of the reasons why appropriations were asked for keeping up diplomatic relations with Belgium, Buenos Ayres and the South American states.

Mr. Archer, in reply, went into a very full and satisfactory expose of the state of our relations with the states to which Mr. Adams's inquiry had reference.

The bill having been gone through with and amended, and no further amendments being offered, on motion of Mr. Polk, the house adjourned till Monday next.

Monday, May 5. Mr. Osgood, of Mass. called up the resolutions and letter of instructions from his district, signed by 4,600 persons, instructing him to vote for the restoration of the deposits. Mr. O. entered into an explanation of his reasons for declining to comply with the instructions of his constituents.

Memorials, resolutions, &c. favorable to the restoration of the deposits were presented, as follows: by Mr. Adams, of Mass. from sundry merchants, mechanics and others of Detroit, Michigan; by Mr. Burges, from artisans and Mechanics residing in nearly all the towns of Rhode Island, also resolutions adopted in a convention of mechanics and artisans assembled from various towns in the same state; by Mr. Huntington, from sundry inhabitants of Newtown, Connecticut; by Mr. Hall, from 1,723 freemen of the county of Windham, Vermont; by Mr. Stade, from sundry citizens of the 3d congressional district of the state of Vermont; by Mr. Heman Allen, from the young men of the city of Burlington, Vermont; by Mr. Dickson, from inhabitants of Ontario county, New York; by Mr. Fuller, from 1,800 inhabitants of Livingston county, New York; by Mr. Selden, of New York, from 6,000 inhabitants of Oneida county, in that state; all which memorials, &c. (with the exception of the one presented by Mr. Dickson, of New York), were read, referred, &c.

Memorials, resolutions, &c. favorable to the removal of the deposits, were presented by Mr. Osgood, of Mass. from 3,072 citizens of Boston; by Mr. Pearce, (three memorials) from sundry places in Rhode Island; by Mr. Clarke, from sundry citizens of the state of New York; by Mr. Lawrence, from working men, mechanics, and others, in the city of New York; and by Mr. Webster, from inhabitants of Onondago county, New York; which were severally read, referred, &c.

Mr. Gorham, of Mass. presented a memorial from sundry merchants in Boston, praying that foreign coins may be made a legal tender; which was read, referred, &c.

Mr. Selden, of New York, moved that a committee, consisting of one member from each state, be appointed to consider and report, in form of a bill, a plan for a safe and uniform currency, under authority of the United States.

The speaker said, that could only be done by permission of the house.

Mr. Selden asked permission of the house; but objections being made, he moved a suspension of the rules—there being no quorum, however, the motion of Mr. S. stands over till Monday next—and the house adjourned.

Tuesday, May 6. Mr. Stewart reported a bill to extend the improvement of steamboat navigation.

Mr. Gartland, of Lou. moved three resolutions, the first inquiring into the propriety of appointing a judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of the state of Louisiana; the second for making an appropriation in lands or money for constructing levees on the banks of the Mississippi and Red rivers; and the third for appropriating money or land to remove the raft in the river Atchafalaya; which resolutions were severally agreed to.

Mr. Seaborn Jones obtained leave and made a report in the case of the contested election between Mr. Letcher and Mr. Moore, of Kentucky, which he moved to have read, laid on the table and printed, with the accompanying documents.

The report is of a voluminous character, detailing at length the proceedings taken by the committee to investigate the votes received, and concludes by stating, that it appeared to them, that the number of legal votes stood—

For Mr. Moore	3,099
For Mr. Letcher	3,055

Leaving a majority for Mr. Moore of 44

Whereupon, they report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Thomas P. Moore be declared entitled to his seat as representative for the 5th congressional district of Kentucky.

Resolved, That R. P. Letcher, in consideration of the expenses to which he has been subjected, is entitled to receive remuneration, at the rate of eight dollars per diem, and a similar sum, as viaticum, for every twenty miles.

Mr. Jones moved that the consideration of the report be made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. Banks moved that the evidence taken before the committee be printed.

Mr. Jones, of Ge. declined accepting the motion as a modification, and objected to the printing of the evidence, on the grounds of delay and expense. What use, he asked, were the labors of the committee, if the votes were to be again canvassed by the house.

Mr. Hardin, of Kentucky, thought the evidence should be printed; that the papers were extremely illegibly written. It was necessary that the house should examine this testimony for itself, and asked, how it was possible to do so in manuscript taken down in such illegible characters? The necessity of such printing and examination would be manifest to the house, when it was known that many of the votes had been excluded, not on questions of law, but on contested statements as to facts.

Mr. Hardin then proceeded to make some remarks on the construction of the committee. He did not impute improper designs in such construction, but thought it an unfortunate one; and, on that account, appealed to the magnanimity of the house.

Mr. Wilde said he had the duty of a judge to perform, and he would not consent to undertake it, if the evidence on which his judgment was to be formed was withheld from his inspection. The house had ordered the committee to report the evidence to the house, and they had not done so; nor did they offer any excuse for not doing it.

Mr. Jones replied with warmth to the remarks of Mr. Hardin, and a lone and angry debate ensued, abounding in personalities of a painful nature between them. Messrs. Wilde and Vanderpoel also participated in the debate, which occupied the house till near 5 o'clock. It was finally decided, that the report, all the testimony, together with lists of the names of the disputed voters, &c. should be printed. The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, May 7. Mr. Gamble submitted the following resolution which was laid on the table for one day, as required by the rules:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to this house the whole number of cadets that have been admitted to the military academy at West Point since its first organization to the present time; how many are there at present; the number that have graduated; how many have been commissioned, and are now in commission, in the army, and the number that is necessary to be kept there to supply the vacancies that ordinarily occur in the army; also, the number of supernumerary cadets with the rank of lieutenant, who are in the pay of the government, and not in command.

The engrossed bill, to extend the time for carrying into effect the convention with France, being on its final passage, Mr. McKay wished to have some information on the subject from the chairman of the committee for foreign affairs.

Mr. Archer replied, and called for the reading of the report from the secretary of the commission, and contended for the necessity of continuing the commission in order that they might prepare and adjudicate correct statements of the claims.

Mr. McKay considered the refusal of the chamber of deputies to make an appropriation to carry into effect the treaty, to be equivalent to a declaration that they would not execute any part of the treaty, and therefore thought a postponement of the bill necessary, that time might be allowed to ascertain to what this refusal might lead; for if it turned out that there would not be any prospect of the treaty being fulfilled by the government of France, there could not be any propriety at all in continuing the commission beyond its present legal term.

Mr. Burges considered an extension of the time necessary, the rejection by the chambers of the appropriation was on the ground that it was too large. The commissioners, he had no doubt, would ascertain the amount of claims to be more than four times the stipulated amount.

Messrs. Burringer, Wilde, Reed, Williams and Wayne expressed their views.

Mr. J. Q. Adams did not consider the act of the French chamber as a refusal to carry into effect the provisions incumbent upon their nation, by a treaty solemnly ratified. It was only a refusal for a time, to make the appropriation. He coincided in the opinion, that, instead of suspending on our part, we were the more bound to go on with the commission, and ascertain the amount of claims which our citizens had to prefer.

The bill was then passed and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The general appropriation bill was then taken up, and nearly the whole of the thirty-five amendments reported from the committee of the whole were concurred in without debate. The proviso allowing to the commercial agent at Algiers the same salary as is now paid to the consuls on the Barbary coast, was resisted and finally rejected.

The amendments reported by the committee having been gone through with,

Mr. Vance again moved the list of items for the retrenchment of salaries and pay of members of congress; but before any progress was made therein, the house adjourned.

Thursday, May 8. After the usual morning business, On motion of Mr. Polk, the house proceeded to the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

The question being on the retrenchment amendment moved by Mr. Vance—

Mr. Vance supported his amendment in a speech of considerable length.

He was followed by Messrs. Wardwell, of N. York, Leavitt, of Ohio, Miller, of Pa. and Bynum, of North Carolina, who opposed his amendment, and defended the course of the administration.

The latter gentleman warmly eulogised the president as having fulfilled his pledges to the south in putting down internal improvements, the tariff, and the bank of the United States.

Mr. Chilton replied to Mr. Bynum, and referred to pledges given in the west by the president, in favor of internal improvements and the tariff.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Vance, Bates, Ewing and Lincoln, and without coming to a decision upon Mr. Vance's amendment, after three times refusing to sustain calls for the previous question the house adjourned.

GREAT AERONAUTIC EXPEDITION.

The circumstances attending the second splendid balloon ascension of Mr. Mills, on Thursday afternoon, (May 1), render it one of the most lengthened and interesting aeronautic expeditions ever made. We mentioned in yesterday's paper the particulars of his departure from Fairmount, and the apparent course he had taken; and are now enabled to supply some very interesting details of his long and rapid flight through the upper regions. His first course, after ascending, was about south east, but in a short time a counter current of air wafted him in an opposite or westerly direction, immediately over the city. His flight westward was only as far as a point above the long bridge over the Patapsco, when he encountered an adverse current which carried him back again in an easterly course.

During all this time Mr. Mills continued to rise, by occasionally throwing out ballast. His compass now proved of no service to him, from the constant rotary motion which the balloon assumed, first swinging round in one direction, and then revolving in a contrary one. The course of the balloon was eastwardly. At forty minutes after five, Mr. M. encountered a violent snow storm, with the thermometer down to 34. Besides being obliged to endure its peltings, he was subjected to a thorough drenching from the melted snow, which thawed as it fell on the balloon, and ran down from its neck into the car immediately under it. At the same time, also, a body of clouds passed beneath him, and he lost sight of the earth altogether. The storm, however, soon passed off, and except the drenching, left him unharmed.

At six o'clock he had attained his greatest elevation, which, according to his estimate and the indications of the barometer, was upwards of two miles! The thermometer was now down to 33 deg., or only one degree above freezing point. Mr. M. all the while was going eastwardly, passing over the light houses at North Point, and across the expanse of the Chesapeake bay towards Kent county, on the Eastern Shore. He had now had recourse to his valves, and was gradually descending. After having passed into Kent county about half a mile, he made preparations to land, and had descended within about five hundred feet of the earth, when the balloon was taken by a sudden and violent gust or current of wind from the east. This was at 35 minutes after six. In an instant after the wind struck the balloon, it was driven with the swiftness of an arrow, and in the short space of seventeen minutes, he was carried back to North Point, a distance of fourteen miles across the Chesapeake bay! Now, as heretofore, Mr. M. preserved an undisturbed coolness and self-possession, and as he was careering across the waters with the swiftness of the wind itself, he discharged gas enough to bring him within two hundred feet of the surface. As the anchors struck the water they rebounded with a force that gave him a pretty distinct notion of the rate at which he was travelling. As soon as he came over the land at North Point, the wind greatly abated, and at ten minutes before seven he effected a safe landing on the farm of Mr. Lyde Goodwin, from whom and his family he received every assistance in securing his balloon and apparatus in perfect order.

Thus terminated this most extraordinary aerial voyage, prosecuted for three hours, to the distance of about fifty miles, and for the greater part at an elevation of one to two and a quarter miles. After this feat, Mr. Mills, who, it should be borne in mind, is a young mechanic of Baltimore, self taught, and dependent alone on his own unaided efforts, may fairly take rank with the most successful aeronauts of the age.

The following table shows the observations made by Mr. Mills on the barometer and thermometer, at various periods during his voyage. He left Fairmount at ten minutes before four o'clock, P. M.

COMPLIMENT TO JUDGE PORTER.

At a meeting of the friends and countrymen of the hon. Alexander Porter, of the United States senate, held on the 25th inst. pursuant to public notice, at the Indian Queen hotel, South Fourth street, James Gowen, esq. was called to the chair, and Dr. McHenry appointed secretary. The report of the committee which had addressed to Mr. Porter an invitation to a public dinner, was then received, and the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the reply of the hon. Alexander Porter to the committee, has the entire approbation of this meeting, and that, together with the letter of invitation, it be published in such of our daily papers as are friendly to the sentiments it contains.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to wait on the hon. Alexander Porter, for the purpose of expressing to him our regret that the state of his health should be such as to oblige him to decline the invitation, and also to convey to him our sincere wish for its speedy restoration, and our hope, that when the adjournment of congress shall release him from his public duties, he will revisit our city, and afford us another opportunity of manifesting to him those feelings of regard, which shall be as abiding as the recollection of the virtues of his patriotic father, or the appreciation of his own merits.

Whereupon the following gentlemen were appointed the committee, viz:

James Gowen, James McHenry,
William Ferris, Samuel Black.

The meeting then adjourned.

JAMES GOWEN, chairman.
JAMES McHENRY, secretary.

The following is the letter of invitation:

Philadelphia, April 23, 1834.

Hon. Alexander Porter:

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, residents of Philadelphia, your countrymen by birth, and your fellow citizens by adoption, impelled by a variety of motives, all tending to impress upon us the highest regard for your character, seize on the occasion of your sojourn amongst us, to make some manifestation of our feelings towards you. Among these motives we would particularly advert to one, peculiarly impressive, namely, the deep veneration we entertain for the memory of your illustrious father, who so zealously and fearlessly, in times of unexampled trial and peril, devoted his splendid talents and unwearied energies to the cause of our beloved country—the cause of civil and religious liberty; to which having fallen a willing martyr, he now occupies, and shall forever occupy, a place in the affections of his countrymen, with the imperishable names of Orr, Tone and Fitzgerald, and the ever to be lamented Robert Emmet.

In addition to the feelings inspired by these peculiar and affecting circumstances, we are led by a just sense of those merits which induced the patriotic state of Louisiana to place you as a member in the noblest institution ever established by freemen for the protection of law and liberty—the senate of the U. States—and of the ability and propriety of your course in that body, to invite you to partake of a public dinner to be given on whatever day may best suit your convenience, and which it may please you to designate.

We are, respectfully, your friends and countrymen,

JAMES GOWEN, JOHN MAITLAND,
ALEXANDER COOK, CHARLES JOHNSON,
WILLIAM FERRIS, JAMES McHENRY,
JOHN WATERS,

THE REPLY.

Philadelphia, April 24, 1834.

GENTLEMEN: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of yesterday, inviting me to a public dinner, to be given in this city at such time as may best suit my convenience.

I receive, gentlemen, with deep sensibility, this mark of your regard, enhanced as it is by the terms in which you have thought proper to convey it. It is dear to me as coming from men who, like myself, claim Ireland as their birth place, and doubly dear to me because it shows that neither time or change of country can erase from their warm and affectionate hearts the remembrance of those who perished in an ineffectual, but noble struggle, to obtain for them, in the land of their birth, that freedom which the generous institutions of this country have bestowed on them here. The touching allusion you have made to my father, fills me with emotions which you can easily understand, but which I should in vain attempt to portray. The best return I can make you, for the tribute you pay to his memory, is to assure you, that as in all past times his example has animated me, so I shall to the end, I trust, keep the recollection of his virtues steadily in view, and endeavor to emulate them.

But I am still prouder, fellow citizens, of your approbation, when I see, that while true to the ties which bind virtuous men to the land of their birth, you are alive to the paramount duties you owe to the country which has adopted you. You have thought proper to allude in terms of approbation to the course I have pursued in that august body in which the confiding kindness of the patriotic people of Louisiana has placed me. I claim, however, no other merit than to have faithfully pursued there the course of conduct which my judgment dictated in the present alarming and unprecedented posture of our public affairs. Embarked, as I believe the senate of the United States now is, in a severe, but as I trust in God the event will prove, not an unsuccessful contest against the encroachments of executive power, I should be false to every principle which has hitherto guided me in life, if I were not found in this battle ranged on the side of the constitution and the law. And your approbation, fellow citizens, though it gratifies, does not surprise me. In every period of American history, Irishmen have been found the strenuous supporters of liberal principles; and though in the eagerness with which, impelled by an ardent temperament, they have pursued their object, they may have sometimes mistaken the best means to attain it, and have given to the heart, what the head could not always approve, no such imputation can rest on them now, when they are seen ready to sacrifice their former attachments, to the call which the best interests of their country makes on their patriotism.

It would indeed, fellow citizens, have been a source of much more satisfaction to me to have been enabled to approve the measures of the present administration of the general government, than to find myself compelled to oppose them. The various matters, however, on which my judgment has concluded its course to be erroneous, dwindle into comparative insignificance, to the objections I entertained to the powers claimed by the president, for the executive department of the government, in a late paper bearing his signature, and called by him a protest. By that document we learn, that the president of the United States claims the right to hold under his control the public money, contrary to the will of a majority of the American people, or of their representatives in the two houses of congress. It is true this power is not asserted by him in these words, but what he does assert is identical with this proposition, and cannot be separated from it. For having now obtained the public moneys, by removing the deposits from the United States bank, he says they can only be taken from him by a new law, which shall regulate their disposition for the future. To the enactment of such a law his own sanction is necessary, if it be passed by a majority, and not by two-thirds of the senate and of the house of representatives. And if he is dissatisfied with its provisions, or unwilling to relax his grasp, he can and will veto it. So it is plain that he does virtually maintain the existence of a right in himself to hold the purse of the republic, contrary to the will of a majority of both houses of congress.

This cannot be in my judgment the true meaning of the constitution of the United States. The illustrious men who framed that instrument, knew too well by the experience of the past, that the future would be most wretchedly provided for, if such a power was vested in any one man. The fatal error into which the president has been led, is to consider himself the depository and guardian of the public money, until a law be passed to deprive him of it; while it is clear on the contrary, that until a law is enacted giving him such power, he cannot constitutionally exercise any control over the people's money. I regard, therefore, the doctrine lately put forward by him, as unsound in principle, and leading to consequences which no patriot can contemplate without dismay. In conjunction with the enlightened statesmen now in the senate of the United States, I shall, may be assured, fellow citizens, be found firmly resisting by all constitutional means such an extraordinary assumption of authority. The necessity for a vigorous resistance to it, is not diminished by conceding, that the chief magistrate has not the evil intention of destroying the liberties of his country. On the contrary, the more virtuous the man who, through the influence of false councils and violent passions, sets a bad example, the more dangerous the precedent becomes for posterity.

The state of my health, which is the cause of my present visit to your city, forbids me to accept the invitation you have been so kind as to convey to me. I pray you to express to those whom you represent, the regret I feel at my inability to meet them, and accept my thanks for the obliging manner in which you have conveyed their wishes.

I remain with great respect, your friend and obedient servant,
ALEX. PORTER.

To Messrs. James Gowen, John Maitland, Alex. Cook, Charles Johnson, Wm. Ferris, James McHenry, John Waters, &c.

ELECTIONEERING

OR THINGS TO BE LAUGHED AT.

The following with all its italics, CAPITALS and notes of admiration!!! is copied from a late number of that solemn, "Minerva-bird"-like paper, the "Richmond Enquirer."

"Glorious! Glorious!! Thrice Glorious!!! GREAT WATERLOO VICTORY IN HALIFAX. I told you so. And I am certain that I shall never die contented, unless I communicate to you what a victory the Jackson and anti-bank democracy have achieved for their country. Sneed and Carrington are elected by a large majority over Bruce and Sims, the coalition candidates." "Such a victory is worth talking of: it should be published in all the journals of Washington, that Halifax, the largest county in the state, in population, and, in extent of territory, equal to senator Tyler's whole empire—that Halifax noted for the quantity and the quality of her tobacco—that Halifax which is proverbial from Baffin's bay to Cape Horn, and all along the coast of Massachusetts, has come out triumphant for the good cause."

Now this awful county, at the last census, contained 28,034 inhabitants, of whom 14,307 were persons of color—nearly 14,000 being slaves. Deduct these, and the people of this vast county, (13,727), do not equal those of some of the wards of our cities!

FRENCH CLAIMS.

The report made to the French chamber of deputies in March last, by the committee appointed to examine the convention of July, 1831, between the two nations, has been translated by order of the state department, and is published in the Washington Globe. The report concludes with a bill for carrying the convention into effect.

The French report gives a long historical account of the origin of these claims, and the various conflicting decrees and orders in council,—British and French,—by which the neutral rights of the United States were invaded by both belligerents, and under color of which so vast an amount of American property was seized and confiscated. These incidents are successively sketched from the convention of 1800, through the treaty of Louisiana in 1803; the British orders in council of 1804-5-6; the Berlin, Milan and Rambouillet Decrees of Napoleon; the embargo and non-intercourse acts of America, to the revocation of the French decrees in 1811, and the war of 1812. In all these harsh and retaliatory measures, the abstract injustice of the system of commercial warfare is frankly admitted, and quoting the language of Napoleon, it is classed with "the barbarism of the early ages."

To this follows a history of the negotiations between the two nations for adjusting the controversy, beginning with that conducted by Joel Barlow in 1812, down to the final convention of 1831, concluded by Mr. Rives.

The first official French document recognizing the right of the Americans to indemnification, is the report of the duke of Vicenza (Caulaincourt), minister of foreign affairs in 1814, just before the fall of Napoleon. The report deserves notice as containing very nearly the admissions which were made the basis of the late arrangement. The claim to indemnity for seizures made under the Berlin and Milan decrees was rejected, and the claims of the sufferers limited to seizures made after the revocation of those decrees in 1810; seizures made when the vessels captured had no knowledge of the decrees, of vessels destroyed at sea by state vessels; and the seizures made at St. Sebastians. The amount of indemnifications was put at 18,000,000 francs.

Mr. Barlow's first note in 1812, exhibited the amount at 70,000,000 francs. The president's message in that year, gave a list of 558, captured vessels; and Mr. Rives, in 1831, submitted a list of 485, which he stated to be incomplete, the value of which he estimated at $14,000,000 about the same amount as that claimed by Mr. Barlow in 1812.

The favorable reception of the American claims by Napoleon is explained by the report, by his desire to do an act of justice, and at the same time "encourage them in their efforts" in the war against Great Britain.

The fall of Napoleon and the establishment of the government of the Bourbons, changed the face of affairs. Louis and Charles set up counter pretensions, which showed their determination to avoid the payment of any portion of the claims, if possible. Their first claim was one of indemnification for a breach of treaty of 1803—by which French vessels were to be admitted into the ports of Louisiana, on the same footing with the most favored nations; but by the treaty of Ghent the English had received greater favors. The second was the peremptory plea, that the royal government was not responsible for the acts of the government of Napoleon. It would comply with contracts and pay debts, but did not consider itself bound to make reparation for acts of spoliation.

The negotiation nevertheless continued until the revolution of July, and the fall of Charles X. After that occurrence, the report proceeds to say, the government thought it "prudent and proper," seriously to resume its negotiations with the United States, "which had been raised by a long period of prosperity to an eminent rank among foreign powers, and were in a situation to make their flag respected." Hence the commission to settle the convention, and final settlement in 1831. The principle of non-responsibility for the acts of the imperial government was immediately laid aside, the justice of the general claims to indemnity, as asserted by the American government, subject to discussion and exceptions of some classes, was admitted at once, and the amount and details of indemnification were speedily settled. The exclusion of the Dutch cases, and other classes of prizes reduced the sum claimed by Mr. Barlow, and after reciprocal offers and discussions, 25,000,000 francs were agreed upon.

The rest of the report is occupied with an examination of the different classes of prizes and their amounts, in order to show that the sum of 25,000,000 francs is not more than ought to have been granted. The report concludes with a bill appropriating the necessary sum.

TREATY BETWEEN THE U. STATES AND FRANCE.

Chamber of deputies, 26th March.

The chamber took into consideration the project of law relative to the treaty between France and the United States of America.

M. Boissy d'Anglas spoke against the project. Gentlemen, he said, if the treaty, the ratification of which you are called upon to sanction by a vote of 25,000,000 francs, were useful to France—if it were based upon a principle of reciprocity, I should not hesitate to express my approbation of it; but, as far as I can see at present, the necessity of such a measure has not been demonstrated. The United States have confiscated our vessels, and have done the greatest injury to our commerce—circumstances which are not, in my opinion, sufficient to induce us to grant that government an indemnity.

General Horace Sebastiani read a discourse in favor of the project. He said that it was he who, when the minister of foreign affairs, signed the treaty, the money clauses of which are now submitted to the examination of the chamber. He reminded the chamber that even the imperial government had acknowledged the justice of these claims—at least a very large portion of them. M. De Caulaincourt, when minister, valued them at 15 to 20 millions. But at that time the emperor was approaching to his downfall, and he has left this obligation to the country to fulfil. At the restoration, when all the other powers were wresting from us, the United States alone refused the intervention of the conquerors, and did not put forward those claims until the year 1816. The then ministers declined to enter into any arrangement, on the ground of the exhausted state of the national finances, and advised an adjournment of the demand to a future period. Such was the state of the question when the revolution of July broke out. This great event cemented still more the good understanding between the two countries. The United States again brought forward their claims. The debt involved great political and commercial interests, and the king's ministers, under the influence of such considerations, did not hesitate to conclude the treaty now before you.

M. Bignon said that, in his opinion, the French government had not, in this transaction, profited as much as it might have done of the favorable position in which it found itself. The honorably added, that he did not mean to say that an indemnity should not be given, but one much less onerous than that now proposed might have been agreed upon. The hon. deputy concluded by proposing to reduce the indemnity to 12,000,000.

The minister of foreign affairs said, that the government could not be justly blamed for any delay in bringing forward this project, which had been already presented in the two preceding sessions, and its not having been discussed and voted was owing to the pressure of other business before the chamber.

M. Gay entered into a refutation of the objections made by M. Bignon.

M. Angris voted against the project, and said, if this indemnity to the American government was granted, there would be no reason to refuse others of a similar kind, which would, no doubt, be brought forward by other countries.

On the 1st April the discussion was resumed. The following are extracts from some of the speeches—

M. A. Delamartine, after some general reflections upon the imperial diplomacy, which, he said, in default of reasons made use of gend'armes, and tore the pope from the altar of St. Peter's, and the Spanish monarchs from their royal residence at Madrid, entered upon the question before the chamber, and said the only question to be decided was, if we were, or not, debtors of the United States. In his opinion, the debt was established; for during 17 years it has been under examination and discussion, and the only man whom France and the United States could choose as arbiter, general Lafayette, has declared that he most conscientiously believes that thirty millions of francs at least are due to the Americans. (Exclamations of various kinds.) The honorable deputy concluded by saying that the rejection of the project might produce a hostile disposition on the part of the Americans, and lead to the most disastrous results for our commerce.

M. Dupont made some observations with regard to the questions of public right involved in the project of law, which he voted against.

M. Duchatel expressed an opinion similar to that already put forward by some of the preceding speakers—that the advantages reaped by the Americans by the carrying trade during the war between England and France could, under no point of view, be considered as compensation for the injury done to others by the decrees of Milan and Berlin. The debt, he added, was the result of injustice—an injustice not attempted to be denied—an injustice which was not the effect of war, but which was committed in time of peace, for there was no war between France and the United States. On the other hand, the advantages said to be gained by the Americans were not of our creating, but were the results of the good fortune or favorable chance which crowned enterprises where they risked all to gain something. With regard to the importance of the cession of Louisiana, the honorable deputy observed that our rights to that territory was contested, and might not have been eventually recognized. It was therefore not any thing in possession that we gave up; we only abandoned a doubtful law suit; and what did we obtain in exchange?—a real and solid advantage, in a considerable diminution of duties upon our wines, which has led to an immense extension of our commerce. These diminutions have been, according to the various qualities of the wines from 42f. to 30f. from 21f. to 14f. and from 14f. to 8f. and these lessened duties were to have been still further diminished one-half at the end of March, 1834.

[M. Duchatel proceeded further to shew the advantages which France derived from her trade with the United States.]

M. Salvete contended that the arguments drawn from the injury that might ensue to our commerce from the rejection of the protest, appeared to him of no weight. He had, he said, a better opinion of the wisdom of the government of the United States than to suppose it would act lightly in so grave a matter, and in a fit of puerile anger, lay on additional duties on the productions of France—a proceeding which must speedily react upon the prosperity of America herself. Besides added the hon. deputy, the time is passed for waging war by means of custom house officers; duties are no longer imposed out of hatred or anger to foreign countries, but only with a view of encouraging the productions of our own. But continued the hon. deputy, what is to hinder the Americans, after being paid our 25,000,000 francs from excluding, by increased duties, our wines and silks, if they should find it their interest to do so? I do not say that this will be the case, but I merely mention the possibility of such an event, to show you that it is interest that will always regulate the conduct of a people so essentially calculating as the Americans. The hon. deputy, after having reproached the minister for foreign affairs with having designated those who should vote against the project as the cause of any future decline of our manufactures, and any public disorders resulting therefrom, concluded by voting against the project. [Cries of "question, question."]

M. Berryer requested to be allowed to put a question to the minister of foreign affairs, relative to 28 American ships which had been seized in some of the Spanish ports and confiscated. The value of these vessels and their cargoes added the hon. deputy was, according to the minister's statement, 8,000,000 francs, from which sum it figures in the 25,000,000 francs of indemnity; so that we thus give to America 8,000,000 francs, to indemnify her for the loss sustained by the confiscation of her ships by Spain. The hon. deputy proceeded to state that in the treaty of 1819, between the United States and Spain, all claims relative to these vessels were definitely and positively declared to be given up by America, and Spain for ever discharged from every demand relative to them.

By this arrangement (added the hon. deputy), America transferred the claims she might have had on France, for these prizes, to Spain, and by this treaty definitely arranged them. It therefore appears that these 8,000,000 francs, which are included in the present indemnity, are, according to this arrangement, to be paid twice over.

The minister of foreign affairs said—The answer to M. Berryer's question is very simple. The treaty of which he speaks has nothing to do with the question relative to the ships seized in the Spanish ports of St. Sebastian, Bilbao, and Passage. The history of these seizures is as follows:—On the 10th of February, 1810, an order came to bring these ships to Bayonne from the Spanish ports, where they had been seized, and into which they had been inveigled at the suggestion of the French general then commanding in that part of Spain. These vessels and their cargoes were sold at Bayonne, and the produce of the sale paid into the public treasury. The object of the treaty of 1819 was to liquidate the debts due by Spain to the United States, and not those due by France to America, arising out of facts that happened in Spain, which was then occupied by the French armies.

Mr Berryer again insisted upon his view of the subject.

The minister of foreign affairs replied—Not one of the ships for which an indemnity has been given in the treaty of 1831, now before the chamber, is alluded to by the treaty of 1810, between Spain and the United States. That treaty, therefore, has nothing whatsoever to do with the present question.

M. Mauguin began by expressing a similar opinion to that of M. Berryer, with regard to the vessels seized in Spanish ports, and the treaty of 1819. The hon. deputy, in alluding to what had been asserted in a previous part of the debate, by the minister of foreign affairs, that the government of the restoration was on the point of granting an indemnity to the government of the United States, said he would repeat an expression which, in his opinion, did honor to a man now in misfortune. The hon. deputy stated that being one of the commission charged with interrogating prince Polignac, when confined in the castle of Vincennes, he had heard him in the intervals of examination, when the members of the commission and the fallen minister were engaged in speaking on miscellaneous subjects, say on the American claims being mentioned, "Take care, I have studied that question, and we owe nothing to the United States." I repeat, he uttered this language with so profound a feeling of nationality, that I felt it impossible to resist its impression. I shall add, said the hon. deputy, that in the correspondence relative to the affairs of the east, which I have seen, the sentiments recorded there by prince Polignac, were frank, noble, and altogether worthy of a Frenchman. (Exclamations from the centre.)

The minister of foreign affairs, said that he must regret that the name of prince Polignac was introduced into the discussion. The minister added, that prince Polignac had positively admitted the right of America to an indemnity, and that what he said to M. Mauguin must have been in a general and vague manner, or otherwise would be contradiction with himself.

After a few observations from M. Isambert, which were lost amidst cries of "question," the chamber proceeded to ballot on art. 1. relative to the indemnity of 25,000,000f. The result was as follows:

Number of votes, 344. For the article, 168; against it, 176—8 majority against the article. (Prolonged sensation in the chamber.) At 6 o'clock the chamber rose.

In consequence of this result two of the ministers, the duc de Broglie, and gen. Sebastiani resigned their places. They had much excited themselves to obtain a different vote. A cabinet council was held at the Tuileries the same evening, and the ministers all present except the two who had sent in their resignations, which, it is said, an effort would be made to induce them to recall; but at the latest moment of the accounts from Paris, it had not been effectual.

It appears that the amount of the claims caused the rejection of the bill—many members having made up their minds that twelve millions of francs was an ample compensation for the real amount of losses sustained.

PUBLIC DIRECTORS—BANK UNITED STATES.

THE MESSAGE.

Washington, 11th March, 1834.

To the senate:

I nominate Henry D. Gilpin, Peter Wazer and John T. Sullivan, of Philadelphia, and Hugh McElderry, of Baltimore, to be directors in the bank of the United States, for the year 1834.

I disclaim all pretension, of right, on the part of the president, officially to inquire into, or call in question, the reasons of the senate for rejecting any nomination whatsoever. As the president is not responsible to them for the reasons which induce him to make a nomination, so they are not responsible to him for the reasons which induce them to reject it. In these respects, each is independent of the other, and both responsible to their respective constituents. Nevertheless, the attitude in which certain vital interests of the country are placed by the rejection of the gentlemen now renominated, require of me frankly to communicate my views of the consequences which must necessarily follow this act of the senate, if it be not reconsidered.

The characters and standing of these gentlemen are well known to the community, and eminently qualify them for the offices to which I propose to appoint them. Their confirmation by the senate, at its last session, to the same offices, is proof that such was the opinion of them entertained by the senate at that time; and unless something has occurred since to change it, this act may now be referred to as evidence that their talents and pursuits justify their selection.

The refusal, however, to confirm their nominations to the same offices shows that there is something in the conduct of these gentlemen, during the last year, which, in the opinion of the senate, disqualifies them, and as no charge has been made against them as men or citizens, nothing which impeaches the fair private character they possessed when the senate gave them their sanction at its last session; and as it moreover appears from the journal of the senate, recently transmitted for my inspection, that it was deemed unnecessary to inquire into their qualifications or character; it is to be inferred that the change in the opinion of the senate has arisen from the official conduct of these gentlemen. The only circumstances in their official conduct, which have been deemed of sufficient importance to attract public attention, are the two reports made by them to the executive department of the government; the one bearing date the 22d day of April, and the other the 19th day of August last; both of which reports were communicated to the senate by the secretary of the treasury, with his reasons for removing the deposits.

The truth of the facts stated in these reports is not, I presume, questioned by any one. The high character and standing of the citizens by whom they were made prevent any doubt upon the subject. Indeed, the statements have not been denied by the president of the bank, and the other directors. On the contrary, they have insisted that they were authorised to use the money of the bank in the manner stated in the two reports, and have not denied that the charges there made against the corporation are substantially true. It must be taken, therefore, as admitted, that the statements of the public directors, in the reports above mentioned, are correct; and they disclose the most alarming abuses, on the part of the corporation, and the most strenuous exertions, on their part, to put an end to them. They prove that enormous sums were secretly lavished, in a manner, and for purposes, that cannot be justified, and that the whole of the immense capital of the bank has been virtually placed at the disposal of a single individual, to be used, if he thinks proper, to corrupt the press, and to control the proceedings of the government, by exercising an undue influence over elections.

The reports were made in obedience to my official directions; and I herewith transmit copies of my letters calling for information of the proceedings of the bank. Were they bound to disregard the call? Was it their duty to remain silent, while abuses of the most injurious and dangerous character were daily practised? Were they bound to conceal from the constituted authorities a course of measures destructive to the best interests of the country, and intended gradually and secretly to subvert the foundations of our government, and to transfer its powers from the hands of the people to a great moneyed corporation? Was it their duty to sit in silence at the board, and witness all these abuses, without an attempt to correct them; or, in case of failure there, not to appeal to higher authority? The eighth fundamental rule authorises any one of the directors, whether elected or appointed, who may have been absent when an access of debt was created, or who may have dissented from the act, to exonerate himself from personal responsibility by giving notice of the fact to the president of the United States; thus recognizing the propriety of communicating to that officer the proceedings of the board in such cases. But, independently of any argument to be derived from the principle recognized in the rule referred to, I cannot doubt for a moment that it is the right and the duty of every director at the board to attempt to correct all illegal proceedings, and, in case of failure, to disclose them; and that every one of them, whether elected by the stockholders or appointed by the government, who had knowledge of the facts and concealed them, would be justly amenable to the severest censure.

But in the case of the public directors it was their peculiar and official duty to make the disclosures: and the call upon them for information could not have been disregarded without a flagrant breach of their trust. The directors appointed by the United States cannot be regarded in the light of the ordinary directors of a bank appointed by the stockholders, and charged with the care of their pecuniary interests in the corporation. They have higher and more important duties. They are public officers. They are placed at the board not merely to represent the stock held by the United States, but to observe the conduct of the corporation, and to watch over the public interests. It was foreseen that this great moneyed monopoly might be so managed as to endanger the interests of the country: and it was therefore deemed necessary, as a measure of precaution, to place at the board watchful sentinels, who should observe its conduct, and stand ready to report to the proper officers of the government every act of the board which might affect injuriously the interests of the people.

The whole frame of the charter, as well as the manner of their appointment, proves this to be their true character. The United States are not represented at the board by these directors merely on account of the stock held by the government. The right of the United States to appoint directors, and the number appointed, do not depend upon the amount of the stock; for if every share should be sold, and the United States cease to be a stockholder altogether, yet, under the charter, the right to appoint five directors would still remain. In such a case, what would be the character of the directors? They would represent no stock and be chosen by no stockholder. Yet they would have a right to sit at the board; to vote on all questions submitted to it; and to be made acquainted with all the proceedings of the corporation. They would not, in such a case, be ordinary directors chosen by the stockholders in proportion to their stock. But they would be public officers appointed to guard the public interests; and their duties must conform to their office. They are not the duties of an ordinary director chosen by a stockholder; but they are the peculiar duties of a public officer, who is bound on all occasions to protect, to the utmost of his lawful means, the public interests; and where his own authority is not sufficient to prevent the injury, to inform those to whom the laws has confided the necessary power. Such, then, is the character, and such are the duties, of the directors appointed by the United States, whether the public be stockholders or not. They are officers of the United States, and not the mere representatives of a stockholder.

The mode of their appointment, and their tenure to office, confirm this position. They are appointed, like other officers of the government, and by the same authority. They do not hold their offices irrevocably a year after their appointment; on the contrary, by the express terms of the law, they are liable to be removed from office at any time by the president, when in his judgment the public interest shall require it. In every respect, therefore, in which the subject can be considered, it is evident that the five directors, appointed by the United States are to be regarded as public officers; who are placed there in order to observe the conduct of the corporation, and to prevent abuses which might otherwise be committed.

Such being the character of the directors appointed on behalf of the United States, it is obviously their duty to resist, and in case of failure to report to the president, or to the secretary of the treasury, any proceedings of the board by which the public interest may be injuriously affected. The president may order a scire facias against the bank, for a violation of its charter; and the secretary of the treasury is empowered to direct the money of the United States to be deposited elsewhere, when, in his judgment, the public interest require it to be done. The directors of this bank, like all others, are accustomed to sit with closed doors, and do not report their proceedings to any department of the government. The monthly return, which the charter requires to be made to the treasury department, gives nothing more than a general statement of its pecuniary condition; and of that but an imperfect one. For, although it shows the amount loaned at the bank and its different branches, it does not show the condition of its debtors, nor the circumstances under which the loans were made. It does not show whether they are in truth accommodations granted in the regular and ordinary course of business, upon fair banking principles, or from other motives. Under the name of loans, advances may be made to persons notoriously insolvent, for the most corrupt and improper purposes; and a course of proceeding may be adopted, in violation of its charter, while upon the face of its monthly statement, every thing would appear to be fair and correct.

How, then, is the executive branch of the government to become acquainted with the official conduct of the public directors, or the abuses practised by the corporation for its private ends, and in violation of its duty to the public? The power of displacing the public directors, and that of issuing a scire facias, and of removing the deposits, were not intended to be idle and nugatory provisions, without the means of enforcement. Yet they must be wholly inoperative and useless, unless there be some means by which the official conduct of the public directors, and the abuses of power on the part of the corporation, may be brought to the knowledge of the executive department of the government.

Will it be said, that the power is given to the secretary of the treasury to examine, himself, or by his authorised agent, into the conduct and condition of the bank? The answer is obvious. It could not have been expected or intended that he would make an examination, unless information was first given to him which excited his suspicions; and if he did make such a general examination, without previous information of misconduct, it is most probable, that in the complex concerns and accounts of a bank, it would result in nothing, whatever abuses might have been practised.

It is, indeed, the duty of every director to give information of such misconduct on the part of the board. But the power to issue a scire facias, and to remove the deposits, presupposes that the directors elected by the stockholders might abuse their power; and it cannot be presumed that congress intended to rely on these same directors to give information of their own misconduct. The government is not accustomed to rely on the offending party to disclose his offence. It was intended that the power to issue a scire facias, and remove the deposits, should be real and effective. The necessary means of information were therefore provided in the charter; and five officers of the government appointed, in the usual manner, responsible to the public and not to the stockholders, were placed as sentinels at the board, and are bound, by the nature and character of their office, to resist, and, if unsuccessful, to report to the proper authority every infraction of the charter, and every abuse of power, in order that due measures should be taken to punish or correct it; and, in like manner, it is their duty to give, when called upon, any explanation of their own official conduct touching the management of the institution.

It was, perhaps, scarcely necessary to present to the senate these views of the power of the executive, and of the duties of the five directors appointed by the United States. But the bank is believed to be now striving to obtain for itself the government of the country; and is seeking, by new and strained constructions, to wrest from the hands of the constituted authorities the salutary control reserved by the charter. And, as misrepresentation is one of its most usual weapons of attack, I have deemed it my duty to put before the senate, in a manner not to be misunderstood, the principles on which I have acted.

Entertaining, as I do, a solemn conviction of the truth of these principles, I must adhere to them, and act upon them with constancy and firmness.

Aware, as I now am, of the dangerous machinations of the bank, it is more than ever my duty to be vigilant in guarding the rights of the people from the impending danger. And I should feel that I ought to forfeit the confidence with which my countrymen have honored me, if I did not require regular and full reports of every thing in the proceedings of the bank, calculated to affect injuriously the public interests, from the public directors. And, if the directors should fail to give the information called for, it would be my imperious duty to exercise the power conferred on me by the law, of removing them from office, and of appointing others who would discharge their duties with more fidelity to the public. I can never suffer any one to hold office under me who would connive at corruption, or who should fail to give the alarm, when he saw the enemies of liberty endeavoring to sap the foundations of our free institutions, and to subject the free people of the United States to the dominion of a great moneyed corporation.

Any directors of the bank, therefore, who might be appointed by the government, would be required to report to the executive as fully as the late directors have done, and more frequently, because the danger is more imminent: and it would be my duty to require of them a full detail of every part of the proceedings of the corporation, or any of its officers, in order that I might be enabled to decide whether I should exercise the power of ordering a scire factus, which is reserved to the president by the charter, or adopt such other lawful measures as the interests of the country might require. It is too obvious to be doubted that the misconduct of the corporation would never have been brought to light by the aid of a public proceeding at the board of directors. The board, when called on by the government directors, refused to institute an inquiry, or require an account; and the mode adopted by the latter was the only one by which the object could be attained. It would be absurd to admit the right of the government directors to give information, and, at the same time, deny the means of obtaining it. It would be but another mode of enabling the bank to conceal its proceedings, and practice, with impunity, its corruptions. In the mode of obtaining the information, therefore, and in their efforts to put an end to the abuses disclosed, as well as in reporting them, the conduct of the late directors was judicious and praiseworthy; and the honesty, firmness and intelligence which they have displayed, entitle them, in my opinion, to the gratitude of the country.

But, if I do not mistake the principles on which the senate have recently rejected them, the conduct which I deem worthy of praise, they treat as a breach of duty; and, in their judgment, the measures which they took to obtain the information, and their efforts to put an end to the practices disclosed, and the reports they have made to the executive, although true in all their parts, are regarded as an offence, and supposed to require some decisive mark of strong disapprobation.

If the views of the senate be such as I have supposed, the difficulty of sending to the senate any other names than those of the late directors, will be at once apparent. I cannot consent to place before the senate the name of any one who is not prepared, with firmness and honesty, to discharge the duties of a public director, in the manner they were fulfilled by those whom the senate have refused to confirm. If, for performing a duty lawfully required of them by the executive, they are to be punished by the subsequent rejection of the senate, it would not only be useless, but cruel, to place men of character and honor in that situation, if even such men could be found to accept it. If they failed to give the required information, or to take proper measures to obtain it, they would be removed by the executive. If they gave the information, and took proper measures to obtain it, they would, upon the next nomination, be rejected by the senate. It would be unjust, in me, to place any other citizens in the predicament in which this unlooked for decision of the senate has placed the estimable and honorable men who were directors during the last year.

If I am not in error in relation to the principles upon which these gentlemen have been rejected, the necessary consequence will be that the bank will hereafter be without government directors, and the people of the United States must be deprived of their chief means of protection against its abuses: for whatever conflicting opinions may exist as to the right of the directors, appointed in January, 1833, to hold over until now appointments shall be made, it is very obvious that, whilst their rejection by the senate remains in force, they cannot, with propriety, attempt to exercise such a power. In the present state of things, therefore, the corporation will be enabled effectually to accomplish the object it has been so long endeavoring to obtain. Its exchange committees, and its delegated powers to its president, may hereafter be dispensed with, without incurring the danger of exposing its proceedings to the public view. The sentinels which the law had placed at its board can no longer appear there.

Justice to myself and to the faithful officers by whom the public has been so well and so honorably served, without compensation or reward, during the last year, has required of me this full and frank exposition of my motives for nominating them again, after their rejection by the senate. I repeat, that I do not question the right of the senate to confirm or reject at their pleasure; and if there had been any reason to suppose that the rejection in this case had not been produced by the causes to which I have attributed it, or if my views of their duties, and the present importance of their rigid performance, were other than they are, I should have cheerfully acquiesced, and attempted to find others who would accept the unenviable trust. But I cannot consent to appoint directors of the bank to be the subservient instruments, or silent spectators, of its abuses and corruptions; nor can I ask honorable men to undertake the thankless duty, with the certain prospect of being rebuked by the senate for its faithful performance in pursuance of the lawful directions of the executive.

I repeat that I do not claim a right to inquire into, or officially to censure, the acts of the senate. But the situation in which the important interests of the American people, vested in the bank of the United States, and affected by its arrangements, must necessarily be left by the rejection of the gentlemen now renominated, has made it my duty to give this explanation to the senate, and submit the matter to their reconsideration. If it shall be determined by the senate that all channels of information, in relation to the corrupt proceedings of this dangerous corporation, shall be cut off, and the government and country left exposed to its unrestrained machinations against the purity of the press, and public liberty, I shall, after having made this effort to avert so great an evil, rest, for the justification of my official course, with respectful confidence, on the judgment of the American people.

In conclusion, it is proper I should inform the senate that there is now no government director appointed for the present year: Mr. Bayard, who was nominated and confirmed by the senate, having refused to accept that appointment.

ANDREW JACKSON.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF FINANCE ON THE MESSAGE:
In senate, May 1, 1834.

Mr. Tyler, from the committee on finance, to which was referred the message of the president of the 11th of March, renominating Henry D. Gilpin, Peter Wager, John T. Sullivan and Hugh McElerry, as directors of the bank of the United States, submitted the following report:

The committee have bestowed upon the subject the reflection which respect for the chief magistrate would at all times command. The president, at an early day of the session, submitted the nomination to the senate, of five persons, as directors of the bank of the U. States. To one of these nominations the senate assented; and the person nominated was appointed. In regard to the four others, being the same persons now renominated to the senate, no definitive decision was made until the 27th day of February, when they were each separately rejected by ayes and noes. The subjects, in the mean time, with which these nominations were in some degree connected, had undergone a full and elaborate discussion in the senate. The decision, therefore, was well calculated to satisfy the president that the senate entertained decisive objections to the confirmation of these four persons; and the journals of which the president usually sees a copy, could not fail to show that each and every one of them was rejected by a clear majority of the whole senate. The precise character of the objections taken by each and every member of the majority, or even the general character of such objections, it would be presumptuous in the committee to attempt to ascertain. They cannot be expected to go into private conference with members, and to interrogate either those of the majority or minority, upon this or any other question, as to the reasons of their votes. It must be obvious that from the constitution of the senate; from the manner of its proceedings; from the absolute right of every member to vote for or against particular nominations for reasons of his own, whether others concur with him in those reasons or not, the grounds of the votes of individual members can never be set forth, nor authentically known. The committee cannot undertake any inquiry into such grounds of individual opinion; nor do they know any form in which the senate itself, if it were so inclined; could compel individuals to state the reasons of their votes. The committee, therefore, do not suppose it proper for the senate by any proceeding to be adopted on its part, to undertake to set forth the reasons of members for rejecting these persons. It is enough that the senate in the exercise of an unquestionable constitutional right has refused its advice and consent to the nominations. This has been officially certified to the president, and the committee think there is no ground for further inquiry.

The president declines, indeed, in terms, all right to inquire into the reasons of the senate for rejecting any nomination; and yet the message immediately undertakes to infer, from facts and circumstances, what those reasons, which influenced the se-name in this case, must have been, and goes on to argue, much at large, against the validity of such supposed reasons. The committee are of opinion, that if, as the president admits, he cannot inquire into the reasons of the senate for refusing its assent to nominations, it is still more clear that those reasons cannot, with propriety, be assumed, and made subjects of comment.

In cases in which nominations are rejected, for reasons affecting the character of the persons nominated, the committee think that no inference is to be drawn, except what the vote shows; that is to say, that the senate withholds its advice and consent from the nominations. And the senate, not being bound to give reasons for its votes, in these cases, it is not bound, nor would it be proper for it, as the committee think, to give any answer to remarks founded on the presumption of what such reasons must have been, in the present case. They feel themselves, therefore, compelled, to forego any response whatever to the message of the president, in this particular, as well by the reasons before assigned, as out of respect to that high officer. The president acts upon his own views of public policy, in making nominations to the senate; and the senate does no more when it confirms or rejects such nominations. For either of these co-ordinate departments to enter into the consideration of the motives of the other would not, and could not fail, in the end, to break all harmonious intercourse between them. This, your committee would deplore as highly injurious to the best interests of the country. The president, doubtless, asks himself, in the case of every nomination for office, whether the person be fit for the office; whether he be actuated by correct views and motives; and whether he be likely to be influenced by those considerations which should alone govern him in the discharge of his duties; is he honest, capable and faithful? Being satisfied in these particulars, the president submits his name to the senate, where the same inquiries arise, and its decision should be presumed to be dictated by the same high considerations as those which govern the president, in originating the nomination. For these reasons, the committee have altogether refrained from entering into any discussion of the legal duties and obligations of directors of the bank appointed by the president and senate, which form the main topic of the message.

The committee would not feel that it had fully acquitted itself of its obligations, if it did not avail itself of this occasion to call the attention of the senate to the general subject of renomination.

The committee do not deny that a right of renomination exists; but they are of opinion, that in very clear and strong cases only, should the senate reverse decisions which it has deliberately formed and officially communicated to the president. In military and naval appointments it is possible that questions, not of personal fitness for office, but of the right of individuals to rank and grade, may arise between the president and senate; and that nominations may be rejected, pending such questions, which might properly be renewed under other laws, or a new state of circumstances. And in regard, too, to diplomatic appointments, the question may, perhaps, sometimes turn, not on the fitness of the person nominated, but on the propriety of any appointment, or of any such mission as is proposed. If new information should be given, shedding new light satisfactory to the senate, in such case it may be a proper reason for agreeing to nominations once rejected; nor will the committee say that there may not be other cases in which a person once rejected may be properly again presented to the senate. But the committee think that in a case in which the decision of the senate has been deliberately made upon the sole question of the fitness of the persons for the offices to which they are nominated, and its assent has been withheld, it ought not, without very strong and clear reasons, to change that decision upon a renomination. The committee has caused the journals of the senate to be examined in reference to the practice of renomination, and they find that, during the presidential terms of general Washington, Mr. John Adams and Mr. Jefferson, no instance of renomination to office once occurred; and yet there are not wanting instances of the rejection of nominations made by those illustrious citizens, the motives for which it would be difficult now to ascertain. To illustrate this, it is only necessary to select the case of colonel Fishburn, a gallant soldier of the revolution, who was nominated by general Washington as the collector of Savannah, and were rejected by the senate. And, although the president was obviously mortified by the decision, the nomination having been made in a great measure upon his personal knowledge of the individual, he contented himself, after the rejection, with addressing a letter to the senate, containing his reasons for the nomination of colonel Fishburn, and accompanied that message with the name of another individual.

During the administration of Mr. Madison two instances occur of renominations of the same persons to the same offices to which they had originally been nominated. Abraham Quackenbush was nominated as an ensign and rejected—renominated and confirmed. And George Brown was nominated a collector for the first collection district of Maryland; and after a rejection was renominated and confirmed. What reasons influenced the president to pursue this course in the two instances referred to, or the senate to concur in it, the committee have no means of ascertaining. During the administration of Mr. Monroe, the instances of renomination became more frequent; but several of them were nominations to military appointments, and, in a majority of the cases, no direct vote rejecting the nominations had passed the senate. The cases of renomination by Mr. Monroe, after a rejection, were James Gadsden, as adjutant general, and Nathan Towson, as colonel; Charles Vandeventer, as navy agent, and Duff Green, as receiver; all of which were rejected on their renomination. The two first nominations were purely military; and involved an interesting and difficult question of grade, and in the opinion of the president, called for the most minute and elaborate investigation. What motives impelled to the renomination of the two last, the committee cannot undertake to say. During the four years of Mr. J. Q. Adams' administration, no instance of renomination appears to have occurred; unless the nomination of Amos Binnick, whose nomination previously made by Mr. Monroe, had been postponed, and that of Peter Sally, whose nomination by Mr. Monroe, had been laid upon the table at the last day of the session, and who, at the commencement of the succeeding executive session, was again presented to the senate, are to be considered as renominations. Since the 3d of March, 1829, four instances of renominations, after rejection by the senate, have occurred. In two of these instances, the persons renominated were again rejected; in the third the nomination was agreed to; and the fourth is the case now before us.

The committee perceive, with regret, an intimation in the message that the president may not see fit to send to the senate the names of any other persons to be directors of the bank except those whose nominations have been already rejected. While the senate will exercise its own rights, according to its views of its duty, it will leave to other officers of the government to decide for themselves on the manner they will perform their duties. The committee know no reason why these offices should not be filled, or why, in this case, no further nomination should be made, after the senate has exercised its unquestionable right of rejecting particular persons who have been nominated, any more than in other cases. The senate will be ready, at all times, to receive and consider any such nominations as the president may present to it. It claims no authority to control him in his nominations, but it cannot surrender the exercise of its own right of deciding for itself on the propriety of advising and consenting to appointments to office. It cannot deprive itself of its own powers; it cannot surrender its own constitutional character; it cannot, through apprehension of any consequences whatever, forbear from exercising its high duty of giving or of refusing its advice or consent to nominations of the president, in all cases, according to its conscientious sense of its own obligations to the constitution and to the country. If these offices of bank directors remain unfilled, the fault will not be the fault of the senate. The case is like other cases of rejection. In other cases, other persons have been nominated in place of those rejected by the senate, and confirmed; and, if a different course shall be adopted on this occasion, it is a course for which the senate cannot be responsible.

Their power of withholding their assent from the president's nominations is not altogether vain and nugatory; it was given them by the constitution to be exercised in proper cases, and in their own discretion. When exercised by them, the rights of no other branch of the government are infringed or impaired; the senate has only done its own duty, and, having done this honestly and conscientiously, it cannot fear any consequences.

The committee recommend that the senate do not advise and consent to the appointment of the persons thus renominated.

The "National Intelligencer," of the 5th instant, contains nearly two columns of extracts from the executive proceedings of the senate on the nomination and renomination of the directors of the bank—of which, perhaps the following notices may be sufficient.

On the 17th December, 1833, the president nominated James A. Bayard, of Delaware, a director in the place of Sant Alley, and nominated Peter Wager, Henry D. Gilpin and John T. Sullivan, of Philadelphia, and Hugh McElderry, of Baltimore, for reappointment.

On the 19th January, 1834, the committee of finance made a report on the subject, and on the 21st the senate advised and consented to the appointment of Mr. Bayard. [The yeas and nays are not given—but we understand that Mr. B. was very generally approved.]

On the 23d January, there was a debate concerning the other persons nominated.

Again on the 10th of February when—

Mr. Kane submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the nominations of H. D. Gilpin, John T. Sullivan, Peter Wager and Hugh McElderry, be recommended to the committee on finance, with instructions to inquire into their several qualifications and fitness for the stations to which they have been nominated; also into the truth of all charges preferred by them against the board of directors of the bank of the United States, and into the conduct of each of the said nominees during the time he may have acted as director of the said bank; and that the said nominees have notice of the times and places of meetings of said committee, and have leave to attend the same.

On the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the negative—yeas 20, nays 28.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth.

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the senators present.

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Alabama, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright. Those who voted in the negative, are, Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, King, of Geo. Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster.

So the resolution was disagreed to. On the 24th February, the nominations were further considered.

On the 27th—Mr. Morris submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the nominations of H. D. Gilpin, Peter Wager, John T. Sullivan and Hugh McElderry, be again referred to the committee on finance, with instructions to inquire whether any objections whatever exist, either against their characters or qualifications to act as directors of the bank of the U. States.

On the question to agree thereto, It was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 27. The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative, are, Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King, of Alab. Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.

Those who voted in the negative, are, Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster.

So the resolution was rejected. On the question, "will the senate advise and consent to the appointment of Peter Wager?"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 20, nays 25. The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative, are, Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King, of Alab. Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.

Those who voted in the negative, are, Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Knight, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster.

[The same questions being propounded as to the other gentlemen, Mr. Gilpin was disapproved of 24 to 20; Mr. Sullivan 27 to 18, and Mr. McElderry 25 to 20.]

On the 11th of March the preceding message renominating the rejected gentlemen, was received and read. It was further considered on the 22d, and referred to the committee on finance.

May 1, the committee on finance made the report inserted above. After which—

The senate proceeded to consider the message renominating Henry D. Gilpin, and others, as bank directors.

On the question, "will the senate advise and consent to the appointment of Henry D. Gilpin, Peter Wager, John T. Sullivan and Hugh McElderry?"

It was determined in the negative, yeas 11, nays 30. The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative, are, Messrs. Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, King, of Alab. Linn, Robinson, Shepley, White, Wright.

Those who voted in the negative, are, Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, King, of Geo. Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster.*

So it was Resolved, That the senate do not advise and consent to the appointment of Henry D. Gilpin, Peter Wager, John T. Sullivan, of Philadelphia, and Hugh McElderry, of Baltimore, as directors of the bank of the United States.

Mr. Forsyth submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from all the proceedings of the senate in relation to the nomination and renomination of the directors of the bank of the United States.

On motion, by Mr. Wright, to amend the same, by inserting after the word "senate," the words and the debates—

It was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 31. On motion by Mr. Wright,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative, are, Messrs. Brown, Forsyth, Hill, Linn, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, Wright.

* Absent on this occasion—Mr. Knight, of R. I. not in the city; Mr. Tallmadge, of New York, Messrs. Wilkins and McKean, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Morris, of Ohio; Mr. Kane, of Illinois; Mr. Benton, of Missouri. The last six are friends of the administration. No reason is assigned why they did not vote on this occasion.

Those who voted in the negative, are, Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, King, of Alab. Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wilkins.

So the motion to amend was rejected. The resolution was then agreed to.

May 2, 1834. On motion by Mr. Webster. Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be authorised to give extracts from the executive journal of the proceedings of the senate in relation to the nomination and renomination of the directors of the bank of the United States for the year 1834.

On motion by Mr. Preston, Resolved, That two thousand copies of the president's message of March 11, 1834, nominating certain bank directors, and the report of the committee thereon, together with the proceedings of the senate on the first and second nomination of said directors, be printed.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

We have obtained the following authentic memorandum, exhibiting the progress of the bank, since the removal of the deposits. At the present moment, it possesses peculiar interest.

	Loans.	Public deposits.	Private deposits.	Private deposits.
Oct. 1,	60,094,292 93	9,868,435 58	8,008,852 78
Nov. 1,	57,210,604 38	8,932,311 18	7,285,041 88
Dec. 1,	54,453,104 67	5,162,260 63	6,827,173 10
Jan. 1,	54,911,461 70	4,930,509 63	6,734,666 06
Feb. 1,	54,842,973 64	3,066,561 72	6,715,312 60
March 1,	56,167,839 86	2,604,233 62	7,343,129 92
April 1,	54,806,817 62	2,932,866 74	7,166,028 21
May 1,	53,756,485 18	3,251,354 64	7,022,820 10

	Circulation.	Specie.	Debts and notes of state banks.
Oct. 1,	19,123,189 57	10,663,441 51	4,719,972
Nov. 1,	18,518,000 57	10,342,160 46	4,489,217
Dec. 1,	18,650,912 90	9,818,529 25	4,083,258
Jan. 1,	19,205,379 90	10,031,237 72	3,519,365
Feb. 1,	19,260,472 90	10,523,385 69	3,211,385
March 1,	18,523,189 00	10,385,439 15	2,035,965
April 1,	17,521,264 39	10,180,008 76	2,195,489
May 1,	16,604,147 90	11,183,774 54	3,094,787

The following is a general view of the resources and responsibilities of the bank on the 1st of May, 1834—

Circulation	16,604,147
Deposits	10,274,165
Unclaimed dividends	80,254
	26,958,566

To meet which there is—

Specie	$11,183,774
Notes of state banks	1,706,104
Balances do.	1,388,683
Funds in Europe	3,094,787
Real estate	1,650,530
Loans	2,909,076
Domestic bills	$35,212,231
Mortgages, &c.	18,544,253
	87,141
Due by the United States	53,843,625
	164,110
	72,845,892

Stockholders	45,887,325
	35,000,000
Surplus	$10,887,325

The results to be deduced from this statement are equal curious and important: 1st. The total amount of the reduction of the loans since the 1st of October, the time of the removal of the deposits, is 6,337,717 75 While the total reduction of the deposits is of public deposits 6,617,089 94 of private deposits 986,042 68

Making an aggregate of	7,603,132 62
2d. The total reduction of the notes in circulation is	2,594,041 67
3d. The increase of the specie is	520,333 03
4th. The specie of the bank is now $11,183,774 54 The notes and debts of other banks 3,094,787 00	14,278,561 54
While the notes in circulation amount to	16,604,147 90
There are other and more important considerations presented by this statement—
1st. The bank of the United States has now outstanding debts from individuals, amounting to	$53,756,485 18
And from banks, amounting to	3,094,787 00

Making a total of $56,851,272 18 The charter has yet twenty-two months to run—so that in order to close its concerns, at the end of that term, the reduction must be at the rate of two millions and a half every month. 2d. Nothing shows more clearly the strength of the bank than its present condition.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

It will be seen by our journal that the general appropriation bill has passed the house of representatives and been read, &c. in the senate. The proceedings on some of its items are very animated and highly interesting. It received its third reading in the house at about 1 o'clock on Friday night, or rather Saturday morning, after a very arduous session. The fate of this bill in the senate is very uncertain, but it is believed that many amendments, which failed in the other house, will be made to it.

It will be seen that a resolution offered by Mr. Selden, of New York, to appoint a grand committee to take into consideration the state of the currency, failed only by the casting vote of the speaker. It is reported that another serious attempt will be made to restore confidence and relieve the pressure on the public—which, if it fails, will be followed by a general disposition on the part of the opposition to adjourn, forthwith; that the members may see and commune with the people, and meet again in November next, better prepared to act on the subject.

In the wreck of public confidence, it is impossible that the body of the people should be able to make just discriminations—and one evil is the beginning of many. The late failure of the "Maryland Savings Institution," caused a severe run upon the Savings bank of Baltimore, an old and old fashioned establishment, really doing business for the benefit of the industrious and economical poor, without pecuniary profit or the hope of reward to the managers thereof; and which, from the nature of its operations, it is hardly possible should fail to meet all its engagements—never having yet lost one dollar out of the many millions of savings which have passed through it. A sudden demand, however, might embarrass even the bankers Rothschild. But the available credits or funds, of this bank were abundantly equal to the emergency, and any amount of assistance might have been had from another institution that was as able as willing to afford it, to this well managed and truly meritorious charity, if so it may be called, for the benefit which it confers on the working people. We are informed, that many who withdrew their deposits early in the morning, restored them before the closing of the bank; and it is probable that on Monday (the only day that this bank is open) the greater part of the sum drawn out will be replaced, where we think that it is quite as safe as in any man's double-locked iron chest, to say nothing of the risk and temptation that attends persons not used to the possession of considerable sums of money in their pockets; and we hope that all those who have provided something for "a rainy day" will save it, in the Savings bank. When that goes—all's gone—and credit will have "perished," indeed!

We publish the able speech of Mr. Lincoln, (who has changed places with Mr. Davis, as governor of Massachusetts and representative in congress, at the call of the people, in both cases) on the concerns of the general post office. It will be read with much interest. It was, until recently, the greatest evil which beset the American public, that the postmaster general was made a member of "the cabinet," and that party political preferences were introduced into the concerns of this department of the government. It ought to have remained as free from them as the judicial establishment! It is to the lasting credit of Mr. McLean, the predecessor of Mr. Barry, that he decidedly rejected them.

The whole business of this department "cries aloud" for "reform"—real reform. The mere money that is apparently wasted, is nothing; but the organization of its officers, into political agents in numerous instances, cannot be too severely reprehended, or carefully guarded against. We have suffered much by the sheer incompetency or rank dishonesty of some of the deputy postmasters. We care not who is in or who is out; but desire that capable and worthy men may be continued or appointed, without regard to any thing beyond a faithful performance of their several duties!

We meet with the following extract from judge Story's "commentaries," and cannot refrain from giving it a place—it was not written with a view to any existing state of things, though many may think that it was, from the closeness of its application to circumstances as they are:

"The great anomaly in the system is the enormous patronage of the postmaster general, who is invested with the sole and exclusive authority to appoint and remove all deputy postmasters; and whose power and influence have thus, by slow degrees, accumulated, until it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that it rivals, if it does not exceed, in value and extent, that of the president himself. How long a power so vast, and so accumulating, shall remain without any check on the part of any other branch of the government, is a question for statesmen and not for jurists. But it cannot be disguised that it will be idle to impose constitutional restraints upon high executive appointments, if this power, which pervades every village of the republic, and exerts an irresistible, though silent, influence in the direct shape of office, or in the no less insidious form of lucrative contracts, is suffered to remain without scrutiny or rebuke. It furnishes no argument against the interposition of a check, which shall require the advice and consent of the senate to appointments, that the power has not hitherto been abused. In its own nature, the post office establishment is susceptible of abuse to such an alarming degree; the whole correspondence of the country is so completely submitted to the fidelity and integrity of the agents who conduct it; and the means of making it subservient to mere state policy are so abundant, that the only surprise is that it has not already awakened the public jealousy, and been placed under more effectual control. It may be said, without the slightest disparagement of any officer who has presided over it, THAT IF EVER THE PEOPLE ARE TO BE CORRUPTED, OR THEIR LIBERTIES ARE TO BE PROSTRATED, THIS ESTABLISHMENT WILL FURNISH THE MOST FACILE MEANS; AND BE THE EARLIEST EMPLOYED TO ACCOMPLISH SUCH A PURPOSE."

The following also presents itself to us in one of the newspapers—it offers a picture that is too true:

The post office department of Great Britain, during the last ten years, has not sustained any loss by the defalcation of postmasters. What a reflection on our department, where these things have now become of almost daily occurrence, owing to the selection of persons for their devotion to "the party," without consulting character and honor.

Party has been oftentimes called "the madness of the many for the benefit of the few"—and so, indeed, it frequently is, even when rallied on a real or honestly believed in attachment to acknowledged principles, or established rules of action: but when built upon personal preferences or personal dislikes, "madness" stands confessed, and reason appeals to the understanding in vain. Every thing is carried by discordant and senseless noises; and thousands, after having exhausted the strength of their lungs and limbs, find themselves in the condition of poor Cuffee, when informed that it was not the rev. Mr. Whitfield who was preaching to the multitude of which he was a member; and they know and feel that they have committed very foolish, if not mischievous or wicked extravagancies, in the "madness" which had held dominion over their passions, and captivated their judgment.*

*Such immense crowds of persons attended to hear the preachings of Mr. Whitfield, that thousands, on some occasions, could not either hear nor see him; but they waited with the hope of catching some of the words that fell from his richly gifted lips. On one of these occasions, on the outer edge of the multitude, a black man was observed to be vociferating loudly and rolling himself on the ground, in a high excitement, when one of his acquaintances demanded "what was all that for?" The other spoke of it as the effect of the preaching of Mr. W. "Why you fool," said the first, "it is not Mr. Whitfield at all; he couldn't come, and Mr. — is preaching in his place." "What," exclaimed Cuffee, brushing his clothes, "all this for nothing?" or words to this effect, as the story goes.

Look at a political gathering, and you will see very many persons precisely in the state of this negro. They applaud or reject persons addressing them, without hearing or understand-

We pretend not to a total exemption from the state that we have briefly described—but, in the habit of reading, and of endeavouring to look at both sides of a question, and of regarding men as subordinate to measures, whether approved or rejected, we have been enabled, sometimes, at least, to separate persons from things, and place the merit or demerit of individual action on the character of the matter suggested or performed; and though an act may be condemned by our judgment, it is still possible, very possible, that the motive which led to it may relieve the actor from personal blame: and this happens the more easily from a serious conviction that, not having had "a view of the whole ground," or incapable, perhaps, of viewing it as we ought—after-events have demonstrated not only that the motive was honest, but that the thing itself was "necessary and proper" to be done, though it had not been so regarded by us.

With all the checks which such habits of thinking are calculated to furnish, and a certain degree of experience, we shall not deny that circumstances, (unapparent to others, in certain cases), have led, and may lead us, into indiscretions, even when writing about things—always legitimate subjects of discussion; but unless on the defensive, we still wish to respect persons, except notoriously base or desperately wicked—or stupidly ignorant of things over which they have, and exert, an unhappy and baneful influence. And even then, violence is not the indispensable precursor of victory!

We trust too, that we can make reasonable allowances even for the dominion of party—for, in early life, we honestly believed that gun-boats were the "sovereignest things in all this world" to batter ships-of-the-line into atoms! This was the "madness" of party in the many; but the now almost universally regarded European object of the influence that led us into that "madness," was a long time hidden from the view of those over whom it had nearly an absolute control; and so it may be with some, in the present state of affairs, on another and much more important subject. We have long since thought that those who started the gun-boat system had not much faith in the ability of such boats to resist ships-of-the-line—and now believe that those who organized the present opposition to the bank of the United States, never entertained an idea that a sound and convenient and wholesome currency would be sustained without the aid of a bank of the United States. Indeed, the president said that he would himself have furnished a plan for one, had he been called on for it—though now utterly opposed to any one, and demanding the establishment of a specie currency, only. The personal popularity of president Jefferson built up a fleet of "whiggle-whaggle" gun-boats—but that "experiment" cost us only a trifle, and became a subject for merriment long before the boats themselves were rotten: the personal popularity of president Jackson has so far supported his "experiment" on the currency and business of the country—but this has already cost the nation hundreds of millions on account of labor unemployed and property wasted—and plunged the whole people, as it were, from a state of unrivalled prosperity into one of unprecedented adversity—a condition far more oppressive than the season of war through which we recently passed—unless, indeed, this oppression may be compared with that which ensued after the war, for the want of such a national currency as the president seems resolved to destroy!* The dominion of the "rag barons" at the time we are just speaking of, was not a party question—nor should the present opera-ing a single word that is said—performing either operation by the direction of some who act as figlemons on such occasions. This is a great misfortune, and the fulness of party spirit. It agrees, as it were, that some cannot do anything right—that others cannot do anything that is wrong.

*We beseech those who passed through the period alluded to, to look back, and call to recollection the wide ruin that prevailed, the cruel changes of property that took place, the destitution of the laboring poor, and the agrandizement of the rich, who had money, and prudently speculated in real estate, or stocks of the United States, &c. The principle of all such operations is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

After a great effort, we cast down the "rag barons," and placed the bank of the United States and the state banks, generally, on a wholesome establishment; but we well remember the cost of it, and heartily pray that it may not be encountered again.

tions against the currency be so considered. They come too near the "hearts and homes" of the people to permit their continuance, as party measures. How many anxious days and sleepless nights have they already caused—how have they baffled the calculations of the old, and frozen the hopes of the young? What business man does not look back with mourning, and forward with fear? The past seems to have "done its worst," but the future is enveloped in the blackness of despair. Verily, verily, these are not rightful party or political matters! But such is the force of party preferences and party pride, such the organization of the public press, supported by an army of office holders, drilled like the Swiss regiments formerly in the pay of the Bourbon princes, that scores of thousands yet earnestly sustain the individual, while deeply lamenting and secretly reprobating his acts, without having the pretence of necessity to support them, and altogether inexpedient and unwise; considering also the idea of a metallic currency to be as impracticable as a present enjoyment of that peace which the millenium promises, without a total revolution in the pursuits and property, and the advancement or hopes, of every man and every woman in the United States. These are not political questions! They force upon us, (conditioned as we are), the serious consideration, whether there shall be a return to that prosperity which so lately blessed the land, and diffused a super-abundance of good things amongst us—or a retirement into a state of society closely allied to that in which men were "clothed in skins, and resided in dens and caverns."

It is not pretended that a refusal to charter the bank of the United States can produce these effects. We have reference to a carrying-out of the president's projects concerning the circulation—for the habits of the people must be changed in every respect, before they can bear the establishment of a metallic currency and live, after having so long had another, even from the early planting of these once feeble colonies which now compose the great American republic.

The expediency of the removal of the public deposits, and the manner in which that operation was performed, is rejected by thousands who stand opposed to the bank even on constitutional principles. Witness the result of the late elections in Virginia, in which state every possible effort, (honest or dishonest), was made to impress the people with a belief that the real question to be decided at the polls, was "bank or no bank"—aye, and the same persons, who, while acknowledging themselves defeated, take back all that they lately shouted, and congratulate themselves that a majority of the members of the legislature elected is opposed to a bank. It may be so—but before and after an election are very different periods of time!

Perhaps there is hardly one man in business in a thousand, not having some private interest or secret motive to influence his judgment, who truly believes that the removal of the deposits was an intelligent and correct proceeding—so much for the measure; but as they are removed, many would not have them restored, that the president's infallibility may stand unimpeached, though suffering much damage themselves by that rude act. These are personal, and not party considerations, in the lawful meaning of the latter term; and hence the revolution in public opinion that is going on.*

*As politicians, if resolved, at any expense, to cause a retirement of president Jackson, at the end of his term, in disgrace, and prevent Mr. Van Buren from filling the place that he holds—we should urge on the present pursuits of what is slavishly called "the government;" but we aim at much higher and more precious objects! We know that we have personally suffered heavy losses in consequence of these pursuits, and fearfully expect to be reduced from a state of independence, and fearfully of wealth), to one of embarrassment, (though not of poverty, we hope), if these pursuits are presented to their accomplishment. It is well that we do not owe much—for the much that is owing to us, and other means that were available a few months ago, and afforded a plentiful supply to make all things work smoothly, have lost their former full power, and afford only a limited support, and those means are almost every day reduced by the bankruptcy of persons indebted to us, &c. for the ability to earn and luck of getting money, are unquestionably necessary to the payment of money!

We think that if every man, in business, especially as a mechanic or manufacturer, will look over his affairs, it will be agreed that, on the average, those have at least lost one year's

The personal support of the president is not excusable on account of a personal opposition. He has been twice elected to what we regard as the most dignified office in the world—and the gratitude of the country has, without stint, flowed upon him. He is not a candidate for a second re-election. The measure of the good will of the people for him is filled—and why then the necessity of forcing personal feelings into the adjustment of the most interesting public concerns? Is it indispensable, that, in a due respect for president Jackson, all which is done by him, or in his name, must needs be approved?—all his *veto*s of the people's will be submitted to as oracles not to be doubted—in which he has exercised a power which no king, in a constitutional government, could exert, and yet hope to maintain his seat on the throne? Admit that his motives are good—all his purposes honest, is the judgment of the representatives of the people and of the states to be coldly set aside by the veto of an individual? Thousands are asking themselves this question, and thousands have already decided it in the negative, and party lines are becoming extinct, in the distress and bankruptcy and ruin which besets the people—and the poverty which threatens all classes of persons, except those who derive their subsistence from fixed salaries, or other permanent incomes. Labor is without demand unless at greatly reduced wages—real property is almost "without price" in the market—money is wretchedly scarce, and getting scarcer every day, and specie is rushing into the vaults of the bank of the United States, as if they were the only places of safety; while the holders of stocks and bank notes, in general, are in instant apprehension of some new calamity falling upon them. Never before was there such a state of excitement. Every intelligent man feels that he is injured, and is beginning to ask, why?—and to compare the speculative evils which he hears of in the bank of the United States, with the real ones suffered by himself, and his neighbors.*

The veto of the bank bill, by the president, speaking of foreign capital, says—

"The interest on it carried to Europe is a burthen upon the industry, and a drain of the currency, which no country can bear without occasional distress."

Such was the doctrine of the party a short time ago—for whatever is uttered in "high places" is received with that same sort of reverence which the prescriptions of the ancient oracle at Delphos obtained.†

And what is the doctrine now?—what the practice of "democratic" Pennsylvania for years past—with the "right honorable" lords and ladies that glitter on the lists of her creditors? And every one thought that Pennsylvania acted wisely in introducing foreign capital—no labor, or profit that ought to have been made on capital, already, by the president's "experiment." What will be the loss in a winding up of their affairs? The man who thought himself clearly worth 10,000 dollars in September last, will feel happy in a belief that he is worth $7,500 in September next, if so he shall dare to believe, and in this proportion—unless the "experiment" is ended before that time. We are too far advanced in life, and have too many children, to be politicians at this ruinous rate of loss—and especially when our best judgment is satisfied that no possible public good is to be derived from it, except in the awful instruction which it may afford to those who may hereafter desire to meddle with the currency.

*Is this view too highly charged? We think not—and offer one simple matter in proof. There is no deposit bank in South Carolina—the state banks would not receive the public money from the office of the bank of the U. S. or the president would not trust them, we know not which—and, though the price of cotton has declined in the general stagnation of business, there is no other difficulty about money in that state, and all the banks possess the old confidence that was reposed in them by the people.

†To resist any opinion advanced by the president, in the estimation of some, is to be—condemned. If the idea of the following, extracted from a late number of the "Globe," (as we find it quoted in the "Telegraph") be not blasphemous, it is disgraceful to the character of any being "created in God's own image." The secretary denied his MASTER—betrayed his MASTER!

From the Globe. "He (Duane) may be very honest and veracious, but we think he was wanting, on one occasion, in courage, to defend these very respectable virtues. We cannot expect the ex-secretary to be any better than the apostle who 'denied' his master, and if he be not content with being classed with him, why we will class him with that other apostle who 'betrayed' his master."

one any more supposed the interest to be a "burthen" than was a payment for any sort of foreign goods which it was not convenient to manufacture at home!—for money, like every thing else, is merchandise, and, like cod-fish or tobacco, seeks its best market. And up to the time of this veto, it seemed a settled principle in the political economies of this country, that we ought to import foreign money, as a raw material, to furnish employment, and make profits on labor, in the use of it.

And how stands the case now? Is it not recommended that New York and Pennsylvania shall borrow foreign capital to sustain their money corporations, or carry on their public works? The shout is for a specie currency, and the way of bringing that about seems most direct in borrowing money, (though all who depend on borrowed capital "ought to break!") to sustain a paper circulation! Isn't this beautiful? Risum teneatis?

New York is at the head of the states—the "empire state"—and exerts a mighty power in support of the veto principles, anti-credit proclamations and hard-money recommendations of president Jackson. Let us see how the practice of her politicians corresponds with their preaching.

The following is from the "New York Evening Post" of May 7—and the reader will please to recollect, that this is now the only "by authority" paper in that great city—the "Standard" having died a few days ago for the want of subsistence:*

Both houses of the legislature adjourned yesterday à la die. We shall publish to-morrow the titles of the acts passed, which are 294 in number. Among these acts are TEN INCORPORATIONS NEW BANKS, one increasing the capital of an existing bank; thirty four incorporating joint stock companies; ten renewing or extending the privileges of existing joint stock companies, such as manufacturing, rail road, bridge and turnpike companies, &c. and upwards of thirty acts creating corporations of other kinds. Exclusive privileges! Exclusive privileges! We are a bank-governed people, and every year the number and weight of our manacles are increased. These exclusively privileged associations—these chartered rights—these corporations, if the people do not awake to the subject, and "by opposing end them," will, ere long, change the whole nature of government, as they have already materially corrupted the morals of society.

And in a subsequent number of the same paper, it is said—

"The Albany Argus speaks of the proceedings of the legislature in its session just concluded as 'proceedings which show a devotion to public interests, not surpassed by any preceding legislature.' Will the Argus please to put its finger on the evidence of this patriotism. We cannot find it. There has been as much selfishness and as little true public spirit in the last legislature as in any previous one for years. The Argus, in the same paragraph with the compliment we have quoted, mentions that among the acts passed by the legislature, 'are the charters for eight new banks,' and one increase, with an aggregate increased capital of $3,800,000. Perhaps the Argus thinks this a proof of devotion to the public interests. We consider it quite the contrary; and all must consider it so, who know how bank charters, and rail road company charters, and insurance company charters, and all other charters granting exclusive privileges, are obtained, and how they operate on the interests of the community. The Argus has opposed earnestly and ably the United States' bank. Why not extend its opposition to our whole rotten and oppressive banking system?"

Remarks are useless: but the multiplication of money-corporations, as they are called, is among the strongest reasons that can be offered in favor of a recharter of the bank of the United States—to regulate and balance, and restrain their operations, by compelling them to keep up a sound currency, or shut up their shops. Without some such regulation, those corporations will run wild in issues of paper, and the whole country be filled with rags, rags, rags—which, even now, by the policy of "the government," have much uncertainty of value at the very places of their issue, and depreciate as much as from 12 to 15 per cent. as they are carried distances from home, compared with the uniform value of the bills of the bank of the United States.

The committee of the house of representatives, appointed to investigate the affairs of the bank of the United States, have returned to Washington. The facts heretofore suggested, as to their requisitions appear to be true. As we may soon expect reports of the proceedings had, it does not seem required, at present to do more than insert the following paragraphs from Philadelphia papers.

The "United States Gazette" says—The following resolution of the investigating committee, will show to what lengths and depths it was their wish to make inquiry:

"Resolved, That the president and directors of the bank be requested to furnish the committee with copies of all correspondence between the president of the bank or any of its officers, with members of congress; or of unanswered letters received from one of them, since the 1st day of July, 1832, touching the renewal of the charter of the bank, the removal or restoration of the public deposits, or touching the business transactions of such members with the bank."

And the "National Gazette" informs us that—

On Friday last, (10th inst.) the marshal of the district served upon the president and directors of the United States bank, a subpoena, duces tecum, in the name and behalf of the house of representatives of the United States, whereto was appended a read. At noon on Saturday, the directors attended at Mrs. Yohe's, the North American hotel, and their counsel, J. E. Ingersoll, esq. presented to the investigating committee, a protest against the procedure. We understand that the committee then adjourned, to meet in Washington city on Thursday next.

The writ which the marshal served upon the bank directors, was printed at Washington, and contained an order to examine into the affairs of the bank; but in the blank left for the place at which the committee was to meet, was added in writing, an order for the directors to produce the credit books of the bank, showing the indebtedness of individuals.

The books of the bank, it appears, were to be deposited in an hotel, out of the keeping or guardianship of the bank! We suppose that such a thing was never heard of, or thought of, before. But the demand for private letters of members of congress goes far beyond that. Both demands were, of course, resisted. It was impossible that they could be complied with; and we cannot believe that either of the committee expected that they would be. It may be, that the bank has no such letters from members of congress—but if even so, no honorable man, we think, would have plead the fact, against such a demand.

The following gentlemen, it is stated in the National Intelligencer, are said to have been nominated, by the president of the United States, to the senate, to be government directors of the bank of the United States for the current year, viz: Henry Horn, Roberts Vaux, Charles McAllister, of Philadelphia; Joseph White, of Baltimore; and Saul Alley, of New York.

A new bank has been authorised at Buffalo, New York, under the charge of seven commissioners, who, according to the "Journal," are all office-holders—viz: two postmasters, one Indian agent, one collector of customs, one surrogate and two judges of county courts. The four first, we suppose, belong to the United States "army of Feds."* The profits of the place of commissioner to make a bank, is estimated in the New York papers, at from 500 to 1,000 dollars! We know not how they are realized.

The "New York American" states certain things in relation to the legislative operations concerning banks at the last session, which are well calculated to surprise us—yet being local in their character we shall not particularly notice them. But the facts stated in the preceding paragraph are matters of general interest, as shewing the ar-

*These are the days of political names! The "Jacksonmen," and "National republicans," are now called by the former party "democrats," and "federalists," and by the latter party "torians" and "whigs." But the Harrisburgh Intelligencer has raised up a third party, calling it the "Feds"—and an excellent name we think that it is. On this subject the "Intelligencer" says—"There is a party in the United States, that may with great propriety be called 'Feds'; not federalists, for federalists are much less interested men. There are about forty or fifty thousand 'FEDS' in the United States. We had 'Feds' in the time of the revolution—they were sent here by the British king 'to harass our people and eat out their substance'; and they were, right or wrong, supported by the torians. A 'Fed' is a man who is fed by the government, and some of the 'Feds' of the present day, are well fed; all of whom, as in the time of the revolution, are supported, right or wrong, by the advocates of power."

The remarks, however, are too general. There are many exceptions to the rule laid down by the "Intelligencer"—a good many public officers, who, content with honestly performing their public duties, have little time to spare, or wish to indulge in the business of elections.

agement of public officers, as a privileged class, separated from the people, and entitled to the "spoils."

We mentioned in the last REGISTER that bills of the bank of the United States had been refused at some of the offices in exchange for specie. On this subject the "Richmond Whig" of the 9th inst. making some remarks on a wholesale article from the Washington "Globe" says—

It is a fact well known in this city, and we appeal to the merchants of it, and even to the directors of the state banks here, for the truth of our assertions, that the United States bank has forborne to draw on the state banks for balances to an extent which would astonish any one not conversant of the fact, that it is the direct interest of the United States bank, to sustain the state institutions, by all the means in its power. We know the fact to be so in this city, and we have, in the absence of all other testimony, a sufficient guarantee in the interest of the bank, that such is the fact elsewhere. It will be recollected, that a statement made by the Enquirer, some month or more ago, certainly not for the purpose of benefiting the U. States bank, that the branch in this city had refused to give its own notes for specie. This we know to be true, and we further know that the officers of the bank have uniformly acted in this manner and the reason is plain, because it is well known such is the demand for the United States bank notes, (now at a premium of  $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 per cent.) that our state banks would quickly be drained of their specie if the United States bank would receive it on deposit. The United States bank avows this motive, and it is a matter of public notoriety. In connection with this subject we have been politely furnished with the following:

Extract from a letter to a mercantile house in this city, from their correspondent in Charleston, dated 1st May.

"I was rather surprised to-day, by the receipt of a communication from Mr. Bacot, cashier of the branch bank at this place, stating that no more bills on Virginia could be negotiated through that office for the present, in consequence of orders from the mother bank to that effect. On asking him the reason, he told me that funds could not be remitted from Norfolk and Richmond to the north, without bearing hard on the state banks, with which the bank of the United States did not wish to come in contact."
